In its latest changes, the SEC took the unusual approach of making the new rules for stock options effective almost immediately. That decision essentially renders moot the agency's plans to provide a 30-day public comment period on the matter.

"The problem of executive pay that is both greatly excessive and deliberately obscured is a grave one," Mr. Frank said. "I had been encouraged when the SEC recognized this problem in its initial proposal, and while that continues to provide improvements in the relevant rules, this slippage is regrettable both substantively and for not having been open to more public discussion."

Frank Wants Pullback On Executive Salaries (USAT)

USA Today, December 28, 2006

Rep. Barney Frank, who will head the House committee that oversees the Securities and Exchange Commission, said Congress should rein in executive pay after the SEC changed rules for how companies value stock-option awards.

"Backtracking by the SEC on this important matter of stock options reinforces my determination that Congress must act to deal with the problem of executive compensation that is now unconstrained by anything except the self-restraint of top executives," Frank, D-Mass., said in a statement Wednesday.

The SEC said on Dec. 22 that it will let companies report stock-option expenses "as that cost is recognized" instead of when awards are made. The change conforms with an accounting rule that requires recognition of the costs of equity awards over the period in which an employee works for them, the SEC said. Stock options often vest three to five years after being granted.

The change will allow firms to report lower compensation costs by spreading expenses over many years rather than disclosing them all at once, said accounting experts including Charles Mulford, a professor at the Georgia Institute of Technology.

Frank, the next chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, said it's "ironic" that the agency wants to change its rules when regulators are uncovering "widespread abuses" in stock-option awards. Almost 200 companies are under investigation on issues involving backdating option awards to periods of low share prices, a practice that boosts the value of the grants.

SEC spokesman John Nester didn't immediately return a phone call seeking comment.

Last week's action by the SEC amends regulations approved by the agency in July, which were the most extensive overhaul of executive-pay rules in 14 years.

New SEC Pay Rule To Benefit Executives (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

The incoming chairman of the House Financial Services Committee suggested it was a Christmas present for corporate executives from the Securities and Exchange Commission.

But SEC Chairman Christopher Cox yesterday defended the agency's recent action to modify stock option disclosures, saying it "will provide the maximum clarity and consistency for investors."

On the Friday before Christmas, without advance notice or a public vote, the SEC announced an amendment that generally would make top executives' annual pay appear smaller than it otherwise would have.

The amendment, which represented an about-face from a requirement that the agency adopted in July, would change the way stock option grants are reflected in the main compensation table of companies' annual pay reports. This revision lets businesses spread the estimated value of those options over multiple years instead of reporting their full value in the year the options are awarded.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and accounting firms that work for public companies had advocated such an approach. But reaction from other quarters was critical.

"I didn't even know they had a chimney at the SEC, and then all of a sudden this came slipping down it," Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), who is set to lead the Financial Services Committee, said in an interview.

"Backtracking by the SEC on this important matter of stock options reinforces my determination that Congress must act to deal with the problem of executive compensation," Frank said in a statement yesterday.

The change "will make it harder for investors to get a transparent picture of the magnitude and value of options being granted to corporate executives," said Lynn E. Turner, former chief accountant at the SEC and now head of research at Glass, Lewis & Co., an adviser to institutional investors.

The commissioners adopted the amendment Dec. 15, but the agency waited to announce it because the Office of Management and Budget did not approve the rule until Friday afternoon, SEC spokesman John Nester said yesterday.

The SEC action reflects the confusion and criticism that surround stock options, which have created great wealth for many executives and have been criticized as contributing to some of the worst corporate scandals. In recent months, many companies have been examining whether option grants were improperly backdated to maximize their value to executives, and some corporate chiefs have lost their jobs.

The SEC and the Justice Department have been conducting probes of options practices, and criminal charges have been filed against officials from two companies.

An option gives the holder the right to buy a share of stock at a set price. If the market price of the stock rises above that level, the holder can exercise the option at a profit. Option grants typically vest incrementally over a period of years.

Policymakers have long struggled to include some measure of option value in executive pay, because the ultimate value of options only becomes clear when they are exercised. They may end up being worthless, or worth much more than initially estimated.

In July, the SEC overhauled the rules for pay disclosures, requiring that companies show annual compensation totals for top executives that include full estimated values of option grants. The approach the SEC announced Friday would spread the value of the options over the vesting period, following the method companies must use to account for the cost of options on their financial statements.

"Artificially inflating executive pay, or reporting 'phantom' pay that will never be received, is just as misleading as routinely underreporting it," the SEC chairman said in a statement yesterday.

Estimates of the total value of option grants will not disappear from the pay disclosures. Rather, they are to appear in a separate chart from the summary compensation table.

"I don't see it as an effort [by] the commission to enable companies to hide the ball on the value of option grants," said John Olson of the law firm Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, which represents business groups.

Federal law generally requires that the SEC to publish a rule 30 days before it takes effect, but there are exceptions. In this case, the SEC found that inviting 30 days of advance public comment would have been "impracticable, unnecessary and contrary to the public interest," partly because the disclosure rules it adopted in July kicked in Dec. 15.

Editorial: Thompson Memorandum (PAPN)

Harrisburg Patriot-News (PA), December 28, 2006

Reacting to pressure by Arlen Specter and others on the "Thompson Memorandum," the Justice Department has proposed guidelines on what critics contend have been coercive and unconstitutional tactics used in investigations of corporations.

But the new guidelines still fall short of adequately protecting constitutional rights of employees. Specter and his allies, who include former Pennsylvania governor and U.S. Attorney General Dick Thornburgh and incoming Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., should continue pushing.

A memorandum issued in 2003 by then Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson issued a number of factors prosecutors should consider in deciding whether to bring criminal charges against a company. One of them took heavily into account the degree of a company's cooperation with investigators.

As a result, critics contend companies have gone too far and pressured employees to do such things as waive attorney-client privileges and other protections. While this may aid the company, it can expose individuals.

The starkest example came when a federal judge in New York ruled the Justice Department was responsible for undue pressure executives of accounting firm KPMG put on employees to cooperate in the government's probe of tax shelters.

The judge, siding with two ex-employees who alleged they were threatened with termination if they didn't waive certain rights in dealing with investigators, issued a blistering attack on the Thompson Memorandum as depriving individuals of their Fifth Amendment protection against self-incrimination.

Specter has said he will re-introduce legislation in the next Congress that would prohibit the Justice Department from pressuring corporations to waive their rights to preserve conversations and other information shared with lawyers as confidential; allow corporations to continue paying employees' lawyers fees without threat of retribution from prosecutors; and bar the department from considering how cooperative a corporation has been in determining whether to file charges.

The Thompson Memorandum remains in effect, but investigators must show a "legitimate need" to obtain privileged information and must obtain written approve from a deputy attorney general before pursuing them.

This is unsatisfactory in that we are talking about constitutional rights still being left to the discretion of too few in the Justice Department.

Specter and his allies should insist on further negotiations, and if they prove futile, spell things out clearly in legislation.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Feds Look For Fraud In Detroit City Lease (DEN)

By Paul Egan, The Detroit News

Detroit News, December 28, 2006

Audit shows $1.5M overbilling for building owned by political donor; his lawyer says city was repaid.

DETROIT -- The U.S. Justice Department is investigating possible fraud in a building lease held by Detroit's Employment and Training Department after an audit identified $1.5 million in apparent overcharges, sources familiar with the investigation said.

The Detroit City Council allocated $5.3 million at the end of 1999 to cover five years of lease payments on the building at 1300 Rosa Parks, but city payments totaled $10.7 million after 39 months, the audit said.

The building is owned by Hampton Ridge Properties LLC, which is controlled by Grosse Pointe Farms businessman Cullan Meathe, a major donor to several Detroit politicians and co-owner of Metro Cars Inc.

Detroit lawyer Steve Fishman, who represents Meathe, said the case is essentially a landlord-tenant dispute. "My understanding is that most, if not all, of the money in dispute has been paid back to the city," Fishman said.

The city-commissioned audit, by the Whall Group of Auburn Hills, found in 2003 that Hampton Ridge charged the city for insurance and other expenses the company was supposed to pay; charged the property taxes for other buildings or for taxes it never paid; and submitted duplicate invoices for security, taxes, insurance and other expenses.

Federal investigators also are reviewing allegations that a subcontractor supplied Hampton Ridge Properties two sets of invoices -- a lower one to be paid by Hampton Ridge and a higher one to be submitted to the city for reimbursement, sources familiar with the investigation said.

The inquiry is one of several investigations at Detroit City Hall that have led to the indictment of two former City Council members and scrutiny of city contracts at Cobo Center and elsewhere. Justice Department officials refused to confirm or deny the lease investigation.

Aside from any possible fraud, city officials have acknowledged their own mistakes in allowing unusual lease provisions and paying invoices that should not have been approved.

"It was horribly sloppy on the city's part," said Matt Allen, a spokesman for Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick.

Rent is $1.06M a year

Even without any overcharges, $5.3 million would not have been enough to cover the five-year lease, which allowed Hampton Ridge to charge a 5 percent management fee in addition to the $1.06 million-a-year rent, plus be reimbursed for certain expenses.

Allen said city officials are cooperating with the federal investigation and are also conducting an internal probe into the lease -- signed before Kilpatrick took office in 2002.

The 117,800-square-foot building houses a state-run Michigan Works employment satellite center and the state and federal governments provided money the city used to make the lease payments.

This year, city General Counsel Sharon McPhail negotiated the return of $1.2 million in overcharges to the city from Hampton Ridge, Allen said. A final financial settlement has not been reached, pending a meeting in January with state officials, he said.

City and state officials refused to release a copy of the Whall audit under Michigan's Freedom of Information Act., but a copy of the 61-page report was reviewed by The Detroit News.

The audit said it appeared Hampton Ridge overcharged the city about $686,000 for building improvements, $375,000 for property taxes, $215,000 for maintenance, $214,000 for heating and cooling, elevator and roof work, $163,000 for insurance and $75,000 for security.

Poor bookkeeping blamed

The lease required Hampton Ridge to maintain insurance "at its sole cost and expense," the audit said.

"Nevertheless, Hampton Ridge Properties billed and the department paid approximately $162,771.50 for insurance," the audit said.

Even if the city had been responsible for insurance payments, Hampton Ridge Properties still would have overcharged the city by about $50,000, through duplicate invoices and by improperly billing a $2,013 automobile insurance invoice to the lease, the audit said.

In the area of security, "it appears that … several invoices were submitted twice and the department paid them twice," the audit said.

According to the report, Meathe acknowledged a problem with overcharges in a 2003 meeting with city officials and blamed poor bookkeeping.

Meathe, who did not return phone calls from The News, asked city officials in January 2003 to pay his February 2003 invoice early because he was experiencing a cash flow problem, the audit said.

At an April 9, 2003, meeting with city officials, Meathe complained about slow payments by the city and said he was "carrying the city … because he had to pay the vendors before the department paid him the rental monies due," the audit said.

But one of the vendors claims it was not being paid for work it did for Hampton Ridge that was charged to the lease. Security company Pinkerton's Inc. sued Hampton Ridge in Wayne Circuit Court in August 2004, alleging it had not been paid nearly $169,000 for security it had provided at 1300 Rosa Parks since November 2000, court records show.

City officials said that at the time Meathe complained about late payments, the city had paid all invoices on or before the due date, except for two, the audit said. Those two invoices were paid eight days late, the audit said.

Murders Are Up In New York And Several Other U.S. Cities For 2006 (FINDLAW/AP)

By Karen Matthews, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-After many years of decline, the number of murders climbed this year in New York and many other major U.S. cities, reaching their highest levels in a decade in some places.

Among the reasons given: gangs, drugs, the easy availability of illegal guns, a disturbing tendency among young people to pull guns when they do not get the respect they demand, and, in Houston at least, an influx of Hurricane Katrina evacuees.

In New York, where the city reported 579 homicides through Dec. 24 - a nearly 10 percent increase from the year before - the spike is mostly the result of an unusually large number of "reclassified homicides," or those involving victims who were shot or stabbed years ago but did not die until this year. Thirty-five such deaths have been added to this year's toll, compared with an annual average of about a dozen.

At the same time, Police Department spokesman Paul Browne noted that this year's total is only slightly higher than last year's 539 homicides - the city's lowest death toll in more than 40 years.

Browne blamed the rise in part on the availability of guns, particularly weapons from out of state. The city this year sued dozens of out-of-state gun shops that it says are responsible for many of the illegal weapons on the streets of New York.

In Chicago, homicides through the first 11 months of the year were up 3.3 percent compared with the same period in 2005, reversing a four-year decline. A police spokeswoman said gang violence has been a contributing factor.

In New Haven, Connecticut, there were 23 homicides as of Tuesday, compared with 15 in 2004 and in 2005. Police Chief Francisco Ortiz said that about half of this year's killings involve young people settling disputes with guns instead of fists.

"They're all struggling with this thing about respect and pride," Ortiz said. "It's about respect. It's about revenge. It's about having a reputation. It's about turf and it's about girls."

Houston police attribute the 15 percent increase in the homicide count to the influx of Katrina evacuees from the Gulf Coast

"So we expect that to settle," Lt. Murray Smith said. "We're hoping it will go down."

New Orleans, with its post-Katrina exodus, is the only major U.S. city that saw a sharp decline in the number of homicides. There were 154 in New Orleans this year as of Monday, said police spokesman Sgt. Jeffrey Johnson, down from 210 in 2005. But the city was largely empty during the fall and winter of 2005-06, and even now has only about half of its pre-Katrina population of 455,000.

Some cities, like Cincinnati - which has had 83 homicides so far, up from 79 in 2005 - posted their highest numbers ever. Others saw their highest death tolls in years.

Oakland, California, had 148 homicides as of Wednesday, up 57 percent from last year and the highest in more than a decade. Philadelphia's 2006 homicide total was 403 as of Wednesday, the first time the number has topped 400 in nearly a decade. There were 380 killings in all of 2005.

Philadelphia officials have struggled all year to reduce the violence. In July, Mayor John F. Street gave a televised address in which pleaded with young people: "Lay down your weapons. Do it now. Choose education over violence."

A few cities reported slight decreases in murders. Los Angeles' total was down about 4 percent to 464 homicides through Dec. 23. San Francisco's fell about 15 percent. San Francisco Police Sgt. Steve Mannina said the drop is partly due to increased patrols in violence-prone areas and more overtime approved by the police chief.

The FBI does not release its national crime statistics until several months after the end of the year. The bureau's statistics for the first six months of 2006 showed an increase of 1.4 percent in the number of murders in the first half of 2006 compared with the first six months of 2005.

Andrew Karmen, a criminologist at John Jay College in New York, said that while there are various theories for the drop in murders in New York and other cities in the 1990s, no one knows for sure why it happened. And if they are going up again, no one knows the reason for that, either, he said.

He noted that police departments tend to take credit when the murder rate goes down. "When crime goes up it will be interesting to see whether they will accept responsibility," Karmen said.

Ryan Sues To Keep Pension (CHIT)

By Michael Higgins, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, December 28, 2006

Former Gov. George Ryan filed a lawsuit Wednesday against state retirement officials, battling to keep a pension of more than $60,000 a year that Ryan says he earned before the scandals that led to his wide-ranging fraud convictions in April.

The seven-member board of the General Assembly Retirement System voted unanimously last month to cancel Ryan's entire $197,000-a-year pension in light of the convictions.

But that decision was "erroneous," Ryan's lawyers argued in the lawsuit filed in Cook County Circuit Court. They contend that Ryan's racketeering and fraud convictions dealt only with his actions as secretary of state and governor—not his 24 previous years in public office.

"The Board of Trustees failed to produce any evidence that Ryan's felony conviction related to or arose out of ... his service as a member of the Kankakee County Board of Supervisors, a member of the Illinois General Assembly, or lieutenant governor," wrote Ryan's attorneys, who include former Gov. James Thompson.

Thompson's argument, if successful, would allow Ryan to collect $61,885 a year, nearly his entire ending salary as lieutenant governor, pension officials said earlier.

Ryan was convicted in April on charges that, as secretary of state and governor, he doled out sweetheart deals to friends and used state resources and employees for political gain.

He was sentenced in September to 6? years in prison. A federal appeals court ruled last month that Ryan may remain free while his appeal is pending.

Officials at the Retirement System could not be reached Wednesday for comment.

Scott Mulford, a spokesman for Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan, said Wednesday that he could not comment specifically on Ryan's suit. "The opinion that Atty. Gen. Madigan issued [earlier] speaks for itself," Mulford said. "It was researched exhaustively."

But retirement officials, relying on a legal opinion from Madigan, had said in an earlier ruling that Ryan's attorneys had misinterpreted state law on pensions.

According to the retirement board, public officials who commit felonies relating to their "official duties" forfeit the right to receive any pension from the state.

While Ryan held many positions over the years, "there is but one employer, the state of Illinois," the retirement board ruled.

If Ryan's position prevailed, the law would be too weak to deter corruption, the retirement board said.

Under Ryan's approach, "a lifelong legislator ... having decided not to run again after what may be 20 years of service, can therefore feel free to take his chances during his last term, knowing that all he is risking is the last two years of his service," the board said. "Surely, that is not the intent" of the law.

Ryan served on the Kankakee board from 1966 to 1973; in the General Assembly from 1973 to 1983; and as lieutenant governor from 1983 to 1991.

Since leaving the governor's office in 2003, Ryan has collected $630,000 from the state pension fund, according to retirement officials. Officials said the board's ruling did not require Ryan to return that money and he is eligible to be refunded the $235,508 he paid into the system.

In Ryan's criminal case, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer had previously denied his request to remain free pending appeal. But the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned that ruling. Ryan's lawyers had argued that tumultuous jury deliberations raised significant legal questions that could result in a new trial.

Mortgage Fraud Hits Couple To The Tune Of $2M (WFAA)

WFAA-TV, December 28, 2006

Misfortune is not the only reason 3500 homes are posted for foreclosure next month in North Texas. The FBI says mortgage fraud has reached epidemic proportions.

One couple, who found they were major property owners in North Texas without ever signing any papers, has felt the epidemic first-hand.

Paul Dyl and his wife Jackie live in a mobile home in Cheyenne, Wyoming. Mr. Dyl drives a well used pickup truck and their annual income is less than $30,000 a year.

While Mr. Dyl has never been to Texas and Mrs. Dyl has only been in the state once, beginning in 2004, six North Texas properties ended up in their name.

They said they knew nothing about it until they began receiving phone calls from bill collectors all over the country claiming they owed more than $2 million dollars.

"And now I'm 57 years old and I'm never going to recover," Mr. Dyl said. "It just turned everything upside down."

The first bank to call was what is now Fidelity Bank in Plano. The Dyls said bank president Tom Freas was among the nastiest of the callers.

"He just screamed at me one day," Mr. Dyl said. "He said, 'You signed these documents saying you were going to live in Texas."

Mr. Dyl said Freas said he had actually met up with him face to face.

"And I said, 'No, I've never seen you face to face,'" he said.

Anybody who has ever really met Mr. Dyl would most likely remember him since he has no right hand after losing it in an accident years ago.

"You can't miss a hook," he said.

The Dyls, it turns out, were victims of identity theft and mortgage fraud to the tune of more than $2 million. The checks and balances that might be expected to be in place when getting a mortgage failed, six times.

Despite the anguish the Dyls have been through, virtually everybody News 8 could find in the case claimed it was a private matter and somebody else's fault.

Freas wouldn't talk about the case saying, "It's covered under the privacy act....the issue is resolved between me and my customers."

The problem is the Dyls never were his customers.

"He got real nasty about it," Mr. Dyl said. "And he said, 'We give you a loan and then you can't make the payments. What's the deal? And I said, 'I don't know you people.'"

The Fidelity loan only accounts for one vacant lot in Flower Mound that had been bought in the Dyls' name for more than $294,000. Nearly every day over the past year, they said they have discovered more as debt collectors continued to call.

A meager paper trail on a Plano house, which was bought in their name for $360,000, led partly to Benchmark Mortgage.

On its website, Benchmark touts how much money brokers can earn making loans through them. Benchmark Chief Operating Officer Stewart Hunter wouldn't talk about the case either. However, he said the Dyls were his customer and cited the Privacy Act.

DOJ_NMG_0109554

A loan application for the property bears the address of a Benchmark Mortgage "office," which turned out to be an apartment house in Irving.

Experts say an apartment can be a mortgage office and be part of a drive to make buying a home easier to make money.

"There are people who will do deals over the phone from Florida or California having never visited the property and having never physically met the loan officer or the realtor or whatever," said David Hamilton, a mortgage lender.

Experts say the way to prevent fraud by the various entities handling the process is by requiring the people to come in person.

The Dyls said they always sign their names using their middle initial, which was one of the indicators that their signatures were forged. One forgery apparently led to another.

David Fair, CEO of one of Dallas' leading title companies, said mortgage fraud can snowball.

There have been so many fraudulent mortgage fraud transactions in the last two years that now someone who is a perpetrator is able to go get a previous mortgage fraud to use it to support the current mortgage fraud," he said.

Washington Mutual, one of the nation's largest home lenders, made four loans to someone purporting to be the Dyls for more than $800,000.

The Dyls said they receive dozens of threatening letters and even more calls.

"They were so threatening sometimes it was just fearful," said Mrs. Dyl.

They filed a complaint to Washington Mutual, known as WaMu, in the fall of 2005. However, nothing happened until News 8 contacted the company. WaMu declined an on camera interview.

But in a statement, Brad Russell said, "It is the [mortgage] broker's responsibility to verify the identity of the borrower" and; "WaMu is committed to working with the credit agencies, proper authorities and victims to minimize any future impact this may have on the Dyl family."

"You guys screwed up our credit," Dyl said. "We can't go out and buy a car. We can't buy nothing without all this stuff going on."

Fair said the growth of mortgage fraud is disastrous to the real estate economy and sees one solution.

"We need to have more enforcement," he said. "We don't seem to have enough enforcement."

The Dyls contacted the FBI but nothing has happened. They ultimately took their case to the Cheyenne Wyoming Police Department, which took their complaint.

They tried to hire a lawyer but most wanted $5,000 to even start a case. Now, Mike Haines of Dallas is representing them.

Credit Agencies Lag On Errors, Fraud (BOS)

By Beth Healy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, December 28, 2006

Consumers struggle to untangle reports

BRIDGEWATER -- Eric W. Carroll's credit report says he has a home in Florida, a wife named Katrina, and a pile of unpaid bills.

He first learned this when a debt collector called him in 2002, dialing his apartment in Bridgewater, yet asking for an Eric W. Carroll from Avon Park, Fla. Carroll insisted there was some mistake: He was not married, and he had never lived in Florida.

Nearly five years later, collectors are still hounding the wrong Eric Carroll.

The details of his financial life have been hopelessly interwoven with those of another man by the same name, a man who appears, in credit reports, to have stiffed more than two dozen creditors, from banks to utilities, and has a history of bouncing checks. As a result, the Massachusetts Eric Carroll, living in Newton with his fiancee Nancy and their new baby, can't get a mortgage, can't rent an apartment in his own name, and last July could not buy an engagement ring without his father's help.

"I felt this big," said Carroll, 29, pinching together his thumb and forefinger. "It literally ruins your life."

Carroll was one of scores who contacted the Globe after a Spotlight Team report this summer on debt collection abuses. Many felt victimized by the power and ruthless tactics of debt collectors. But Carroll and others complained of another maddening aspect of the system: The glacial and ineffectual response of the three giant keepers of consumer credit records -- Experian, Equifax, and TransUnion -- to any errors in their files, even those that appear to result from fraud.

Until the errors are corrected, debt collectors will try again and again to squeeze out a payment. Some back off when they find they're after the wrong consumer, but often, another firm buys the account and goes after the likes of Carroll again.

The local, state, and federal law enforcement response to complaints of identity fraud is similarly passive, despite the huge volume of complaints -- 255,000 last year to the Federal Trade Commission alone. Consumers are left to fend for themselves -- a recipe for frustration and worse, as Carroll has found.

"This kid's trying to start a life for himself," said Leo "Buddy" Carroll, Eric's father, who has devoted hundreds of hours to fielding calls from collectors on his son's behalf, and helping him dispute items on his credit report. "It's not fair."

Was this identity theft, or a data debacle? Either way, Eric Carroll's credit was ruined. And the Carrolls couldn't get to the bottom of the case, nor could they get help in solving it.

They quickly suspected that the real deadbeat was the Carroll from Florida, whose address appeared on the Massachusetts Carroll's credit reports. The Florida man shares the middle initial W, though it stands for Wayne, not Winslow. He is almost the same age, at 31, and shows up on numerous accounts with the Newton man's Social Security number.

But all that was not enough to untangle the mess -- or even spark an investigation by the credit bureaus. The information was a conversation stopper with debt collectors, who hung up upon hearing they had the "wrong" Eric Carroll. Two creditors, Dell Computer and Sprint, looked into the matter after Carroll complained, and wrote him letters saying they'd found evidence of fraud and that he was not responsible for the bills. But neither company, as a practice, passes such findings on to law enforcement.

The credit bureaus, in turn, generally expect consumers to dispute incorrect items on their credit reports one by one, over the Internet, and to patiently wait 30 days for each item to be checked out. When they find evidence of fraud, the credit bureaus will flag or temporarily "freeze" a consumer's record, to prevent banks and others from mistakenly extending credit to a person they suspect of fraud. But they are under no legal obligation to pass the information on to authorities.

David Rubinger , a spokesman for Equifax Inc. , said the company does what it can to help people deal with identity theft, but ultimately, "The consumer needs to help themself ."

The credit bureaus do urge consumers to file police reports. But that step usually accomplishes little. In Carroll's case, the Bridgewater Police Department took his report of alleged identity theft and "went the extra mile," according to Sergeant Christopher Delmonte , faxing the report to the Highlands County Sheriff's Office in Florida. But that's as far as they could take it, he said.

Even when the police do pass along a tip, it can die quickly. Leo Carroll recalls speaking with a deputy sheriff in Highlands County, Robert Campbell, to follow up. He said Campbell told him Eric's was a case of mistaken identity. Campbell, in an interview with the Globe, said he recalled going to see an Eric W. Carroll, who was then living in Lake Placid, Fla. He said he determined that the matter was a data error, not identity fraud, although he could not remember how he came to that conclusion. The county could not locate any record of the investigation.

A little further digging turned up an arrest record for the Florida-based Eric W. Carroll that included charges of defrauding several people on eBay in 2004.

In a telephone interview from Florida, Carroll said he'd had longtime financial problems. He got into trouble on eBay, he said, when he started a business selling music amplifiers but ran short of cash -- taking orders from people that he couldn't fulfill. Records show the charges against him were dropped. "I was able to get everybody their money back," Eric Wayne Carroll said.

He denied having used the Social Security number of Eric Carroll in Massachusetts, and said he had no knowledge of their intertwined identities. He did not respond to subsequent calls and e-mails from the Globe.

In Norwell, Susan and David Litchfield figured they, too, were hot on the trail of an identity thief. While battling the credit bureaus for six years to erase numerous debts on their record that were incurred by a David J. Leighton of Tampa, the Litchfields obtained a copy of one credit card agreement they had allegedly signed. On the form, which the Globe reviewed, is what appears to be Leighton's signature, along with David M. Litchfield's Social Security number neatly penned in.

But that did not interest the credit bureaus. Susan Litchfield wrote to the three companies, telling them of the apparent fraud, to no avail. She said she filed a complaint with the FTC, and she called the FBI and US Secret Service. She has disputed more than a dozen items on the report, including a Tampa child support enforcement order that last December totaled $19,060, according to an Experian credit report.

In 2004, the Litchfields went to the Norwell police. The department forwarded the matter to the Tampa police, who responded that the case "was investigated by our Department and determined to be unfounded." A Tampa detective wrote that the accounts had been mixed up because the two men have nearly the same Social Security number, except for the last digit.

But that didn't explain Litchfield's Social Security number appearing on the credit application with Leighton's name, address, and apparent signature.

Leighton, reached by telephone, said he had heard from the Litchfields years ago and thought the issue was resolved. He said he had no memory of signing for the Mastercard application on which his name appears and said, "The only Social Security number I've used is my own." He did not respond to numerous requests to see a copy of his signature.

The ordeal has been costly to the Litchfields, who first learned of the problem when they were rejected for a student loan for the younger of their two daughters. Sears and Citibank have raised the Litchfields' credit card interest rates, as a penalty for the Leighton items on their credit report. And when they recently went to refinance their home equity loan, the bank where Susan Litchfield has done business her entire life, Scituate Federal Savings Bank, at first declined them over the credit report. "I just sat here and cried," she said. After she explained they were victims of fraud, the bank did extend the loan -- but not on the best terms the Litchfields were used to.

After an inquiry by the Globe, TransUnion, one of the credit bureaus, reviewed Litchfield's case. On Dec. 15, the Chicago firm's director of consumer solutions and fraud victim assistance, Steve Reger , told Susan Litchfield that the company had found evidence of fraud and promised to wipe the record clean. In an interview, Reger said: "Mr. Leighton was using Mr. Litchfield's Social Security number."

Meanwhile, the Carrolls are still fighting for justice for Eric.

In response to Globe questions, Experian recently asked several creditors, including Wachovia Bank, to review their files on Eric W. Carroll. Wachovia then wrote to the Carrolls, asserting that its records on Eric were correct, attaching a copy of the credit card contract it said belonged to him. It was signed by Katrina S. Carroll -- Lake Placid, Fla.

It would take another round of calls by the Carrolls, and a bank investigation, to get Wachovia to back down. The new information from creditors has led Experian, too, to a new conclusion; the firm now says Carroll's file shows evidence of identity theft.

Fines Levied In FEMA Fraud (SCT)

By Tami K. Phillips

Scott County Times (MS), December 27, 2006

JACKSON--A federal court has ordered two Morton women to pay restitution fines and conduct community service for their part in a scam to secure FEMA funds following Hurricane Katrina.

One of the women will also serve time in prison, the office of United States Attorney Dunn Lampton announced earlier this month.

Stephanie Fontan was sentenced to serve eight months in prison and to pay restitution to FEMA in the amount of $6,000. Glenda Spangler was ordered to pay $4,358 in restitution to FEMA.

In addition, both women were ordered to conduct 40 hours of community service.

Fontan and Spangler had previously pled guilty to charges that they filed an application with FEMA for disaster assistance in which they represented that Spangler's primary residence was in Pascagoula and that her personal property located therein had sustained damage as a result of Hurricane Katrina.

After an investigation by the United States Department of Homeland Security, it was determined that both representations in the claim to FEMA were false.

Ex-gossip Columnist Convicted On Sex Charge (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0109557

LAS VEGAS (AP) - Former Us Weekly gossip columnist Timothy McDarrah has been found guilty of charges related to soliciting sex with a minor.

McDarrah, a former reporter at the Las Vegas Sun, was arrested last year in New York after soliciting sex from an undercover federal agent posing as a 13-year-old girl.

He was charged with one count of using a computer and the Internet "to attempt to entice, induce, coerce and persuade a minor to engage in sexual activity," according to an indictment handed up in November 2005. He was convicted Dec. 20 after an eight-day jury trial.

McDarrah, 44, responded in June 2005 to a posting on the craigslist.com Web site offering introductions to the "freshest, youngest" girls in New York, an FBI affidavit said. The gossip writer told an undercover FBI agent, who had posted the advertisement to lure pedophiles, that he would pay $200 for sex with a 13-year-old girl, the affidavit said.

After his arrest, McDarrah was suspended without pay from his post as the editor of Us Weekly's "Hot Stuff" column. From 2002 to 2004, he worked as a gossip columnist at the Las Vegas Sun.

McDarrah faces a mandatory minimum of five years in prison, according to court documents.

Judge Won't Reinstate Abortion Charges (WP/AP)

By John Hanna

WICHITA, Dec. 27 -- A judge refused Wednesday to reinstate criminal charges against a Wichita abortion doctor, only hours after the outgoing attorney general named a special prosecutor to handle the case.

Last week, state Attorney General Phill Kline, a vocal abortion opponent, filed 30 charges against George Tiller, accusing him of performing 15 illegal late-term abortions in 2003 on patients ages 10 to 22 and not properly reporting details to the state.

Sedgwick County Judge Paul W. Clark dismissed the charges on jurisdictional grounds later the same day. Kline this week asked Clark to reinstate the charges, but the judge rejected that request during a hearing Wednesday.

Clark agreed with the Sedgwick County district attorney, who argued that Kline did not have authority to file the charges.

Kline criticized Clark's decision, saying neither the judge nor the district attorney had reviewed the evidence.

Kline, a Republican who was defeated for reelection in November, said he is turning over decisions about the case -- including whether to appeal Clark's latest ruling -- to the newly appointed special prosecutor: Don McKinney, a Democrat and brother of state House Minority Leader Dennis McKinney (D).

"This appointment of an independent special prosecutor will remove this investigation from a highly charged political process," Kline said.

Tiller's clinic, one of the few in the country to perform late-term abortions, has been a target of abortion opponents for decades. The clinic was bombed in 1985, and Tiller was shot in both arms by a protester in 1993.

Judge Won't Revive Charges Against Abortion Doctor (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

A district court judge Wednesday refused to reinstate criminal charges against a nationally known abortion doctor, ruling that the Kansas attorney general had overstepped his authority in the case.

Outgoing Atty. Gen. Phill Kline last week charged Dr. George Tiller with performing illegal late-term abortions at his Wichita clinic and failing to report them accurately to state authorities. Hours later, Sedgwick County Judge Paul W. Clark dismissed the case on jurisdictional grounds: Only the locally elected district attorney, he said, had the power to bring such charges.

Kline asked Clark to reconsider. At a brief hearing Wednesday, the judge took another look at the legal arguments — and upheld his previous decision.

"The case is dismissed. We're very pleased," said Lee Thompson, an attorney for Tiller.

Kline, a Republican, has appointed a special prosecutor to handle the charges against Tiller, including a possible appeal of the dismissal. But it's unlikely that any appeal could be resolved before Kline leaves office Jan. 8.

His successor, Democrat Paul Morrison, won election by painting Kline as an antiabortion extremist. In a statement after the hearing, Morrison pledged to review the evidence carefully — but he strongly suggested he would drop Kline's long-running investigation into Tiller's clinic.

"Kansans expect more from their attorney general than grandstanding and political stunts," Morrison said. He promised to "refocus the vast resources of the attorney general's office."

But the antiabortion activists who pray daily outside Tiller's clinic are not willing to concede defeat.

Last spring, they gathered more than 7,700 signatures demanding that a grand jury be convened to investigate the death of a 19-year-old mentally disabled patient at Tiller's clinic. The patient, Christin Gilbert, died in January 2005 of complications from an early-third-trimester abortion. State health authorities cleared Tiller and his staff of wrongdoing. The grand jury found no grounds for criminal indictment.

Antiabortion activist Troy Newman said he may begin another petition drive to seat a new grand jury — this time to consider Kline's allegations about illegal late-term abortions.

Kansas law permits abortions of viable fetuses only if the woman's life is in danger or if two doctors certify that continuing the pregnancy would cause "a substantial and irreversible impairment of a major bodily function." Tiller's clinic reported aborting 240 viable fetuses last year; Kline alleges that in some cases, the women were not facing irreversible health risks but rather were suffering from depression or anxiety.

"We'll be pressing as hard as we can to have these particular allegations brought before a court," said Newman, president of the activist group Operation Rescue. Dist. Atty. Nola Foulston, a Democrat, has asked Kline to turn over his evidence against Tiller so she can decide whether to file charges. But Kline has said repeatedly that he intends to keep investigating from the attorney general's office. He engaged in a two-year legal battle to get access to some of Tiller's patient medical records, and he continues to review them, even as his term winds down.

"The investigation," he said Wednesday, "is ongoing."

DA Won't Prosecute Nevada Governor-elect (AP)

By Kathleen Hennessey

AP, December 28, 2006

Nevada Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons will not be prosecuted on allegations that he assaulted a cocktail waitress in a parking garage three weeks before the election, authorities said Wednesday.

There was insufficient evidence to prove criminal charges against Gibbons beyond a reasonable doubt, Clark County District Attorney David Roger said.

"You may consider the case against Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons closed," he said.

Chrissy Mazzeo, 32, had accused Gibbons of pushing her against a wall and propositioning her near a restaurant where the two had been drinking with friends Oct. 13, less than a month before Gibbons was elected.

An apparently distraught and disoriented Mazzeo made three 911 calls that night, saying she had been assaulted by the congressman.

Gibbons, 61, has said he merely caught Mazzeo when she tripped in the parking garage.

Gibbons, a married five-term Republican congressman, beat Democrat Dina Titus in the Nov. 7 election. He is to be sworn in Monday.

Roger said prosecutors will investigate separate allegations made by Mazzeo and her lawyers that people associated with Gibbons tried to interfere with the investigation by influencing Mazzeo's testimony.

Roger would not identify the associates.

Investigators conducted interviews and reviewed video surveillance tapes from the garage before determining there was "no evidence to support the charge of battery," according to a police statement released this month.

Gibbons' spokesman, Brent Boynton, said the district attorney's decision was no surprise because Gibbons had done nothing inappropriate.

"He is pleased this matter is finally resolved and justice has been served," Boynton said.

DOJ_NMG_0109559

Mazzeo told The Associated Press Wednesday she did not believe justice was served.

"I actually even said that if he apologized to me, I would drop everything. And he wasn't man enough to actually apologize. But he knows the truth and I know the truth," she said.

Link Eyed In Fairfax Assault, Slayings (WT)

By Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

Fairfax County police are trying to determine whether the assault on a Springfield woman alone in her home on Christmas Eve is related to the unsolved killings of two women nearby.

"There's certainly a possibility of a linkage in the other cases," said Fairfax County police spokeswoman Officer Camille Neville, "but there's nothing at this time to confirm it."

Police said a man forced his way into a house near Frontier Drive on Sunday between 8 and 9:40 p.m. and assaulted a 62-year-old woman. Police have not disclosed the location of the house.

The woman, who was found by a relative, was hospitalized with a puncture wound to her arm and other injuries that were not life-threatening. Investigators interviewed the woman at Inova Fairfax Hospital. She described her attacker only as a man wearing white or gray clothing.

The assault occurred about a mile from houses where two women were killed in recent months.

Marion Newman, 74, was found dead inside her home in the 7100 block of Reservoir Road about 11:15 a.m. Nov. 21. A friend said she had missed a dinner appointment a day earlier.

Police found signs of a struggle but no forced entry.

At about 6:10 p.m. on Aug. 14, a friend found Marion Barbara Marshall, 72, slain inside her home two miles away in the 6600 block of Bostwick Drive.

Both women had been beaten to death.

"All it does is make people alert in the Springfield area," said Mrs. Marshall's neighbor, Logan Cotterall, 80.

Police would not say whether they have any evidence linking the killings, but investigators say the similarities of the crimes and the locations of the homes suggest the perpetrator was the same.

Investigators said the killer likely had close ties to the Crestwood and Edsall Park communities, where the women lived.

Police have not speculated on a motive.

Investigators are looking for a custom-made diamond ring they say Mrs. Newman was wearing when she was killed. The white gold band features a leaf design, and three diamonds are set side by side.

Investigators do not think robbery was the motive because valuable items were left untouched at the scenes of each of the killings.

Police have asked anyone with information about the ring or about anyone they think might be involved in the crime to call them at 703/691-2131 or Crime Solvers at 1-866/411-TIPS.

The families of Mrs. Marshall and Mrs. Newman have posted a $26,000 reward for information about the cases.

Inmate Suicides Linked To Solitary (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

The number of suicides in the nation's two largest state prison systems is ticking upward, and authorities in California and Texas are linking the increase to the rising number of inmates kept in solitary confinement.

In California, which has the largest state prison system with about 170,000 inmates, there have been 41 suicides this year, the most in at least six years and a 17% increase from 2005. Although an estimated 5% of California's inmates are housed in solitary confinement — also known as "administrative segregation" — 69% of last year's suicides occurred in units where inmates are isolated for 23 hours a day, according to state Department of Corrections records. About half the suicides this year were in such units.

In Texas' prison system, which has 169,000 inmates, there have been 24 suicides this year, up from 22 in 2005. Most of the inmates who killed themselves were in some form of solitary confinement, says John Moriarty, inspector general for the prison system.

Texas prisons also are reporting a 17% increase in attempted suicides: 652 so far this year, compared with 559 in 2005. The number of attempted suicides this year is the most in nearly a decade, according to state prison records. Statistics on attempted suicides in California prisons were not immediately available.

The figures from California and Texas are fueling a debate over whether solitary confinement is the best way to control or punish violent or dangerous inmates, particularly those who are mentally ill.

More than 70,000 of the 1.5 million inmates in state and federal prisons are kept in isolation, a reflection of get-tough policies designed to separate rival gang members and those who have gotten into fights while behind bars.

Isolated inmates typically have significant restrictions on visitors and get little help in dealing with the psychological problems that can be caused by isolation. They usually are allowed out of their cells for no more than an hour a day to exercise alone; their exposure to TV and reading material also is limited.

"Are we housing the mentally ill in prison facilities?" Moriarty asks. "I think the answer is yes. But I don't know if that's the best place for them to be."

Moriarty, whose office investigates every inmate death in Texas, says stress from isolation and increasing numbers of inmates with long sentences have contributed to the rise in suicides. "Length of sentence is a big factor. There is despair about not getting out."

The increase in inmate suicides in California has triggered recent changes in segregation units. In October, guards began checking inmates housed in solitary confinement every 30 minutes, rather than every hour, says Shama Chaiken, the state prison system's chief psychologist for mental health policy.

Some segregation cells also will be modified to remove shelving, vent openings and other features that offenders could use in hangings, the most common form of suicide in California prisons, Chaiken says. This month, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger announced a $1 billion plan that includes 10,000 new beds in prison medical and mental health units.

A few jurisdictions have credited expanded mental health programs with reducing prisoner suicides. After Kentucky set up a mental health program for those in the state's 83 county jails in 2004, suicides in the jails fell 47%, according to The (Louisville) Courier-Journal.

There have been 13 suicides this year in the 188,000-inmate federal prison system, the same total as in 2005. Florida, the third-largest state system with 90,000 inmates, has had nine prison suicides this year; it had eight last year.

On Way Out, D.C. Chief Gets Credit, Criticism (WP)

By Allison Klein And Cheryl W. Thompson

Charles H. Ramsey arrived in spring 1998 as the District's newly minted police chief with a mandate to cut spiraling crime, build stronger relations with the community and reform a department tainted by scandal.

Under his watch, crime has dropped, standards have become tighter and the public has received access to more public safety information than ever, due in part to a Web site that charts robberies, burglaries and other offenses by the block.

Ramsey, a career cop who got as much attention for his personality as his policies, leaves office today as the city's longest-serving chief in more than three decades. As a master of the sound bite, he often spouted off about crimes and railed about topics that were beyond his control, including irresponsible parents and failing schools.

His critics -- in the police union, on the D.C. Council and in some crime-ravaged neighborhoods -- view him as a showboat. In many parts of the city, residents say that they don't see enough officers on patrol and that crimes are not investigated quickly or thoroughly. Inside the agency, morale is low, with officers saying that Ramsey overworked them by declaring crime emergencies that took away days off and lasted for months.

"I think he gets an A for public relations, but for actual substance, I think he gets a D," said Ronald E. Hampton, executive director of the National Black Police Association and a former D.C. police officer who was a member of the citizens panel that interviewed Ramsey and two other finalists for the job.

But Michael A. Mason, executive assistant director of the FBI, said public relations is a "huge part" of the job. "What police do is the embodiment of public relations," said Mason, who once headed the FBI's Washington Field Office.

Ramsey, 56, was hired at a time when the city's government was emerging from financial chaos and being run by a federally appointed control board. He was chosen from among 51 candidates, and as chief, had the backing of the control board, then-Mayor Marion Barry (D) and the 13-member D.C. Council. They wanted Ramsey to restore the force's credibility.

"I think he's been a good chief overall," said Barry, now a Ward 8 council member. "And he's viewed very favorably by people in the community."

Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D), who succeeded Barry in 1999, was one of Ramsey's biggest supporters. But over time, the makeup of the council changed, and critics emerged. They included council member Adrian M. Fenty (D-Ward 4), who becomes mayor next week. Soon after Fenty was elected in November, he announced plans to replace Ramsey with Cathy L. Lanier, a veteran D.C. commander and Ramsey protege.

Fenty said he wants to make the 3,800-member force nimble enough to respond to specific neighborhood concerns -- the everyday problems that he heard about in two years on the campaign trail. Fenty said he thinks that Lanier, 39, will bring new vigor and ideas to the force.

Ramsey had a similar charge when he was brought to Washington from the Chicago police department, where he was a deputy superintendent. He inherited a force that had been in near-constant turmoil under former chief Larry D. Soulsby, who resigned after his roommate, a D.C. police lieutenant, was arrested in a corruption probe.

Fewer than half of the city's officers were assigned to street patrols at a time when crime was escalating. The department was still paying the price for rushing officers through screening and training in a hiring push in 1989 and 1990; numerous officers from those classes were indicted or accused of departmental misconduct. The force's technology and equipment were so antiquated that many offices had rotary phones.

Being the first outside chief in a department that had always chosen its leader from among its ranks, Ramsey had to win over the command staff and officers and find out whom he could trust.

He needed to cut wasteful spending, improve recordkeeping and remove deadwood personnel. There were crime troubles in many neighborhoods, including east of the Anacostia River. Almost half of the force had not been recertified in several years with the firearms that the department had issued them.

And the U.S. attorney's office, a special D.C. Council committee and the city's inspector general were pursuing various investigations into corruption, misconduct and mismanagement. Ramsey described the department as "dysfunctional" and said it could take 15 years to fix.

"The department was in disarray," said D.C. Council member Jack Evans (D-Ward 2), who was chairman of the Judiciary Committee when Ramsey was hired. "He was brought in to reorganize."

Within months, Ramsey began that overhaul. He promoted, demoted and ousted officers and moved 400 detectives and officers in specialized units to the seven police districts. He increased spending for training and brought in more than a dozen top-level civilians, many from Chicago. He tightened policies on deadly force and other issues.

Officials have praised Ramsey for reducing crime in many neighborhoods and for keeping up the progress even after resources were tested after the 2001 terrorist attacks. Between 1998 and 2005, the number of major crimes, including homicides, rapes and robberies, dropped by about 29 percent in the city. As of yesterday, the city has had 165 homicides this year, compared with 195 for the same period in 2005. The highest number of homicides in one year -- 482 -- occurred in 1991.

"Look at the crime numbers," Ramsey said recently. "How do you think it gets there?"

Officer Kristopher Baumann, chairman of the D.C. police union, said economic development -- not Ramsey -- caused drops in crime in some neighborhoods. Although killings have dipped in gentrifying areas such as Capitol Hill and Shaw in Northwest Washington, they remain high in some communities east of the Anacostia.

Many residents say that the department too often lurches from crisis to crisis and that patrols pick up after a well-publicized crime, only to fall off within a matter of weeks.

"Sadly, we haven't seen an increased visibility in the neighborhood," said Shaw activist Alex Padro, who hoped police presence would pick up after another community activist, Chris Crowder, was slain in the area in July. "Ramsey, throughout his tenure, was very reactionary and not proactive."

The lack of officers on the street can be blamed partly on sickness or injury, officials said. About 4 percent of officers were unavailable for full duty this month because of illness or injury, police officials said.

Dorothy Brizill, executive director of D.C. Watch, a government watchdog group and a frequent critic of the police department, credited Ramsey with changing perceptions and "taking away the taint of corruption."

"I think you'd have to say he made a difference in this city," Brizill said.

Ramsey acknowledged that he had his share of critics, including some in the city government. "I've been in the water with a few sharks," he said. "The key is not to taste too good so they don't want to come back. One thing you don't need to be is weak."

In an interview, the chief fired back at the union's complaints, especially those about his declarations of "crime emergencies," moves that enabled him to more easily change officers' schedules and shifts.

"Nobody can tell you I've asked them to do anything that's not consistent with being a police officer," he said. "Some of what the job entails is sacrifice. You have to be psychologically tough to do this job."

Chuck Wexler, head of the Police Executive Research Forum, said Ramsey transformed the performance and perception of the department. "It is a world-class department," Wexler said. "It has to do with the advances Ramsey has brought to the department."

But council member Kathy Patterson (D-Ward 3) assessed the chief's overall performance as "very mixed." The two clashed over many issues, including the police department's handling of a demonstration in 2002 against the World Bank and International Monetary Fund. The city settled lawsuits stemming from the arrests, which had been ordered without warning, of 400 protesters and bystanders at Pershing Park.

"I think he did a good job of building resources for the department in terms of capital improvement and federal funding for equipment following 9/11," said Patterson, who headed the council's Judiciary Committee from 2001 until 2005.

Ramsey, who served about twice as long as the average big-city chief, has not decided what he'll do next. But he said that he and his wife, Sylvia, want to stay in Washington and that he is not likely to lead another local department. He has worked seven days a week, has no hobbies other than fighting crime and took just two vacations while chief.

He wants to be remembered as a leader who took the job seriously and made a difference.

"It has been an honor, and it will be truly difficult to walk away," Ramsey said, a sad smile growing on his face. "Truly difficult."

Ramsey 'Proud' Of Work On Force (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

Chief Charles H. Ramsey says that he will leave the Metropolitan Police Department next week after eight years and eight months on the job confident that he has done what he was hired to do.

"When other agencies look at the Metropolitan Police Department, it's a respected organization," he said. "That's what I'm most proud of."

Chief Ramsey, 56, will step down Tuesday, the day Adrian M. Fenty is sworn in as mayor.

The District's only police chief to be hired from outside the city, Chief Ramsey reflected on his accomplishments during an interview last week in his office, which by then had been stripped of the mementos accumulated during a 38-year career in law enforcement.

"Quite frankly, I think patriotism drew me to this job more than anything," said Chief Ramsey, who came from the Chicago Police Department. "A police department in the nation's capital shouldn't have been going through what this department was going through."

Upon his arrival in 1998, the Metropolitan Police Department was mired in mismanagement and scandal. Top officials were under criminal investigation, poor recruiting and standards gave rise to second-rate officers, technology and information systems were substandard, facilities were crumbling, and officers were driving around in 10-year-old squad cars with used tires bought from the U.S. Park Police.

"I didn't realize we had as many issues as we had," he said.

Chief Ramsey helped secure $100 million in federal funding to rebuild the department's infrastructure. He upgraded radios, started a mounted unit, equipped a bicycle unit, instituted uniform training standards, and restarted an aviation unit that had been shut down in 1996 and had its helicopters sold because of a budget shortfall.

On September 11, 2001, the department opened its $7 million Joint Operations Command Center a week early to coordinate operations among local and federal agencies. The command center is where Chief Ramsey meets daily with his senior staff to review crime trends and plot enforcement strategies.

The department's budget has also swelled from $272 million in fiscal 1998 to $377 million this year.

He said it took two years on the job before he began to think that the department was turning the corner.

"The first time I really felt positive about the department and where we were going was April 2000 when we handled the [International Monetary Fund/World Bank] protests," he said. "When all was said and done, all the meetings went off as scheduled, we got the delegates to and from the meetings safely, and protesters were able to come and have their voices heard."

The meetings drew 10,000 protesters to the District. Similar protests in Seattle had turned violent in 1999, resulting in more than 580 arrests and about $10 million worth of property damage.

The national reputation the police department earned during that event was tarnished in March 2002 after Chief Ramsey ordered the arrest of several hundred protesters in Pershing Park in Northwest. The anti-IMF protesters, who said they were given no verbal warning to disperse, were demonstrating without a permit, and several journalists and passers-by were swept up in the arrests.

"We should have done a better job following our procedures," Chief Ramsey said.

Critics, including Mr. Fenty, complained that police were not visible and said that the chief had not put enough officers on the streets. But every category of crime dropped during Chief Ramsey's tenure. Most notably, the number of homicides tumbled from 301 in 1997, the last full year before Chief Ramsey took over, to 165 so far this year.

Many officers within the department complain that Chief Ramsey limited their effectiveness when he invited the Department of Justice to investigate the department's use-of-force policies in 1999 and entered into a memorandum of understanding governing the use and display of force in 2001.

Chief Ramsey said he knows those decisions were "not popular" but he said the department had lost the public trust and only an outside investigation could restore it.

He said that he understands the adrenaline that drives an officer whose life is on the line, but he questioned the usefulness of tactics such as shooting at oncoming vehicles.

"They want to get the bad guys so badly they don't always react in a way that keeps them safe," he said.

During his tenure, Chief Ramsey implemented training exercises that emphasize good judgment. In addition to passing twice-yearly firearms-proficiency tests, officers also must train in simulated situations in which firing a weapon is frequently not the correct option.

Asked about his regrets, he goes back to the unsolved March 2005 daylight shooting of a 9-year old boy playing in front of his home in Columbia Heights.

"My biggest regret is the Donte Manning case. For some reason, that case haunts me."

The chief said that he hopes to stay in the District and that he could work as a consultant or in homeland security, but he doesn't think he will be a police chief again any time soon.

"I'm not interested in running another department right now," he said. "I had my shot at running a department. Now it's time to start a new chapter."

He said a political run is unlikely, but he wouldn't rule out the possibility five or 10 years down the road.

As for his successor, Cmdr. Cathy L. Lanier, a 16-year veteran of the department, Chief Ramsey advises her to "stay focused on crime fighting."

"Don't let a lot of other things distract you, because when all is said and done, you're going to be judged on how well you control crime," he said. "For every dot on a crime map, that's a person whose life has been forever changed. Stay focused on that."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Tosses $6.5M Jury Award To Ex-cop (AP)

AP, December 28, 2006

CHICAGO - A federal judge has thrown out a jury award of more than $6.5 million to a former policeman who claimed two FBI agents framed him for murder and kidnapping.

Steven Manning spent 14 years in prison - eight on death row - before the charges were dropped.

In a civil lawsuit against FBI agents Robert Buchan and Gary Miller, he claimed the agents framed him for the crimes after he tried to stop working as an FBI informant.

A jury last year awarded him $6,581,000 in damages in that case. Manning was 54 at the time.

Since then, Manning has lost a separate civil lawsuit he had filed against the federal government on the same allegations.

In a ruling released Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Matthew Kennelly cited Manning's failure to win that second lawsuit as the reason for vacating the jury's award for damages. Kennelly concluded the decision against Manning nullified the earlier jury decision in his favor.

"Manning made his choice" in pursuing two suits, the judge wrote, and "he cannot now avoid the consequences of that choice."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Haile, who represented Buchan and Miller, said the FBI was pleased with the decision.

Government attorneys long have claimed the agents acted in good faith in investigating Manning.

Manning's attorney said he plans to appeal.

"A jury spent a month listening to the evidence and concluded the FBI had framed Manning," Jon Loevy said. "A court shouldn't be so free to just override a jury verdict."

Manning had left the Chicago police force and was working as a limousine driver and security guard when he was arrested.

He was convicted in 1992 of taking part in the 1984 kidnapping of two reputed Kansas City drug traffickers and was sentenced to two life terms plus 100 years. The next year, he was convicted of the 1990 murder of suburban Chicago trucking company owner Jimmy Pellegrino and was sentenced to death.

Miller and Buchan investigated the Illinois case, and Buchan investigated the Missouri case.

The murder conviction was reversed and the case dropped in 2000 after the Illinois Supreme Court ruled that prosecutors used improper evidence.

The Missouri charges were also dropped after a federal appeals court ruled that Manning's lawyer had been ineffective and the FBI improperly used Manning's girlfriend as a government agent.

Miller has retired from the FBI. Buchan was still working for the bureau.

Agencies Investigating Abuse Claims At Pearl River County Jail (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, December 28, 2006

PICAYUNE, Miss. - The FBI and the Mississippi Bureau of Investigation are looking into allegations of prisoner abuse in the Pearl River County jail.

DOJ_NMG_0109565

At least six inmates filed statements with Hancock County judges and as many as 10 or 11 told of beatings while making court appearances.

They said they were beaten by jailers, attacked by other prisoners as corrections officers stood by, and they received slow medical treatment, among other complaints, a pair of Hancock County judges said.

The prisoners are being held at the Pearl River jail because the Hancock County facility was damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

Pearl River County Sheriff Joe Stuart confirmed the reports of abuse and the investigation.

Hancock County Justice Court Judge Tommy Carver said he heard four reports of abuse in a single day shortly after the inmates began stays in Pearl River County. The complaints prompted Stuart and fellow Hancock County Judge Ricky Adams to ask the prisoners to make formal statements to forward to the Hancock County Sheriff's Department.

Some refused out of fear of reprisals when they returned to Pearl River County.

One inmate showed Carver a broken tooth he said he received during a beating.

"It's obvious something is going on," Carver said. "I just hope they check and see what's going on and correct the situation."

Carver said the statements tell of the use of Tasers in attacks and other physical abuse. They included the names of offending corrections officers.

Kenny Hurt, Hancock County Sheriff's investigator, forwarded the complaints to the MBI after receiving them from the judges. He said he has seen two or three inmates with bruises or wounds on their faces who claimed they were abused at the Pearl River jail.

Hancock County pays Pearl River $30 a day to hold each prisoner. The county's Board of Supervisors has not decided what to do with its damaged jail.

"If they are getting mistreated, I think something needs to be done," Hurt said. "We're paying $30 a day for these prisoners. They don't need to be mistreated."

In addition to the claims by prisoners, Stuart said residents of both counties have come to him with complaints, which he forwarded to the FBI to avoid the appearance of a conflict of interest.

"I have no problems with being investigated," Stuart said.

He said some corrections officers resigned after learning of the investigation and noted high turnover at the jail in the last 18 months. Some were let go because of disciplinary problems, though none were accused of abuse.

Stuart said his department has provided investigators with all material requested, including video footage, audio recordings and documents.

Activists Want Civilian Review Of Atlanta-area Police After Killings Of 13 People This Year (AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Associated Press

AP, December 28, 2006

ATLANTA – Community activists on Wednesday called for the creation of civilian review boards to investigate police misconduct complaints, citing the fatal shooting of an elderly woman by Atlanta police and the killings of 12 other people by suburban DeKalb County officers this year.

“The police, no matter how difficult their job, are not exempt from community scrutiny,” said the Rev. Joseph Lowery, co-founder of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and chairman of the Coalition for The People's Agenda.

Lowery was joined by close to a dozen other activists. He said that the civilian review boards should have subpoena power and that Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin had told him she was not opposed to the idea.

A spokeswoman for Franklin did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

DeKalb County Chief Executive Vernon Jones said he would take Lowery's suggestion under advisement.

“I respect Dr. Lowery for his experience and commitment to empower the quality of our lives,” Jones said.

The district attorney's office is already investigating the 12 lethal shootings by the DeKalb County Police Department. In addition, the Justice Department is “gathering information” about the shootings, according to a letter from the agency to a community activist.

The call for the review boards comes in the wake of the Nov. 21 fatal shooting of Kathryn Johnston by Atlanta police during a raid in search of a drug suspect. Police say Johnston fired at them first, wounding three officers, and they shot back. Family members said Johnston was 92; a medical examiner said she was 88.

Johnston's death is being investigated by local agencies and the FBI.

Atlanta Police Review Sought (LAT)

By Jenny Jarvie, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

In the city and suburban DeKalb County, a string of killings leads to calls for civilian boards with subpoena power.

ATLANTA — A string of fatal police shootings in the Atlanta area prompted civil rights activists Wednesday to urge the city of Atlanta and the neighboring suburb of DeKalb County to establish powerful civilian review boards to investigate complaints of police misconduct.

The Rev. Joseph Lowery, convener of the Coalition for the Peoples' Agenda and co-founder of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, said the review boards should have a professional staff and the power to subpoena.

"The police should be absolutely accountable to the citizens for whom they work," Lowery said.

Public confidence in police departments in both jurisdictions has been shaken in recent months.

In November, Atlanta police shot and killed an 88-year-old woman, Kathryn Johnston, during a drug raid on her northwest Atlanta home.

In the last year, DeKalb officers have shot and killed 12 suspects — nearly all were black men.

A civilian review board, Lowery said, was vital in restoring trust in local law enforcement.

Atlanta already has a Civilian Review Board that examines allegations of excessive force, serious bodily injury or death resulting from the action of police officers. But the board, formed in 1996, has not reviewed a case since 2002. It has no subpoena power and requires citizens to file a complaint and waive their right to sue.

Beverly Isom, spokeswoman for Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin, said the mayor would consider Lowery's proposal.

In DeKalb County, police internal affairs units investigate all shootings involving law enforcement and then decide whether to hand them over to the county's district attorney's office.

The county's chief executive, Vernon Jones, issued a brief statement Wednesday saying he would also consider creating a citizen review board: "I respect Dr. Lowery for his experience and commitment to empower the quality of our lives," he said.

A number local and federal organizations are examining the recent shootings. In Atlanta, the FBI is already investigating the shooting of Johnston. In DeKalb, the district attorney's office is investigating the 12 lethal shootings by police officers.

The Justice Department, along with the FBI, is also gathering information about the case, but has yet to open a federal investigation. According to the National Assn. for Civilian Oversight of Law Enforcement, 71 of the nation's 100 largest cities have citizen review mechanisms.

Richard Rosenthal, who serves as an independent monitor of police and sheriff's departments in Denver, said even more important than subpoena power is that the review board have unfettered access to police department records.

"You can issue a subpoena to interview an officer, but you can't make them talk," he said.

Court Can't Force Gay Marriage Vote (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jay Lindsay, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

(AP) - BOSTON-Massachusetts' highest court said Wednesday it has no authority to force lawmakers to vote on a proposed constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage. But it rebuked the Legislature for its "indifference to, or defiance of, its constitutional duties."

The unanimous 7-0 ruling - and the stinging reproach - leave the fate of the amendment up in the air in the only state that allows gay marriage.

Opponents of gay marriage have collected 170,000 signatures in favor of an amendment to end the practice. But the measure needs the Legislature's approval to appear on the 2008 ballot, and lawmakers refused to vote on the proposal last month. Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican expected to run for president in 2008, and other opponents of gay marriage responded by suing to try to force the lawmakers to act.

In its ruling, the Supreme Judicial Court - the same court that ruled in 2003 that the Massachusetts Constitution gives gays the right to marry - said it cannot force a vote. It said that the Legislature's obligation to vote was "beyond serious debate," but that the most the court could do was remind lawmakers of that duty.

"There is no presently articulated judicial remedy for the Legislature's indifference to, or defiance of, its constitutional duties," the court said.

The proposed amendment needs the approval of lawmakers in two consecutive two-year sessions to appear on the 2008 ballot. The last day of the current session is Tuesday. If lawmakers adjourn without taking up the amendment, the measure will die.

In a statement, the governor said: "The issue is now whether the Legislature will follow the law."

The proposed amendment defines marriage as the union of a man and a woman. It would leave all existing same-sex marriages intact but would ban any more such weddings. More than 8,000 gay couples have been married in Massachusetts.

Opponents of gay marriage argue that it should be up to the people, not the courts, to define something as important as marriage. Supporters of gay marriage say the civil rights of a minority should not be put to a popular vote.

Marc Solomon of MassEquality, a gay rights group, said after Wednesday's ruling: "We urge the Legislature to end this debate once and for all and let committed couples and their families get on with their lives."

One of the gay-marriage opponents who sued to try to force the Legislature to vote, C.J. Doyle of the Catholic Action League, said he doubts lawmakers will act, despite the court's rebuke.

"Our legislators have demonstrated time and time again a contempt for the constitution and for their oath of office," Doyle said.

Massachusetts Court Admonishes Lawmakers Over Gay Marriage (LAT)

By Ellen Barry

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

Massachusetts' highest court on Wednesday chastised the state's legislators for failing to vote on a proposed constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage, but said the court does not have the power to force lawmakers to act.

Opponents of gay marriage are seeking to override the 2003 court decision that made same-sex unions legal in Massachusetts. They collected 170,000 signatures -- enough to place the question before voters in 2008 -- but the legislature already has met twice without voting on the measure.

If the lawmakers adjourn Jan. 2 without a vote, as many predict they will, the measure to repeal gay marriage in Massachusetts will die. To appear on the ballot, a citizen initiative must be approved by at least a quarter of the legislature in two consecutive sessions.

Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican who is contemplating a run for the presidency, has been critical of the lawmakers' inaction. Romney was a lead plaintiff in the suit brought by opponents of gay marriage, which argued that lawmakers were stripping voters of their right to amend the state constitution.

The Supreme Judicial Court's unanimous ruling Wednesday agreed with the core of that argument, but it noted that "there is no presently articulated judicial remedy for the Legislature's indifference to, or defiance of, its constitutional duties.

"Those members who seek to avoid their lawful obligations . . . ultimately will have to answer to the people who elected them," read the decision, which was written by Justice John M. Greaney.

The court's 2003 ruling that legalized gay marriage sparked a national debate. But three years later, Massachusetts is still the only state to allow it. Three states -- Connecticut, Vermont and New Jersey -- allow same-sex couples to enter into civil unions, and California's domestic partnership law guarantees many rights of marriage. Maine, Hawaii and the District of Columbia also offer domestic partnerships.

Meanwhile, 26 states have passed constitutional amendments banning gay marriage.

This would not be the first citizen initiative to wither on the vine in Massachusetts; legislators have adjourned without voting on six out of the last seven proposed ballot questions -- on such issues as abortion, term limits and education.

Lawmakers voted 109-87 Nov. 9 to end debate and delay the vote on the gay marriage amendment, virtually guaranteeing its demise. Many spoke passionately before the vote to delay, such as state Sen. Edward Augustus, who said: "This amendment is about the past. It is about fear and intolerance." Advocates of gay marriage celebrated.

"They have refused to be bullied or intimidated, and we fully expect them to keep standing up for what's right," Lee Swislow, executive director of Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, said in a statement during arguments in the case. "It is simply wrong to put the rights of a minority up for a popular vote. That's what this is about."

The ruling came with just one business day remaining before the end of the legislative session. Eric Fehrnstrom, a spokesman for Romney, said the governor hopes the sharply worded decision "changes the math at the Statehouse." But, Fehrnstrom said, Romney "doesn't have a formal role to play" in this matter.

"He is a bystander. Just like any other citizen of the Commonwealth, he has an interest in making sure that the legislature does its job," he said.

Deputy In Gibson Arrest Claims Harassment (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

Six months after he arrested Mel Gibson for drunk driving in Malibu, a Los Angeles County Sheriff's deputy claims he's being harassed for his action by officials who question whether he leaked a report detailing the actor's anti-Semitic rant to the news media.

Deputy James Mee's attorney said Wednesday his client was abruptly transferred from patrolling Malibu to another assignment in Agoura Hills and unfairly singled out for scrutiny by his supervisors.

Attorney Richard Shinee also said sheriff's officials subjected him to a three-hour-long interrogation and served a search warrant on his home last September, taking a home computer and phone records.

"His life and career would be a lot different had he not made that arrest," Shinee told The Times.

The Sheriff's Department has already come under fire for initially telling reporters that Gibson was arrested "without incident" even though Mee's arrest report said the actor/director was belligerent, profane and unleashed a "barrage of anti-Semitic remarks."

Mee's report was leaked to TMZ.com, a celebrity news website.

Neal Tyler, the division chief who oversees the Sheriff's Department's Lost Hills station, where Gibson was booked, said he knew of no problems with Mee's treatment and said the deputy is in no way being singled out.

"I disagree with the assessment that personnel in the department or at the station have been relating to him or supervising him in an unfair manner," Tyler said.

He declined to discuss Mee's specific complaints, citing confidentiality rules.

In the wake of Gibson's arrest, the Sheriff's Department launched two investigations. One looked at whether the actor received preferential treatment, the other trying to determine who leaked the Mee's report to TMZ.com.

Tyler said a preliminary investigation into the issue of favoritism found "no evidence that anyone improperly influenced the investigation or prosecution of Mel Gibson's drunk driving arrest."

Sheriff's department sources said the probe into who leaked the report - an act that would likely violent department rules - is ongoing.

Shinee said that a few days after Gibson's July 29 arrest, sheriff investigators pressed Mee on why he chose to detail Gibson's inflammatory comments in his report.

He was also told to recount the precise sequence of events surrounding the writing and handling of the report and any discussions or contacts he had with others.

"Clearly the focus of the investigation was the leak and not whether there were any communications between department brass concerning suppression of the report," Shinee said. "My client has denied he gave the report to anyone."

Later, according to the attorney, Sheriff's officials told Mee that they were temporarily transferring him from his drunk driving patrol detail in Malibu to a similar job based at the Lost Hills station out of concern that paparazzi would try to bait him into creating an incident.

Not long after, five sheriff's deputies showed up at Mee's home where they removed his computer and took phone records, Shinee said.

Mee declined to discuss his concerns. But Shinee said the deputy also feels he's being unfair treated by supervisors. In August, Shinee said his client was written up by a sergeant for failing to report to work despite the fact that another supervisor had changed his schedule. Earlier this month, Shinee said the same sergeant called him in from a field assignment to answer why he didn't check a box on a vehicle inspection report.

Tyler declined to comment on these specific incidents.

ANTITRUST:

New Jersey Orders Municipal Bond Firms To Disclose Subpoenas (BLOOM)

By Adam L. Cataldo

Bloomberg, December 28, 2006

Dec. 27 (Bloomberg) -- New Jersey is demanding that financial firms seeking state business disclose whether they have been subpoenaed or audited by the government.

Treasury officials told firms applying to work for the state by investing proceeds from a planned bond sale to describe pending litigation and ``federal or state investigations or audits, subpoenas or other information requests" since 2002, according to a Dec. 18 request for proposals. Similar documents in September and November didn't mention subpoenas or audits.

The requirement comes one month after federal investigators raided three brokers in the widest-ever criminal probe of the municipal bond market. The Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Internal Revenue Service are probing whether bankers and brokers conspired to fix prices on financial products sold to local governments when they invested proceeds from bond sales.

``It sounds like good due diligence to me," said Clifford Goldman who was state treasurer from 1976 to 1982. He now runs Goldman, Beale Associates, a Titusville, New Jersey-based firm that advises municipalities on bond financings.

Investigators last month demanded information from more than a dozen banks and insurers and raided the brokers as part of the probe, including CDR Financial Products Inc., New Jersey's adviser on interest-rate swaps. Earlier this month, the SEC asked officials in Jefferson County, Alabama, for records related to bond issues and derivatives since January 2002.

No Subpoenas

Tom Vincz, a spokesman for New Jersey treasurer Bradley Abelow, said the state hasn't received any subpoenas in connection with the probe.

``Issuers should be even more circumspect about who we do business with," said Patrick Born, the chief financial officer of Minneapolis and the head of the debt committee FOR the Chicago-based Government Finance Officers Association. ``The municipal market is such a valuable and important resource for state and local governments in the U.S. that we simply cannot tolerate abuses."

New Jersey needs a firm to help invest funds from a planned sale of bonds backed by revenue from a settlement with cigarette makers because it won't spend all the money immediately.

A group of treasury and public finance employees will review responses from firms, Vincz said. Six firms responded to the state's request for proposals, according to treasury spokesman Mark Perkiss. The responses won't be available to the public until after a selection has been made.

`Evolving, Improving'

The size of the bond sale, to be arranged by New York-based Bear Stearns Cos., wasn't specified in the request for proposals. The state is rated Aa3 by Moody's Investors Service and AA by Standard & Poor's.

Vincz said the language change in the request for proposals is an ``evolving, improving practice" and not a response to the federal probe.

New Jersey last sought proposals from financial firms in November, when it was looking to hire an adviser on the bond sale being underwritten by Bear Stearns.

The request asked ``if your firm, or any principal, director or officer thereof, is now or has in the last three years been a defendant in any litigation involving a sum of $100,000 or more, the subject of any professional disciplinary action, and/or is or has been the subject of any investigation." It doesn't ask whether a firm has been subpoenaed or otherwise asked for information by the government, or if it has been the subject of an audit.

``The experience of public finance in reviewing responses to questions of this kind has been that sometimes there is a lack of clarity and completeness in the responses," Vincz said.

Abelow and Nancy Feldman, New Jersey's director of public finance, declined to comment.

Named by Corzine

Governor Jon Corzine, the former chairman of New York-based Goldman, Sachs & Co., named Abelow and Feldman to their posts earlier this year after he took office. Both also worked at Goldman. Corzine, a Democrat, has vowed to use his Wall Street experience to shore up the state's finances and reduce its record $30 billion debt load.

The Government Finance Officers Association recommends governments seek competitive bids when hiring advisers and that they find out whether firms have any history of having been the subject of enforcement actions.

Swaps Contract

New Jersey is seeking a new swap adviser to take over next month after Beverly Hills, California-based CDR's contract ends.

A swap is a type of derivative, or financial contract whose value is derived from stocks, bonds, loans, currencies and commodities, or linked to specific events such as changes in interest rates or the weather. In a swap, parties agree to exchange interest payments, usually a fixed payment for one that varies based on the movements of benchmark indexes or rates used by banks to track borrowing rates. Swaps are private contracts and are unregulated.

Vincz wouldn't say whether CDR applied to renew its contract and said a date to pick a new swap adviser hasn't been set. CDR spokesman Allan Ripp declined to comment on whether the firm has responded to any requests for proposals from New Jersey.

Peter Shapiro, managing director of South Orange, New Jersey-based Swap Financial Group, said governments like New Jersey make it too easy for firms not to disclose potential liabilities. Shapiro, a former New Jersey assemblyman who advises municipal governments on finances, didn't bid for the reinvestment contract and applied to become the state's next swap adviser.

``If you, as the governing agency, want to find out everything, you have to make sure you ask for everything," Shapiro said.

FTC Clears Freeport Takeover Of Phelps (AP)

The Federal Trade Commission approved the $25.9 billion takeover of copper miner Phelps Dodge Corp. by Freeport-McMoran Copper & Gold, according to a notice posted Tuesday on the agency's Web site.

FTC clearance removes at least one obstacle to the proposed combination, which would create the world's largest copper miner. The deal still needs shareholder approval, and there is no certainty the companies will get it.

Earlier this month, a hedge fund with a 5.1 percent stake in Phelps Dodge said it would throw the weight of its 10.3 million shares against the takeover. SAC Capital Partners opposes the combination, saying that the cash-and-stock offer doesn't fairly value Phelps Dodge.

Since the deal was first announced in late November, Prudential analyst John C. Tumazos has said he expected to see additional bids emerge for Phelps Dodge. But that was when copper was trading at about $3.05 a pound on the spot market.

The price has since fallen to about $2.85 per pound -- down 18 cents from the date the companies decided to combine and down 67 cents from the third-quarter average.

"We estimate the odds of a higher bid drop about 1 percent with each penny that copper falls," Tumazos wrote in a recent note to clients.

The FTC granted early termination of a mandatory antitrust waiting period on Dec. 22.

Up For Review: 401(k) Industry (WSJ)

By Tom Lauricella

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Americans' 401(k) retirement plans are starting to face scrutiny -- of a kind that previously helped to reshape the mutual-fund business and many practices on Wall Street.

In recent months, a series of lawsuits has raised questions that longstanding business practices in the industry may represent illegal forms of collusion. In the past few weeks, Congressional Democrats -- after winning the majority in November for the first time in years -- are calling for hearings into whether current laws do enough to protect 401(k) investors. A November report by the Congressional Government Accountability Office said some practices "may not be in the best interest" of investors.

At the same time, the summer's landmark pension-reform law is encouraging employers to take a more active and even paternal role in their employees' 401(k) plans by offering in-depth investment advice and other tools designed to encourage people to save. Previously, companies were discouraged from taking these steps for fear of being sued should the investments go wrong.

As a result of these forces, 401(k) plans could receive their most significant overhaul since coming into existence a quarter-century ago. Fees to investors could be reduced, and companies could be forced to do a better job ensuring investors receive the most bang for their retirement dollar.

Since being created in 1981 as a way to sock away dollars tax-free for retirement, 401(k)s have supplanted traditional pension funds as the primary way most Americans save for retirement. Some 47 million participants have $2 trillion in money invested in the plans.

Critics increasingly are complaining about poorly disclosed financial arrangements -- known as "pay-to-play" deals -- that not only have the potential to influence which investment options are offered in a given plan, but also have the potential to drive up fees charged to investors.

The pressure for change is occurring at every level of a complex industry: Employers have a legal obligation to run a plan in the best interest of its participants. The money manager has responsibility for the investments, but other companies might have a separate role in keeping investor records and holding the actual securities being bought and sold in the plan. On top of that, sometimes there are outside brokers or consultants paid to help decide which investments go into a plan.

That complexity can breed problems, experts say. "Unfortunately there are [employer] fiduciaries who fell asleep at the switch; there are brokers who will charge excessively high fees; ... and there are plan providers who support all this," says Fred Reish, a Los Angeles attorney specializing in retirement-plan law. "This is all one big ball of wax."

The most direct attack on 401(k) plans -- and similar retirement plans for government employees and teachers called 457 plans and 403(b) plans -- has come in the courts. Several lawsuits allege that commonplace business arrangements between some of the parties are actually illegal.

For example, some mutual-fund companies that run retirement plans will take a portion of the money they collect from investors and use it to pay consultants, who, in turn, recommend which funds are included in a retirement plan. Because some consultants recommend only those fund companies that make such payments, these deals have been dubbed pay-to-play arrangements.

Critics say it can result in participants being offered subpar investments or worse. In November, a lawsuit was filed against Nationwide Financial Services Inc. on behalf of participants in the retirement plan it runs for the Orange County, Fla., sheriff's office. The suit, filed in U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Ohio, alleges that unbeknownst to the plan's investors, money from some of these arrangements paid for meals, trips and entertainment.

Nationwide denies the allegations and says it will fight the suit.

A second common practice alleged to be improper is that big 401(k) plans often will use the same class of mutual-fund shares that small, individual investors use -- even though lower-fee classes of those shares are often available to big investors like these. In addition, certain fees (such as those for record-keeping) are assessed as a flat percentage of assets, which means as an investor's savings grow, more money is being collected from them even though no additional services are provided.

The most recent such suit was filed this month against Fidelity Investments, the nation's largest retirement-plan manager. The case, filed in U.S. District Court in the Western District of Wisconsin, argued that Fidelity charged "unreasonable and excessive" fees and had hidden arrangements that misused participants' money.

Fidelity says that it will fight the lawsuit and that fees its charges are reasonable.

In mid-September, a St. Louis law firm, Schlichter Bogard & Denton LLP, which specializes mainly in personal-injury cases, kicked off the recent spate of suits when it filed in federal court a series of cases (including the Fidelity suit) alleging that the 401(k) retirement plans of some of the country's biggest employers misled and overcharged investors.

Jerome Schlichter, the lawyer overseeing these cases, argues that employers and the companies that run 401(k) plans are failing to live up to a basic legal responsibility: ensuring that their fees are reasonable. "The fees are not being disclosed, and if you don't know what fees are being charged, you can't know if the fees are reasonable."

Meanwhile, Democrats in Congress, armed with the Government Accountability Office study, are looking at revisiting laws governing oversight of the plans. While the scope of the hearings hasn't been decided -- much less what any outcome might potentially be -- the stepped-up interest by politicians is further stirring the pot.

The GAO, in a recent report commissioned by George Miller (D., Calif.) said current rules result in "piecemeal" disclosure and that investors aren't given information that would help them determine whether they were getting a good deal. The GAO also warned against some of the same practices targeted by the lawsuits, saying they may hide conflicts of interest.

The GAO also said the Labor Department, which is responsible for regulating 401(k) plans, hasn't been collecting the kind of information on the plans that it needs to do the job.

Not all changes may come at the barrel of a gun. Laws passed by Congress this summer make it easier for employers to automatically enroll workers in 401(k) plans, increase their savings rates and automatically place them in appropriate stock- and bond-fund investments. These new laws lessen the risk to employers for taking these steps on a worker's behalf.

That is a big change from a few years ago. "It used to be that employers would say, 'We have this 401(k) plan with a great matching program -- now you guys go manage this on your own,'" says Terri Fox, who oversees the 401(k) plan at Texas Instruments. "The pendulum has swung."

Regulator Nudges Enel On Megawatt Sales (AP)

Italy Antitrust Watchdog Says Enel Must Sell Up to 1,700 Megawatts by End of 2008

ROME (AP) -- Italy's antitrust watchdog said Wednesday that Enel SpA must sell 1,000 megawatts of capacity next year, and if necessary 700 more megawatts in 2008 to promote competition in the country's power market.

The regulator said in a statement that the sale will be at "competitive conditions," at which point the antitrust body will close its inquiry, started in April 2005, into possible anticompetitive behavior by Enel, Italy's former electricity monopoly.

The regulator said Enel will sell the capacity under a mechanism that allows a company to keep ownership of generation facilities while selling its output to competitors.

One-thousand megawatts correspond to about 3 percent of Italy's domestic power demand, the regulator said.

Polar Bears Face Meltdown (USAT)

By Robert Davis

DOJ_NMG_0109573

The fight against global warming got an iconic mascot Wednesday when the Bush administration proposed listing polar bears as a "threatened" species.

Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne says polar bears appear to be dying because their habitat — ice in the Arctic Ocean — is melting.

"Polar bears are one of nature's ultimate survivors," Kempthorne says. But their "habitat may literally be melting."

Some environmentalists hope that the "threatened" designation, which could come within a year after public comments and more scientific review, could give a boost to the fight against global warming.

The Endangered Species Act puts the responsibility on the federal government to avoid authorizing any activities that might jeopardize an endangered species or the habitat where it lives.

Industries that pollute a river, for example, that is home to an endangered fish can be forced to stop.

But how effectively the designation might be used to regulate industries that produce high levels of so-called greenhouse gases — pollutants that contribute to global warming — is unclear.

Kempthorne says climate change is "outside the bounds" of his department.

An estimated 20,000 to 25,000 polar bears live in the Arctic region. One study showed a 22% decline in numbers in Canada's Hudson Bay. Another showed a drop in weight and reduced cub survival in Alaska's Southern Beaufort Sea.

The proposal calls for polar bears to be listed as "threatened" because the species is not considered at immediate risk of becoming extinct, which would be categorized as "endangered."

Kempthorne says Alaskan natives and others who hunt the bears can continue to harvest the animals. And coastal and offshore oil and gas exploration can continue. "Oil and gas development is not a factor," he says, "period."

The proposal to add the bears to the list came after a two-year fight.

"It's frustrating to wait, but at the same time, it is still a significant step forward," says Brendan Cummings, an attorney for the Center for Biological Diversity, who filed suit to seek polar bear protection.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., the incoming head of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, says the polar bear's plight reflects the planet's health. "This news serves as a wake-up call to the U.S. Congress and the administration that we must quickly begin to address global warming through legislative action," she says.

Bush Administration Seeks Protection For Polar Bears (WSJ)

By Maya Jackson Randall

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Department of Interior on Wednesday proposed to list polar bears as a threatened species under the Endangered Species Act, saying global warming is causing sea ice -- a primary habitat for the bears -- to melt at dangerous rates.

While the burning of fossil fuels such as oil and coal are thought to lead to global warming, Interior Department Secretary Dirk Kempthorne Wednesday said oil and natural gas drilling in the Arctic region is not to blame for the receding ice.

"It is very clear that the oil and gas activity does not pose a threat," Mr. Kempthorne said. "In fact .. they have been partners."

Still, the Interior Department is silent on what's actually causing the warmer temperatures.

The "whole aspect of climate change is beyond the scope of the Endangered Species Act," Mr. Kempthorne said during a conference call with reporters. Other agencies within the Bush administration, not DOI, are charged with focusing on a national greenhouse gas reduction program and the factors leading to rising global temperatures and climate changes, he said.

The DOI plans to take comments on the proposal in effort to make a decision within 12 months on whether to list the bears as endangered species.

"There's concern that their habitat may be literally melting," Mr. Kempthorne said.

Agency Proposes To List Polar Bears As Threatened (NYT)

WASHINGTON, Dec. 27 — The Interior Department proposed Wednesday to designate polar bears as a threatened species, saying that the accelerating loss of the Arctic ice that is the bears' hunting platform has led biologists to believe that bear populations will decline, perhaps sharply, in the coming decades.

Many experts on the Arctic say that global warming is causing the ice to melt and that the warming is at least partly the result of the atmospheric buildup of heat-trapping gases from tailpipes and smokestacks. The plight of the polar bear has been held up by environmentalists as a symbol of global warming caused by humans.

But in a conference call with reporters, Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne said that although his decision to seek protection for polar bears acknowledged the melting of the Arctic ice, his department was not taking a position on why the ice was melting or what to do about it.

While the Bush administration "takes climate change very seriously and recognizes the role of greenhouse gases in climate change," Mr. Kempthorne said, it was not his department's job to assess causes or prescribe solutions. "That whole aspect of climate change is beyond the scope of the Endangered Species Act," he added.

The scientific analysis in the proposal itself, however, did assess the cause of melting ice. Most of the studies on the Arctic climate and ice trends cited to support the proposed listing assumed that the buildup of heat-trapping gases was probably contributing to the loss of sea ice, or that the continued buildup of these gases, left unchecked, could create ice-free Arctic summers later this century, and possibly in as little as three decades.

The Interior Department has a year to gather and study comments on the proposed listing and make a final determination. It must also work out a recovery plan to control and reduce harmful impacts to the species, usually by controlling the activities that cause harm.

It is unclear whether such a recovery plan could avoid addressing the link between manmade emissions of heat-trapping gases and the increase in Arctic temperatures.

Kert Davies, the research director for Greenpeace U.S.A., one of three environmental groups that sued the Interior Department in 2005 to force it to add polar bears to the list of threatened species, said the administration was "clearly scrambling for credibility of any kind in this issue."

Kassie Siegel, the lawyer for the Center for Biological Diversity, a group based in Arizona that took the lead in the lawsuit calling on the department to list the polar bear, added, "I don't see how even this administration can write this proposal without acknowledging that the primary threat to polar bears is global warming and without acknowledging the science of global warming."

As a result of the lawsuit, the Interior Department had a court-ordered deadline of Wednesday to make a decision.

The worldwide population of polar bears currently stands at 20,000 to 25,000, broken into 19 groups in Russia, Denmark, Norway, Canada and the United States. One-quarter to one-fifth of that population occupies waters off the shores of Alaska or the nearby coastlines, with separate groups in the Chukchi Sea off northwestern Alaska, the Northern Beaufort Sea and the Southern Beaufort Sea off the North Slope of Alaska

The most-studied bear population, in the Western Hudson Bay in Canada, dropped 22 percent, to 935 from 1,194 from 1987 to 2004, the proposal by the Fish and Wildlife Service said.

It added, "However, based on environmental factors and observed patterns of population trends for some populations, it is likely that most populations will exhibit declines in the future."

The International Conservation Union, in its latest red list of endangered wildlife, gave polar bears threatened status in May, projecting a decline of 30 percent by midcentury from current populations, mainly due to projected losses of sea ice in a warming world.

Polar bears are dependent on sea ice as a platform for hunting seals, and as a pathway to coastal areas. The ice shrinkage has meant that polar bears, which are strong swimmers, have had to cover longer distances between ice and land.

They have survived previous Arctic warming periods, including the last warm stretch between ice ages some 130,000 years ago, but some climate experts project that nothing in the species' history is likely to match the pace and extent of warming and ice retreats projected in this century and beyond, should emissions of heat-trapping gases continue unabated.

While Mr. Kempthorne and Dale Hall, director of the Fish and Wildlife Service, said Wednesday that they saw no separate risk to polar bears from oil and gas activity, the latest assessment of the species for the International Conservation Union, by a group of experts including Fish and Wildlife Service biologists, did include such activity in a list of threats, including toxic contaminants, shipping and recreational viewing.

Recently, the Minerals Management Service, another division of the Interior Department, proposed opening sections of the Beaufort and Chukchi Seas to oil and gas drilling.

"This listing will hopefully provide additional leverage to look more closely at those decisions," said Margaret Williams, director of the Bering Sea ecoregion program at the World Wildlife Federation.

Scott Schliebe, a federal biologist and the polar bear project leader for the Fish and Wildlife Service, said the basic connection between shrinking ice and greater distress for the bears was well established. This is shown clearly in areas where ice has retreated progressively in summers — including the Beaufort Sea off the North Slope and Hudson Bay in Canada. In such places, Mr. Schliebe said, "we know today that they're facing a situation of distress and nutritional stress."

The department's proposal said that "at this time" the lands and waters most critical to the bears' protection, called critical habitat in the law, were "not determinable."

Critical-habitat designations ensure that federal agencies must study the impact that any activities they conduct or approve in that area might have on the species at risk.

Global Warming Puts Polar Bears On Thin Ice (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

Polar bears are in jeopardy and need stronger government protection because of melting Arctic sea ice related to global warming, the Bush administration said yesterday.

Pollution and overhunting also threaten their existence. Greenland and Norway have the most polar bears, and a quarter of them live mainly in Alaska and travel to Canada and Russia.

Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne yesterday proposed listing polar bears as a "threatened" species on the government list of imperiled species. The "endangered" category is reserved for species more likely to become extinct.

"Polar bears are one of nature's ultimate survivors, able to live and thrive in one of the world's harshest environments," Mr. Kempthorne said. "But we are concerned the polar bear's habitat may literally be melting."

A final decision on whether to add the polar bears to the list is a year away, after the government finishes more studies.

Such a decision would require all federal agencies to ensure that anything they authorize that might affect polar bears will not jeopardize their survival or the sea ice where they live. That could include oil and gas exploration, commercial shipping or even releases of toxic contaminants or climate-affecting pollution.

Mr. Kempthorne, however, said his department's studies indicate that coastal and offshore oil and gas exploration -- heavily promoted by the Bush administration, particularly in Alaska -- shouldn't be curtailed.

"It's very clear that the oil and gas activity in that area does not pose a threat to the polar bears," he said.

Similarly, Alaskan natives and other people who depend on hunting the bears as part of their subsistence diet probably will not be affected, Mr. Kempthorne said.

Environmentalists hope that invoking the Endangered Species Act protections eventually might provide impetus for the government to cut back on its emissions of carbon dioxide and other heat-trapping "greenhouse" gases blamed for warming the atmosphere.

The proposed listing also marks a potentially significant departure for the administration from its cautious rhetoric about the effects of global warming. Mr. Kempthorne cited the thinning sea ice brought about by global warming as the main culprit.

President Bush's steadfast refusal to go along with United Nations-brokered mandatory controls on carbon dioxide, the chief global warming gas, has contributed to tensions between the United States and other nations.

Polar bears, an iconic and cold weather-dependent animal, are dropping in numbers and weight in the Arctic. In July, the House approved a U.S.-Russia treaty to help protect polar bears from overhunting and other threats to their survival.

That vote put into effect a 2000 treaty that sets quotas on polar bear hunting by native populations in the two countries and establishes a bilateral commission to analyze how best to sustain sea ice. It also approved spending $2 million a year through 2010 for the polar bear program.

The Polar Bear Specialist Group of the World Conservation Union, based in Gland, Switzerland, has estimated the polar bear population in the Arctic is about 20,000 to 25,000.

US Says Global Warming Threatens Polar Bears (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

Polar bears should be classified as a threatened species because global warming could cause their habitat to melt away, the Bush administration said on Wednesday.

The iconic arctic animals were being threatened by receding ice, said Dirk Kempthorne, secretary of the Interior Department, who stopped short of calling for an investigation into the causes of climate change, saying the issue was beyond his department's remit.

"We need to just concentrate and focus on the species and its habitat," he said, adding the George W. Bush administration had already spent $29bn researching climate change issues and related technology.

While the proposal did not represent a clear departure from the Bush administration's stance on global warming, it marked the first time the White House had pointed to climate change as a phenomenon that could threaten the survival of a species.

Administration officials said they proposed adding polar bears to the threatened species list because Fish and Wildlife Service biologists feared that Alaska's population of polar bears could experience a significant decline in the future.

There are thought to be between 20,000 and 25,000 polar bears worldwide, most living in Greenland and Norway. But almost 5,000 live mainly in Alaska and travel to Canada and Russia.

Recent scientific studies of adult polar bears in Canada and in Alaska's Southern Beaufort Sea found have found weight loss among the species and reduced cub survival. In Canada's western Hudson Bay, the population of polar bears has already declined 22 per cent.

The Fish and Wildlife Service will initiate a 12-month review of polar bears' current and future status before determining whether the species should be placed on the threatened list.

Dale Hall, director of the US Fish and Wildlife Service, said that if the polar bear was placed on the threatened list, the service would engage groups ranging from Alaskans to native Americans to scientists to "sit down and help us craft a recovery plan".

Although Mr Kempthorne said the nation's fish and wildlife service would not be asked to make a determination on why arctic sea ice was thinning, he emphasised that one potential environmental factor – oil and gas exploration – had "no negative impact on polar bears".

The conclusion contradicted a separate statement by the US Fish and Wildlife Service, which said that demands of oil and natural gas, and other resources in Alaska have led to "some conflicts" between polar bears and humans.

Ed Markey, a senior Democratic lawmaker on the House energy committee, said that the development "may signal the beginning of the end" of the Bush administration's policy of "global warming denial".

"After giving the cold shoulder to conservation, Kyoto, and better fuel economy standards, they seem to be warming up to protecting an icon of American wildlife," Mr Markey said.

Separately, Shell said on Wednesday it had hired Gale Norton, the former secretary of the Interior Department, to serve as a counsel for the Dutch oil giant.

The announcement from the energy company comes as the Bush administration is expected to face increased scrutiny by Congress on its ties to the oil and gas industry. This could include questions about whether the Interior Department has adequately collected royalty payments from oil and gas groups extracting resources from federally owned land.

Bright Idea Makes A Big Comeback: Conservation (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, December 28, 2006

Nearly all businesses share an all-consuming mission: sell, sell, sell. McDonald's wants to peddle more hamburgers. Airlines strive to fill every seat. Phone companies want you to make more calls.

But power companies these days are increasingly being told by regulators to pump hundreds of millions of dollars into selling less electricity.

Energy-efficiency programs, which first caught fire in the 1970s before fading in recent years, are making a big comeback spurred by global-warming fears and the public's aversion to more pollution-belching power plants. At least 15 states are starting or considering new or expanded rebate and tax-incentive programs. The campaigns entice consumers to buy compact fluorescent light bulbs and energy-saving dishwashers and coax businesses to replace power-guzzling freezers and lighting systems.

To prod utilities into better promoting or funding the initiatives, many states are carving out new financial inducements that turn the industry's 125-year-old business model on its head: In some cases, companies could make just as much money by selling less power.

"What (they're) asking us to do is cannibalize sales," says Trevor Lauer, vice president of retail sales for DTE Energy in Detroit, noting that DTE supports energy efficiency, especially if the company earns a sufficient financial return. "Our job is to sell as many kilowatt hours as we can."

States and cities are also beefing up building codes to require added insulation and more efficient heating systems in new homes and businesses. Wal-Mart last month announced a campaign to sell 100 million compact fluorescent bulbs by the end of 2007. The goal, if reached, would save $3 billion in electrical costs and keep 20 million tons of greenhouse gases from spewing out of power plants.

"It's pretty much understood that electricity as a growth industry is a dangerous thing," says California Energy Commissioner Art Rosenfeld, who is considered a pioneering advocate of energy efficiency.

Utilities are spending nearly $1.9 billion on energy-saving programs this year, up from $1.6 billion in 2005 and nearly double the 1999 total, says the American Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy, a non-profit group that is independent of the utility industry.

Driving the surge are soaring energy rates and a dilemma that even has a growing number of power companies embracing efficiency: Demand for electricity is projected to increase 19% over the next decade, yet building a power plant is no longer a surefire investment. That's because coal-fired plants might soon face expensive taxes on their carbon-dioxide emissions amid growing global-warming concerns. Meanwhile, natural gas prices are mercurial, nuclear plants face public opposition and renewable energy such as solar or wind doesn't operate 24 hours a day.

"We really view energy efficiency as the fifth fuel," says Jim Rogers, CEO of Duke Energy, which serves parts of the Southeast and Midwest and until recently resisted efficiency programs. "It gives us the capability to avoid building a new plant."

A report last month by McKinsey & Co. says worldwide growth in energy demand can be cut to 0.6% a year from 2.2% by tapping energy-saving technologies.

This isn't the first time conservation has captured the nation's fancy. The first efficiency wave was triggered by the 1973 Arab oil embargo. Utilities largely ditched those efforts in the mid-1990s, believing deregulation would breed new competition and lower prices. The competition never came, and efficiency has been on a gradual upswing since 2000.

It has shifted into high gear with global-warming fears and the federal Energy Policy Act of 2005. The legislation provides tax credits of up to $2,000 per home to builders of new homes that exceed international energy-saving standards by at least 50% and up to $500 to improve efficiency on existing homes.

But Steve Nadel, who heads the energy-efficiency council, criticizes the Bush administration as weak on conservation. The Natural Resources Defense Council sued the Energy Department for failing to update energy-efficiency standards for 22 appliances, from dishwashers to air-conditioning systems. Under a recent settlement, standards will be set over the next four years.

Energy Department spokesman Craig Stevens says clearing the backlog has been a priority for Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman.

Meanwhile, about 20 states have conservation programs, but many are not well-funded. The most aggressive are in California, the Pacific Northwest and the Northeast, where electricity prices are high.

Typically, states set budgets, and utilities design and run the programs. Power companies recoup their costs from customers, who each pay up to about $2 on their monthly energy bills to fund efficiency initiatives. Yet those who take advantage of the programs can save 30% or more in energy costs. That's because programs' incentives and associated expenses typically cost about 3 cents per kilowatt hour saved, while power costs an average 9.2 cents per kilowatt hour.

In California, Pacific Gas and Electric has used rebates to persuade consumers to buy 6 million compact fluorescent bulbs this year. More than half of California's homes have a compact fluorescent in at least one socket.

Many consumers shy away from the spiral-shaped bulbs because of retail costs of about $3 to $6 vs. as little as 25 cents for a standard light bulb. But the rebates drive the price to about 75 cents. Since compact fluorescents last about 10 years, or five times as long as standard bulbs, and use about 70% less energy, the extra cost can be recovered in weeks.

California also boasts some of the strictest appliance codes in the nation. For example, regulators this year limited to 1 watt the amount of power devices such as cellphone chargers and shavers can use when they're plugged in but turned off. The change will add a few cents to the cost of plugs but save users $80 a year in electricity costs.

All told, California utilities are spending $700 million this year to fund and promote energy efficiency, up from $410 million in 2005. California's 30-year-old efficiency program has held per-household electricity consumption at 1975 levels — and avoided construction of at least one power plant a year — while per-household usage in the rest of the USA has risen 50%.

"The public loves it, the risk to shareholders is less and the company's image is better," says PG&E Chief Executive Peter Darbee.

Government support for energy efficiency in other states is spotty but improving. Seventeen states have no standards, or obsolete ones, for how much insulation or what kinds of heating systems, for instance, must be used in houses, says the Building Codes Assistance Project. Louisiana recently adopted statewide standards as it rebuilds homes after Hurricane Katrina. Mississippi and Alabama may follow.

Some towns are going far beyond state minimums. In New York, the Long Island townships of Babylon and Brookhaven this year required all new homes to be built to Energy Star standards. Homes earn the federal Energy Star label if they're at least 15% more energy efficient than international building codes.

The requirements will add about $3,000 to the cost of an average $500,000 home but will save $720 a year in energy costs, says Neil Lewis of the Neighborhood Network, which pushed for the change.

The Long Island Builders Institute had opposed it, fearing thousands of dollars in costs to builders as they waited weeks for homes to be inspected. But group Executive Vice President Robert Wieboldt says, "The national goal of energy independence is something we might have to share the burden on."

Experts say the country isn't close to realizing its energy-saving potential. Nationwide, programs are helping utilities save 0.2% of power consumption each year. By contrast, Vermont and California — two states in the vanguard of energy efficiency — save an extra 1% in energy usage each year. By tripling funding in the next few years, Nadel says, the USA could cut up to 30% of new power demand by 2020, staving off the need for hundreds of new power plants.

Many states are moving toward that goal, even in the South and Midwest, where a plethora of power plants has tempered electricity rates and conservation programs. Michigan and Georgia are considering launching efficiency initiatives. Arizona, where torrid population growth is driving power demand, quadrupled funding to $34 million this year. Vermont plans to double its annual energy savings to 2% by 2008, wiping out the state's growth in power consumption.

Yet some utilities vigorously oppose efficiency mandates. "Our position is that you not set an arbitrary (funding) goal," says Oscar Harper, vice president of resource planning for Georgia Power, a Southern Co. unit that voluntarily runs some efficiency campaigns. Harper says many programs are not cost-effective and "can really hit low-income customers hard" by raising their monthly bills.

Steve Smith, executive director of the Southern Alliance for Clean Energy, contends the company simply fears eating into its growing revenue.

Regulators in several states are trying to prod utilities into spending more on efficiency. Rhode Island recently passed legislation requiring power companies to price efficiency programs before seeking bids for new electricity supply.

A utility must implement any program that costs less than the state's average electricity price, currently 14 cents per kilowatt hour. "It removes the artificial cap," says Ken Payne, director of the state Senate's policy office.

Six states — New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware, Wisconsin and Idaho — are considering severing the tie between electricity usage and utilities' profit. Under the proposals, a utility would earn a set rate of return even if power consumption rose above or fell below projected levels. If efficiency measures produced better-than-expected savings, rates on all customers would rise slightly to offset the utility's shortfall in revenue. California now uses such a system.

"It certainly removes the disincentive to moving ahead with energy-efficiency programs," says Joe Rigby, senior vice president and chief financial officer of Pepco, which serves southern Maryland.

But Con Edison, which serves New York City, opposes the idea. Company spokesman Mike Clendenin says a similar system cost customers $70 million in the mid-1990s when consumption fell short of revenue forecasts. Richard Cowart of the Regulatory Assistance Project, a consulting firm, says many utilities dislike the setup because it kills their chance to earn extra revenue when electricity usage exceeds projections.

Still another proposal, backed by Duke and DTE Energy, would allow utilities to earn a rate of return on the energy savings they achieve, just as they now earn profits on electricity sales. California regulators are weighing a similar plan.

"We would be (given the incentive) to drive (sales) down and take a piece of the savings as our earnings," says Duke's Rogers.

Further feeding the industry's interest in efficiency are new technologies that make that Energy Star refrigerator seem quaint. Just a few years away are smart meters linked to smart appliances via computers, or even the Internet.

After reading tomorrow's forecast for hot weather, your air conditioner could cool the house in the morning, when prices are low, and scale back midday when costs spike. That would save consumers money and help utilities reduce strain on the power grid during peak demand.

Technology "is what's really moving (energy efficiency) forward," Rogers says. "It makes things possible that weren't possible before."

Democrats Eye Revamp Of Toxic-cleanup Superfund (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, December 28, 2006

Although 1 in 4 Americans lives within four miles of a designated toxic-waste site, the federal program to clean up the sites has slowed.

Now, key Democrats in Congress are looking to push the program, known as Superfund, back into the spotlight. They're looking not only at its funding levels but also its funding sources. A central issue: whether to restore "polluter pay" taxes on industry to help fund cleanups.

"In some of these sites, the pollution is out of control, meaning it's still dangerous," Sen. Barbara Boxer, incoming chairwoman of the environment and public works committee, said this month. "We have to clean it up."

The California Democrat says she's making Superfund, along with global warming, focal points of her environmental agenda. She has tapped presumed presidential aspirant Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) of New York to chair the Superfund subcommittee.

Superfund, started in the 1970s, has seen a decline in funding and completed projects in recent years. Between 1993 and 2005, funding fell 32 percent - from $1.8 billion to $1.2 billion in inflation-adjusted dollars, the Government Accountability Office (GAO) reports. During the same period, the number of cleanup sites earning "construction complete" status fell by more than half - from 88 to 40 - the lowest level in more than a decade.

Officials at the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), which administers the program, deny funding is an issue. Fewer completed projects merely indicate transitions in construction cycles that can last a decade or more, they say.

"What's been cleared away already are the easier sites," says Susan Bodine, assistant administrator of the EPA's office of solid waste and emergency response. "The sites we're working on now, many of them are complex situations that were also being addressed in the 1990s, and they're still not done. But we're making progress."

Outside observers disagree. "Superfund is in trouble," says Velma Smith, a policy analyst at the National Environmental Trust in Washington. "People in the agency are telling me they're giving up on assessing new sites. They may know a problem exists, but they can't get the money to even go out and assess it."

Many of Superfund's biggest challenges can be traced back to its budget woes, critics and former EPA employees say. For example: While the EPA once had a "trust fund" from taxes on the production of toxic chemicals by chemical and oil companies, authorization for the tax lapsed in 1995. The fund shrank steadily from nearly $4 billion to zero by 2002, despite President Clinton's attempts to get Congress to restore it. President Bush has not asked to renew it.

That means that the share of Superfund programs paid for by taxpayers has risen steadily. From 1993 to 2000, it was less than 20 percent of the overall appropriation. By 2004, the public was footing the whole bill, the GAO reports.

That's why some Democrats, including Senator Boxer, want to reinstate "polluter pays" taxes. Polluters still pay to clean up their contaminated sites when the EPA can track them down. But when companies are bankrupt, the EPA pays. In the past, the "trust fund" helped offset the public cost through a tax on companies producing the chemicals that were being cleaned up.

Those taxes once generated about $1.5 billion a year, according to a June report by the Center for Progressive Reform. Now "with reduced funding, investigation and enforcement has lagged, causing fewer sites to be added to the list because nobody's out there looking for them," says Rena Steinzor, coauthor of the report.

But other analysts say the tax is too broad.

"The tax isn't fair," H. Sterling Burnett of the National Center for Policy Analysis, a think tank, told Environment and Energy Daily in an interview. "It's going to target some companies who had nothing to do with the pollution and it's not going to get the companies that did the pollution because many of them are no longer around."

Ms. Bodine of the EPA also sees little merit in taxing chemical producers. "We do have the federal funds we need," she says.

Even where toxic waste cleanup problems are identified, there are problems getting them into the Superfund pipeline. At least 61 sites are currently proposed but not yet added to the 1,241 nonfederal sites on the National Priority List or NPL. Among them are many "orphan" sites where there are no polluters to sue - and federal dollars must be used to clean them up.

Orphan sites are not a new problem.

"We had a number of these orphan sites that we had completed design for cleanup and just needed the money from headquarters for construction - and those dollars weren't forthcoming," says William Muno, former head of Superfund for the EPA's Midwest region. "I've spoken with people since I retired and, from what I understand, the situation is even more acute."

Even completed cleanups have caused controversy. In Ringwood, N.J., this summer, furious residents met with politicians over sludge and other contaminants left on a Ford site the EPA declared clean more than a decade ago.

Black Eye For Black Canyon (GJS)

By Bobby Magill, The Daily Sentinel

Grand Junction (CO) Sentinel, December 27, 2006

BLACK CANYON OF THE GUNNISON NATIONAL PARK — Before the dams were built, the Gunnison River raged through Black Canyon each spring with such ferocity that it carved through the volcanic rock Colorado's deepest and most sheer abyss.

More than 2,000 feet above the river on the south rim of Black Canyon of the Gunnison National Park, there's no running water, no grand lodge inviting tourists to luxuriate, no concession stand feeding the masses.

There is, however, a sense of remoteness and grandeur on the threshold of Colorado's deepest gorge. Overlooked by a rustic log cabin visitor center from which tourists peer into the chasm to the park's only permanent running water, the Gunnison River is barely visible from the canyon rim.

Only a gravel road penetrates the park on its north rim, where Black Canyon's most adventurous visitors attempt to either scale its sheer walls or negotiate one of several narrow poison ivy-riddled talus slopes plummeting surefooted hikers to the river below.

"When you go to the north rim, it's sort of like going to a park back in the '50s," said former Black Canyon Superintendent Bill Wellman, who was promoted in mid-November to the superintendent's post at sprawling Big Bend National Park in Texas.

Sixty-six years after President Herbert Hoover declared Black Canyon a national monument, Congress created Black Canyon of the Gunnison National Park in 1999, now the nation's fourth-newest national park senior only to a pair of eastern parks and Colorado's own Great Sand Dunes.

Black Canyon National Park is a picture of vitality in defiance of trends afflicting the region's other parks suffering from the National Park Service's budget woes and shrinking masses coming to see their natural wonders.

Visitation at Black Canyon has been on the rise the last three years, hitting 180,814 people in 2005, about half what it was three decades ago.

The park's south rim is endowed with facilities built within the last 15 years, most of which are in good condition.

Black Canyon's price tag for maintenance projects in need of completion is a mere $4.7 million — a fraction of the cost of its neighbor parks' maintenance backlogs, which are as high as $63 million.

The park could be rid of its maintenance backlog by 2010 because more than $1 million of maintenance projects are completed annually, Wellman said.

The park isn't immune to the budget crunch, however, and has had to consolidate management staff with Curecanti National Recreation Area and Florissant Fossil Beds National Monument west of Colorado Springs for efficiency, he said.

Down the river

One of the park's greatest strengths, Wellman said, is the quality of the canyon it protects. Development near the park and the fate of water flows in the Gunnison River could change that, however.

Black Canyon may be Colorado's most controversial national park —not necessarily because of how it was created or how its government caretakers manage its formidable land, but because of the water in the Gunnison River, which not only imbues the canyon with life, but supplies water and electricity to thousands of people in central Colorado.

During the spring floods, the Gunnison River sliced through the canyon at up to 20,000 cubic feet per second. So powerful was the Gunnison that it carved Black Canyon one inch deeper each year, creating a chasm 2,772 feet deep at its deepest and 40 feet wide at its narrowest.

The river's annual wax and wane was the natural order of things until the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation disrupted the Gunnison's water flows. In 1976, the bureau completed the last of the three dams and reservoirs of the Aspinall Unit immediately upstream of the park. The unit is part of the Colorado River Storage Project under which Arizona's Glen Canyon, Utah's Flaming Gorge and New Mexico's Navajo dams were also built.

With the completion of the Crystal Dam and its accompanying power plant, the bureau created on the Gunnison River a 40-mile swath of reservoirs and power plants that can produce more than 200 kilowatts of electricity and store over 1 million acre feet of water.

But the amount of water released below the dams would forever change the ecology of the river through Black Canyon National Park.

The dams eliminated the Gunnison River's natural hydrograph through the canyon, evening out flows during spring runoff, when the river should be raging with floodwater, said Ken Stahlnecker, chief of resource stewardship and science at Black Canyon. The gorge used to be the Gunnison's transition zone between warm water and cold water, but the dams cooled the river at the expense of native fish species.

"Now we see more of the trout species, rainbow and brown primarily, and it's quite a fishery down there now," he said.

The natural hydrograph needs to be maintained because it's the signal for fish to spawn, and it flushes the river channel of debris, said Wendy McDermott, executive director of the High Country Citizens Alliance.

But Wellman said the canyon can survive without a natural hydrograph, as long as it gets peak and lower "shoulder" flows each spring and a once-per-decade flood with flows of about 15,000 cubic feet per second.

"Our water right is not a consumptive right," Wellman said. "It doesn't take any water out of the river system."

But a 2003 agreement between the National Park Service, the U.S. Department of Interior and the State of Colorado threatened to starve the canyon of its flows, reducing it to a year-round minimum of 300 cubic feet per second.

To maintain the vitality of the Gunnison River through Black Canyon, water would ideally need to flow at a volume well above 300 cubic feet per second, especially during spring runoff when the river naturally runs highest, Stahlnecker said.

The agreement relinquished Black Canyon National Park's water right to peak and shoulder flows during the spring, a right dating to 1933 when President Hoover declared Black Canyon a national monument.

The agreement was "nonsensical," said U.S. District Court Judge Clarence A. Brimmer in his September decision to set aside the pact. The National Park Service ignored the needs of the public in a decision that would profoundly effect the canyon's ecology and human environment, he wrote.

He declared that because Black Canyon is a wilderness area and a national park, the National Park Service must maintain enough water in the river to leave the canyon's ecology and scenic beauty unimpaired. The agreement, he said, protected the canyon's competitors and not the canyon itself.

After being given until Dec. 18 — the court granted a one month extension to the government's original deadline — to appeal Brimmer's decision, the U.S. Department of Justice filed a notice of appeal that day, which preserves the government's right to file its appeal beyond the deadline.

Cynthia Magnuson, spokeswoman for the Justice Department in Washington, said the appeal would likely be filed by the beginning of January.

If its appeal fails, the federal government and the state will have to return to the table to forge a new agreement more friendly to the ecology of Black Canyon.

"We'd like to see an agreement that protects the resources of the park and protects current and future use of the water within the Gunnison Basin," said McDermott, whose group is a plaintiff in the case.

Development looms

As the canyon awaits the fate of its river, worries stir above its rim about how commercial and housing development on private property within and just outside park boundaries may one day become part of the landscape seen from Black Canyon's most popular viewpoints.

There's no lodge at Black Canyon National Park — not even flush toilets — and that's just fine with Lynn and Ted Farr. In early November, they were in the middle of a trans-continental road trip from their home in Emmaus, Penn., when they decided to visit the park, which they discovered in a tourism brochure.

The pair grew up in California, where car-clogged Yosemite served as their idea of a typical national park. But sparsely-visited Black Canyon, they said, should be different.

"They don't need a lodge in the park," Lynn Farr said. "Yosemite kind of set a standard. I don't think (this) park needs all of (those) facilities."

Where the Farrs see an ideal national park, real estate speculator Tom Chapman sees a business opportunity.

Owner of a 112-acre private inholding subdivided into three 37 acre parcels just south of Black Canyon's campground and within the park boundaries, Chapman is advertising his land as a rare opportunity for a savvy developer who wants to take advantage of doing business within a relatively undeveloped national park. One house has already been built on the land.

"These private parcels stand alone as being the only place where one can own a business or a luxury home within the U.S. National Park system," Chapman says in his online ad for the land. "Anchored on a high hill, the building site on Parcel No. 2 reigns supreme over the entire park and is an excellent candidate for a national park lodge or a luxury estate."

The ad trumpets the other parcel, on the East Portal Road which leads to a dam at the bottom of the canyon, as a great spot for a fast food joint.

Development on those inholdings would "potentially create homesites near the peak of Signal Hill, which would be visible from a lot of the overlooks from the roads within the park," and would sully the darkness of the park's night skies, Black Canyon National Park Management Assistant Dave Roberts said.

"The Park Service would rather see the area remain essentially rural and undeveloped," he said. "We've made attempts to acquire that land in the past, but we're not anywhere close on price."

Chapman is notorious among conservationists who criticize him for buying cheap private property within wilderness areas and national parks and selling it for millions.

On his Web site, Chapman is advertising a package of 19 inholdings — all sold — within Colorado's Weminuche, Holy Cross, Fossil Ridge, Spanish Peaks and Uncompahgre wilderness areas, where buyers could develop within a federally protected wildland.

Chapman's Black Canyon ad says the property is priceless and is currently off the market. As a representative of TDX, LP, he purchased the 112 acres in 1998 for $80,000, and pays only $45 in property taxes annually for the land's $3,100 agricultural production value, according to Montrose County records.

He's selling a nearby 1,700 acre ranch "targeted for inclusion in the Black Canyon National Park" for $10 million.

Chapman couldn't be reached for comment, but Roberts said the park's hopes of trying to buy the property is fading because the National Park Service has no money to spend on acquiring land.

"Our other concern is Grizzly Ridge," Wellman said.

The finger of private property on the ridge directly across Black Canyon from the visitor center was subdivided in 2004, and is "cherry stemmed" into the park, he said.

"That would be more intrusive than (TDX's) current house," he said.

The park is trying to either acquire that property or ask the owner to put it under a conservation easement to preserve the views in the park.

In coping with outside development that could be within view of the park, Wellman said park officials know that it's the grandeur and quality of the canyon that draws people to the park.

And that's worth protecting, he said: "One of our objectives should be not to screw up what's really nice."

The New FBI Means Business (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

EVANSTON, ILL. — At a class on leadership, a professor at Northwestern University's business school here asks his students to ponder a landmark on the Chicago skyline 10 miles south.

"Walk along the lake, and look downtown. You see the Sears Tower," Ranjay Gulati says. "Sears Roebuck & Co. owned retailing. They defined retailing."

That they no longer do, he says, shows "what happens when the world changes around you … and you don't."

Thirty senior FBI managers and executives stir at their desks.

They're here because their employer is looking for ways to manage what is still a wrenching transition: In the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, a newly urgent mission — disrupting terrorism before it hits the United States — was thrust upon the bureau.

In an effort to change the famously insular and hidebound organization, the FBI has sent more than 2,000 of its top agents and supervisors — including this group of spy-catchers, cyber-sleuths and terrorist-hunters — to management school at Northwestern.

This is new training for a new FBI, or at least that is the hope.

Traditionally, FBI agents and supervisors are schooled in the nuts and bolts of law enforcement. Agents learn how to become expert marksmen or cultivate informants. Supervisors learn how to mentor new agents or follow proper procedures.

Here, they explore how large corporations have shifted their missions. If Toyota can adapt its car lines to the baby-boom generation, then why can't the FBI adapt its role to the changing security needs of the country?

They practice role-playing exercises aimed at instilling teamwork, although about half fail to get the point of one exercise because they missed a subtlety in the instructions. "The competitive mentality is hard to break," Professor Leigh Thompson said.

Puzzled reactions

And they study business experiences that might help them present the FBI in the best light. They learn how Starbucks developed a strong identity and how Exxon botched its handling of the 1989 oil spill in Alaska.

The program was started three years ago by FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III. Most of the senior headquarters staffers and top agents from the 56 field offices have taken the weeklong courses, which cost the bureau about $3 million a year.

Mueller is an ardent student of management science. He has sought the views of successful chief executives, including former IBM Corp. chief executive Louis V. Gerstner Jr., and has looked to outsiders to fill high positions.

The training has been one of Mueller's main efforts to bring fresh thinking into the bureau, though some FBI officials at first found the idea puzzling.

"The initial response was, 'We are going to go where?' " recalls Kevin Brock, a counter-terrorism official who attended the program. "A lot of us did not know what we were getting into. So we were wondering, 'How does this connect with putting bad guys in jail, hunting terrorists and all that stuff?' "

Management experts say there are limits to what a government agency can learn from studying the ups and downs of companies. And there are questions about how much the FBI has really embraced the lessons.

But in being asked to fight terrorism while solving more traditional crimes, the bureau faces a quandary that is fairly common in the business world.

"How can one organization arrange itself to do two things well? This is hardly a challenge that is unique to the FBI," said Michael Roberto, a professor of management at Bryant University in Smithfield, R.I., who is co-writing a case study of the FBI that Harvard Business School plans to use.

"We have no monopoly on good ideas," Mueller said in an interview, adding that he and others found the training "tremendously educating."

Mueller took a version a week or so before he testified before the Sept. 11 commission in 2004. The training focused in part on how to respond to a crisis. It highlighted traits of executives who successfully handle such situations: transparency, expertise, commitment and empathy.

At the time, the bureau was under siege and there was speculation the commission would order it dismantled because of intelligence failures that preceded the attacks.

Mueller followed the advice to a T, and gave a performance that drew praise from the commission, which recommended the bureau be preserved.

The classes take place in a modern conference center that caters to business. Lunch is served in the Johnson Wax Dining Room, breaks are in the Oscar Mayer Lounge.

Experienced group

The FBI allowed a Times reporter to sit in on several days of classes. The Times agreed to withhold certain details of some exercises and discussions, which in a few instances are based on actual cases.

The latest class is a seasoned one; its participants average about 20 years' experience. They include administrative officers and heads of some of the most sensitive investigations in recent bureau history, including the Sept. 11 attacks and the 2001 anthrax episode.

The students are self-effacing, and seem to have no illusions about the difficult task they face. The mission is akin to "building an airplane while trying to fly it," said Thomas Mahlik, a senior counter-espionage official.

A major theme is creating an atmosphere in which people are open to change, no small feat for an organization that has done things the same way for generations.

Gulati used as an example urinals introduced at Amsterdam's airport that used the image of a black fly inside the basin to try to get men to hit their mark. What seemed a good idea never caught on. "Just because you have a great idea … does not mean everybody will line up behind it," he said.

The class watches a video as part of an exercise in "Inattentional Blindness," which is when people do not see what is clearly in their visual field because they are focused on a different task.

In keeping track of how often people throw a basketball, most of the agents fail to see a mysterious figure who walks through the scene. Richard Lambert, head of the FBI's Knoxville, Tenn., office, was so certain that figure was not in the video, he said, "I would have bet you a paycheck."

Such conceptual learning — the classes have such names as "Strategic Leadership" and "Beyond Win-Win: Managing Interdependencies" — is an adjustment for an agency that has long been run by G-men.

"The bureau is full of people who are very good at crisis situations. We know how to do that. We got it," said Brock, the counter-terrorism specialist. "So far as large cultural changes, we are like everyone else."

Innovation is rare in organizations such as the FBI that are highly regimented. But the professors tell the class that quality is essential for large organizations to become successful.

"Every organization that operates efficiently and effectively has people who are exploring better ways to do things," said Joseph Hannigan, a Mueller confidant who heads the FBI program at Northwestern's Kellogg School of Management. "In the bureau, that has been kind of random."

So the agents are taught the value of dissent. Included in the assigned reading is an article called "How Management Teams Can Have a Good Fight."

The instructors teach that people are naturally drawn to obeying the rules, even where the consequences can be bizarre or lethal. They cite the case of a jet that landed in the wrong country even though 250 passengers and flight attendants could tell from an electronic map that the pilots were off course.

"People are afraid to break ranks," said another professor, Michelle Buck. "The role of a leader is to create an environment in which people feel free to speak up."

Steve Gomez, a former terrorism squad leader for the FBI in Los Angeles who is now a bureau supervisor in St. Louis, said the classes reinforced for him the importance of seeking out dissenting views among his team.

"When I have these meetings, and we are brainstorming, I have to find somebody to be my naysayer and challenge us," Gomez said. "I know who those people are. They are going to speak their mind. They really don't care what I think, and that helps."

PR crisis lesson

The class also gets a lesson in brand management by studying how Mercedes-Benz handled a public relations crisis.

As it prepared to roll out a new subcompact in the mid-1990s, the model flipped while making a sharp turn during a routine test of whether it could avoid a sudden obstacle, such as a moose.

At first, the automaker reacted defensively. But as ridicule of the car's failure of the "moose test," Mercedes executives took action to protect their reputation and made a costly safety improvement in the car.

Mercedes then launched a public-relations blitz and tried to defuse the furor by putting plush moose toys in the new vehicles. The lesson, said Daniel Diermeier, one of the Kellogg professors, is that agents should not let "tactical excellence" get in the way of "strategic thinking" that may help the agency in the long run.

"Think of yourself as a steward of the FBI brand," he said.

Court Rules Feds Are Entitled To Baseball Steroid Testing Data (AP)

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) - The names and urine samples of about 100 Major League Baseball players who tested positive three years ago can be used by federal investigators, a court ruled Wednesday -a decision that could have implications for Barry Bonds.

The ruling from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals could bolster the government's perjury case against Bonds if investigators are able to link his name to a positive test from baseball's anonymous testing in 2003. The San Francisco Giants slugger has been the target of a perjury investigation since he testified before a 2004 grand jury that he didn't knowingly use illegal drugs.

The decision also could help authorities find the drug sources. Those who tested positive could be called before the federal grand jury and asked where they obtained their performance-enhancing drugs.

Greg Anderson, Bonds' personal trainer, is currently in prison for refusing to testify in the perjury probe. Anderson previously was convicted of steroids distribution.

During 2004 raids on three labs involved in the MLB testing program, investigators seized computer files containing the 2003 test results. The unidentified samples had been collected as part of a MLB survey to gauge the prevalence of steroid use.

Baseball players and owners agreed in their 2002 labor contract that the results would be confidential, and each player was assigned a code number to be matched with his name.

Quest Diagnostics of Teterboro, N.J., one of the largest drug-testing firms in the nation, analyzed more than 1,400 urine samples from players in the 2003 season. Comprehensive Drug Testing, of Long Beach, coordinated the collection of specimens and compiled the data.

Subpoenas were issued to both companies in late 2003, a day before the test results were to be destroyed, and in April 2004 Internal Revenue Service agents seized the test results and samples. It's unclear whether the data seized includes test results or specimens from Bonds.

Bonds always has maintained he never tested positive, but federal investigators demanded to see the 2003 test results for Bonds, then Yankees players Gary Sheffield and Jason Giambi and seven other players. When they raided the testing labs for those 10 results, investigators also seized computer files containing the test results of nearly 100 other players not named in the government's subpoena and warrants.

The Major League Baseball Players Association protested the seizure as a violation of the players' constitutional rights.

Bonds' attorney didn't immediately return calls for comment.

Michael Weiner, general counsel for the players' association, which sued to keep the government from accessing the records, declined to immediately comment, wanting first to review the decision.

100 Players Tested Positive For Steroids In 2003 (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, December 27, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- A federal appeals court revealed today that more than 100 major league baseball players tested positive for steroids in 2003, and ruled that the government could use their tests in its investigation of illegal drug distribution to athletes.

The Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco also said federal investigators had obtained Major league Baseball's 2003 testing samples and results for 10 players linked to the investigation of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO, and that eight of them had tested positive for steroids.

The ruling mentioned no athletes' names, but San Francisco Giants star Barry Bonds was part of the BALCO investigation and testified that he had never knowingly used steroids. A grand jury is investigating whether he committed perjury.

The government has expressed no intention of prosecuting any athlete for illegal drug use. The court quoted government lawyers as saying athletes who tested positive could be called before a grand jury and asked about their suppliers.

Five men, including BALCO founder Victor Conte, have pleaded guilty to illegal drug distribution in the case.

The Major League Baseball Players Association did not challenge federal prosecutors' authority to keep and use baseball's drug testing records of players, like Bonds, who were linked to BALCO. Those records were obtained in 2004 from two companies that conducted the testing for Major League Baseball, under search warrants that originated in the BALCO case.

But the association challenged prosecutors' seizure of records of any other players. Among the records seized by prosecutors, for example, was a spreadsheet that included the test results of the BALCO athletes plus other baseball players who had tested positive for steroids.

Three federal judges had ordered those records returned in separate rulings, saying federal agents had no advance evidence of steroid use by any player outside the BALCO investigation and no legitimate reason to hold the documents.

The judges, in San Francisco, Las Vegas and Los Angeles, accused prosecutors of misusing search warrants -- which had been approved by magistrates in uncontested proceedings -- to prevent the players and their association from challenging the searches.

The appeals court overruled all three judges in a 2-1 decision, saying the government is entitled to keep and use all computer records that were part of the same files as the BALCO material obtained from private drug-testing laboratories.

"We see no evidence of bad faith or pretext," said Judge Diarmuid O'Scannlain in the majority opinion. He said prosecutors have legal grounds for retaining not only the BALCO-related records but also the "intermingled information" of positive tests of other athletes.

Dissenting Judge Sidney Thomas said the ruling "puts Americans' most basic privacy rights in jeopardy." By the same rationale, he said, the government could seize the medical records of any patient that a hospital kept in the same computer file as a patient who was the target of a search warrant.

Ruling Erases Players' Victories In A Steroids Case (NYT)

By Murray Chass

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

The federal court system and Major League Baseball have different ways of operating. In baseball, if Tom Glavine shuts out Atlanta for the Mets on Monday and the Braves come back the next day and knock John Maine out of the game in the first inning and go on to rout the Mets, Glavine's shutout isn't wiped out. It still counts.

In the court system, however, victories, even shutouts, can be wiped out with the signature of a judge or two.

Lawyers for the Players Association understand that difference, but the decision they were handed yesterday in a steroids-related case in federal court rocked them nonetheless.

Lawyers representing the union pitched a two-state, three-case shutout in 2004, but yesterday the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in San Francisco wiped out their sweeping victory, ruling in favor of the government in the matter of steroid-test samples that authorities seized in 2004.

By a vote of 2 to 1, the three-judge panel overturned lower court decisions in Los Angeles, San Francisco and Nevada. The union had no immediate public reaction to the decision, preferring to take time to digest the 120-page opinion before commenting. However, the union is certain to go further with the case.

It could ask the Ninth Circuit to re-hear the case with the entire 12-judge court, or it could appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Whichever route the union takes, the case will not have a final outcome until very likely sometime in 2008.

One thought some people had upon hearing the outcome of the government's appeal was that it could have an adverse effect on Barry Bonds's status, but that will probably not be so.

The Bonds speculation stems from the possibility that he tested positive for steroids use in 2003, the year baseball conducted survey testing of all players to determine if testing for disciplinary purposes would ensue in 2004.

However, even if Bonds tested positive, he would not have known it because the testing was supposed to have been done anonymously. Furthermore, he reportedly told the grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative for steroids distribution that he didn't knowingly use steroids. Bonds thought one of the substances was flaxseed oil, he reportedly testified.

If Bonds tested positive in 2003, the result might make him look worse than he already does, but it wouldn't help the government prove that he perjured himself with his answers under oath to the grand jury.

It was the samples and records from the 2003 testing that the government seized from Comprehensive Drug Testing of Long Beach, Calif., and Quest Diagnostics, Inc. of Las Vegas. The testing had been done under terms of the 2002 labor agreement between the owners and the players, and the results were supposed to remain anonymous.

But the authorities threw a clever, if questionable, one-two punch. They issued subpoenas to the two companies seeking test results of 11 players, presumably those who had testified before the Balco grand jury.

When the companies balked at supplying the requested information and indicated their intent to challenge the subpoenas in court, the government secured search warrants and raided Comprehensive and Quest.

They seized the urine samples in Long Beach and the list of codes assigned to players' names in Las Vegas. Put them together and the government would have the names of all of the players who tested positive. Federal agents did not take only the 11 results they sought. They had the results of all of the tests — more than 1,000 players. Included were 104 positive results, presumably all of the positives from the entire testing procedure.

The Players Association contended that, among other transgressions, the government violated the players' Fourth Amendment rights, their right to privacy.

Indeed, the dissenting judge in yesterday's decision, Sidney Thomas: began his dissent by writing, "One of the three extremely able district court judges who rejected the government's argument summarized it best, stating, 'What happened to the Fourth Amendment? Was it repealed somehow?' "

His two colleagues on the panel, Diarmuid O'Scannlain and Richard Tallman, did not suggest the Fourth Amendment had been repealed, but in the majority opinion Judge O'Scannlain wrote that the "district courts erred in finding callous disregard of Fourth Amendment rights."

Furthermore, he wrote, "The district court erred in finding the issuance of subpoenas and the contemporaneous execution of search warrants to be unreasonable."

And the district court "abused its discretion in granting the motion to quash" a subpoena.

But Judge Thomas adamantly disagreed. "In discussions of the alleged use of steroids by baseball players," he wrote in his lengthy dissent, "much is made about 'the integrity of the game.' Even more important is the integrity of our legal system.

"The district judges were entirely right. To order the government to return the thousands of private medical records it wrongfully seized by use of pretext and artifice."

The United States attorney for Northern California, Kevin Ryan, was naturally pleased with the outcome. He said in a statement that his office will review the opinion "to determine what the next investigative step may be."

The 2-1 decision wasn't like a baseball game that ends 2-1. In a 2-1 game, the losing team usually has a chance to score the tying run. The players had no chance of as tie in this legal game.

Nearly three years ago the union had the right under the steroids testing agreement to destroy all of the 2003 test results. Inexplicably the union lawyers didn't take that step. They have never explained why. Had they exercised their right then, they would not have to be fighting three or four years later over their players' Fourth Amendment rights.

Court: Investigators Can Keep Positive Test Results (WP)

By Amy Shipley

Federal investigators can keep the positive drug test results for more than 100 Major League Baseball players -- who have not been publicly identified -- that they seized during raids of baseball's testing laboratories two years ago, a federal appeals court in San Francisco ruled yesterday, overturning in part a lower court ruling.

The decision means additional major league players could get swept up in the probe into sports doping that began in 2003 when a raid of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative (BALCO) in Burlingame, Calif., yielded information that tied dozens of elite and professional athletes to steroids and other drugs.

San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds is already the subject of a perjury investigation in connection with the investigation, and the home of former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley was searched for drugs by BALCO investigators last summer after Grimsley admitted using human growth hormone and other drugs.

Lower courts had sided with the Major League Baseball Players Association, which cited privacy concerns in arguing that investigators were entitled only to the drug test results for 10 players with ties to the BALCO lab and should return the others.

The positive test results came during the 2003 season, when a program of confidential testing was undertaken jointly by Major League Baseball and the MLBPA to determine whether the sport had a problem with steroid abuse. No players who tested positive were identified, and none received penalties.

In a 100-plus page opinion, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in San Francisco ruled investigators did not necessarily have to return information about other major league players that was found intermingled with computer data on the 10 players who were the subject of the search, and it also ruled that a subpoena for all of the positive drug test results from 2003 should not have been quashed by a lower court judge.

The opinion from Diarmuid F. O'Scannlain, Sidney R. Thomas, and Richard C. Tallman included a partial dissent from Thomas.

Elliot R. Peters, a San Francisco-based attorney for the players' association, could not immediately be reached for comment. A spokesman in the players' association's New York office said the agency would have no comment until today.

Feds Can Use Baseball Drug Test Names (USAT)

By Jorge L. Ortiz

More than 100 Major League Baseball players can have their names and positive drug tests used by federal authorities in their ongoing steroid investigation as a result of a decision by a federal appeals court.

Wednesday's ruling, which overturned decisions by three lower courts, by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco could enhance the government's investigation into whether Barry Bonds committed perjury when he told a grand jury he never knowingly used steroids.

However, Bonds' lawyer said he's not concerned.

"If he had tested positive, boy, that would have leaked out already," Michael Rains said. "But they didn't bother to leak anything out because they knew it was negative."

The tests were conducted in 2003 as part of baseball's survey to determine whether to implement a stricter policy, which began in 2004 after more than 100 of the approximately 1,200 players had positive results.

Federal investigators raided testing labs in California and Nevada, seeking the results of 10 players — among them Bonds, Jason Giambi and Gary Sheffield— who were subpoenaed to testify in front of the grand jury probing BALCO.

Wednesday's ruling revealed eight of those players tested positive in 2003, though they were not identified.

The raid also produced information on all the tests, which were supposed to be kept confidential. The players association sued to have the records returned, arguing their seizure violated the players' Fourth Amendment rights.

The 9th Circuit Court disagreed in a 2-1 vote, leaving the union with no recourse other than requesting the full court review the case or taking it to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"We are pleased" with the ruling, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said in a statement. "We will continue to review the 125-page opinion to determine what the next investigative step may be."

The case is United States v. Comprehensive Drug Testing Inc., 05-10067.

Court Says Investigators May Use Baseball Players' Steroid Test Data (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, December 27, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. - In a legal development that could further fuel the ongoing perjury probe of San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds, a federal appeals court Wednesday ruled that federal investigators can use the names and urine samples of about 100 Major League Baseball players who tested positive for steroids three years ago.

A divided panel of the San Francisco-based 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the privacy arguments of the players' union, raising the possibility the names of baseball players who tested positive for steroids in the league's 2003 anonymous testing program could become public as the government continues to probe the fallout from the Balco steroids case.

If the ruling holds up, it also could significantly impact a federal grand jury probe into whether Bonds committed perjury. Bonds has been the target of the perjury investigation since testifying more than two years ago in the Balco case that he never knowingly took steroids.

Bonds' lawyer, Michael Rains insisted Wednesday that his client is not one of the players who tested positive and therefore the ruling and the union's fight to keep the government from using the test results will have little bearing on the slugger's case. It isn't known if any of the test data seized involved Bonds' specimen.

"I don't think things change for Barry," Rains said. "They've had the test results since `04. If they had a positive test, they could have used it to obtain an indictment of Barry. I think the deal is they don't have a positive test of Barry from `03."

Federal investigators connected to the Balco case seized computer files in 2004 that contained the results of baseball's 2003 testing program, which was designed to evaluate the scope of steroid use in the sport. Because between 5 and 7 percent came back positive, a clause kicked in that made identified testing mandatory. The players' union and baseball owners had agreed to keep the results of the testing confidential.

The government originally sought the test results for 10 players linked to the Balco scandal, including Bonds, New York Yankees slugger Jason Giambi and former Yankees star Gary Sheffield, now with the Detroit Tigers. However, investigators seized the records on dozens of other players, triggering a major legal battle pitting government powers to search computer databases with sensitive medical information against the privacy rights of the players.

The players' association sued to block the government from using the information, and three federal judges sided with the players in separate cases in San Francisco, Los Angeles and Nevada. But the 9th Circuit overturned all three of those decisions in Wednesday's ruling, finding that the government's seizure of the test data was "lawful and reasonable."

In nearly 70 pages of dissent, 9th Circuit Judge Sidney Thomas warned that the ruling is a threat to the "privacy of medical records" that has "profound consequences" for the constitutional right against illegal search and seizure. The judge said the government seized the testing "through pretext and artifice."

"Much is made about the "integrity of the game," Thomas wrote of steroids in baseball. "Even more important is the integrity of our legal system."

The judge's dissent could be a signal the fight over the testing results is not over in the appeals court. The players' association can ask the 9th Circuit to reconsider the case with a 15-judge panel, and such sharp dissents are often an indication the court will entertain such a request.

Elliot Peters, the lawyer for the players' association, said they were still reviewing the decision, but are considering asking the court to reconsider the ruling with the larger panel of judges.

Meanwhile, San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, whose office is heading the Balco investigation, issued a statement saying he was "pleased" the 9th Circuit upheld the government's seizures.

"We will continue to review the 125-page opinion to determine what the next investigative step may be," Ryan said.

If the government is permitted to use the test results, it could allow investigators to question players about their source for steroids. The investigation of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, a Burlingame sports nutrition center, already has produced guilty pleas from its president, Victor Conte, and others associated with the outfit.

Greg Anderson, Bonds' personal trainer who pleaded guilty in the Balco case, is back in prison for refusing to testify in the perjury probe targeting Bonds. Anderson was previously convicted of steroid distribution.

Bonds recently signed a $16 million deal to return to the Giants next season.

Baseball Players' Failed Steroid Tests May Be Examined (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, December 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — A divided appeals court panel has upheld the right of federal investigators to examine positive drug testing results for more than 100 professional baseball players as part of a probe of illegal steroid use by athletes.

DOJ_NMG_0109591

The 9th Circuit Court of Appeals decision issued yesterday rejected the rulings of three district court judges who found that the government acted improperly when seeking and carrying out grand jury subpoenas and search warrants in 2004 against California and Nevada laboratories that handled players' drug tests.

"We are aware of no authority that the simultaneous pursuit of search warrants and subpoenas in aid of an ongoing grand jury investigation constitutes a violation of the Fourth Amendment," Judge Diarmuid O'Scannlain wrote in the appeals court opinion, which was joined by Judge Richard Tallman. "We see no evidence of bad faith or pretext here."

After the Major League Baseball Players' Association and one of the labs objected, the government limited its subpoenas to records pertaining to 11 players the government suspected of drug use. However, after seizing some of the labs' computer records, the government claimed the authority to pursue positive results it discovered for more than 100 athletes.

U.S. Can Keep Computer Records Seized In Baseball Steroid Probe (BLOOM)

By Joel Rosenblatt

Bloomberg, December 28, 2006

Dec. 27 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. prosecutors can keep computer records seized from Major League Baseball's drug testing administrator as part of an investigation into player use of illegal steroids, a federal appeals court ruled.

The U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco today held that lower courts were wrong to require government investigators to return files taken from the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, a Burlingame, California, lab known as Balco.

The files sought by prosecutors were seized in 2004 while investigating 10 unidentified athletes during the Balco probe. The Major League Baseball Players Association fought the government's request for the documents, arguing the seizure violated the players' constitutional right against unreasonable searches and seizures.

``We conclude that the government's seizures were reasonable," a three-judge panel wrote in an opinion. Evidence gathered by investigators that isn't related to players named in search warrants must be returned, the panel ruled.

Elliot Peters, a lawyer for the players association, didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

The case is In Re: Search Warrants, 05-10067, 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, San Francisco.

Bonds' Attorney Downplays Significance Of Court Ruling (ESPN)

ESPN, December 28, 2006

The attorney for Barry Bonds downplayed the significance of a court ruling Wednesday allowing federal investigators access to confidential Major League Baseball drug-testing data from the 2003 season, suggesting that the San Francisco Giants slugger was not among the 100 or so players who tested positive for performance-enhancing drugs.

"My belief is there is nothing about these drug tests that hurts Barry."

-- Michael Rains, Barry Bonds' attorney

"According to this opinion, you got 100-plus [players] who have tested positive," Michael Rains told ESPN.com on Wednesday night. "And I'm here to tell you I don't think Barry is one of them."

Asked to expound on his belief, the Concord, Calif.-based attorney said, "I have had certain sources that were close to the government who have told me the government is probably going to be frustrated with what they see as it relates to Barry.

"My belief is there is nothing about these drug tests that hurts Barry."

It had been widely speculated that the ruling from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco might dramatically strengthen the government's perjury case against Bonds if investigators linked his name to a positive 2003 test. Bonds has been the target of a perjury probe since testifying before a grand jury in 2004 that he didn't knowingly use illegal drugs.

Rains sidestepped whether Bonds himself ever confirmed he didn't test positive in 2003, saying only that he has not discussed the latest court ruling with the star player, who was traveling with his family.

However, Rains further stated that he thought Bonds already would have been indicted by a federal grand jury had evidence of a positive drug test surfaced. Rains said the government has been aware of Bonds' test data since an April 2004 raid by Internal Revenue Service agents of three labs involved in the MLB testing program.

"I'm sure if Barry would have failed the drug test that would have already been a matter of public record," said Rains, referencing the numerous leaks in the case.

At the time of the raids, federal investigators were seeking the 2003 test results of Bonds, then New York Yankees players Gary Sheffield and Jason Giambi and seven other players tied to the Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative investigation. Investigators seized computer files containing the test results of nearly 100 other players not named in the government's subpoena and warrants.

"They've had Barry's [test results] since April or May of '04," Rains said. "From what I can tell, the players' association has never kicked up a fuss over the right of the government to use the test results of Barry or any one of the others in the BALCO case. So, of course, one thought that immediately comes to mind is if the government has not been precluded from using Barry's test results for two years, and if the grand jury was asked last July to issue an indictment against Barry, why didn't they do it? I think the answer is that the government didn't have a test result that helped them.

"So the only issue now becomes what do they do with the other 100 or so players who tested positive? What I see them doing is contacting them and leaning on them, just like they did with the guy in the desert there, [former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher] Jason Grimsley."

The ruling Wednesday by the three-judge panel overturned lower court decisions that had sided with the confidentiality issues argued by the players' association and the drug testing labs. In his dissenting opinion, Judge Sidney R. Thomas wrote, "In discussions of the alleged use of steroids by baseball players, much is made about the 'integrity of the game.' Even more important is the integrity of our legal system. Perhaps baseball has become consumed by a game of shadows, but that is no reason for the government to engage in a 'prosecution of shadows.'"

In its ruling, the court provided that the names of the players who tested positive remain sealed. It is unlikely the seal will be lifted, though the vast majority of athletes linked to the BALCO scandal ultimately were leaked.

The players' association, which sued to keep the government from accessing the records, has not decided whether to appeal the ruling. At the time, the players and owners had agreed to the 2003 as part of an MLB survey to gauge the prevalence of steroid use in the sport.

"I hope they will," Rains said when asked about a possible appeal. "For Barry, at this point, it is probably of no great issue. But for Barry and every other major league player, I think this is an outrage. It means that any contract they ever negotiate with the MLB is useless. It has no teeth. It has no meaning. And the government can willy-nilly do what it wants to undermine agreements made between a great institution and its union. It is crazy if the players union does not appeal it."

Federal Judge Rules Against Church Founders Over Marijuana Use (AP)

TUCSON - A federal judge has ruled against the founders of an Arizona church that deifies marijuana and uses it as a sacrament.

U.S. District Judge Judith C. Herrera in Albuquerque, N.M., refused to dismiss charges against Dan and Mary Quaintance, saying they don't have a "sincere" religious belief.

Herrera said that evidence indicates the pair "adopted their religious' belief in cannabis as a sacrament and deity in order to justify their lifestyle choice to use marijuana."

Herrera's order means the government's criminal case against the Quaintances will proceed in the new year.

The couple is scheduled to go to trial on Jan. 16 on criminal charges of possessing more than 100 pounds of marijuana, as well as conspiracy charges.

"She doesn't fully understand our doctrine," Dan Quaintance said Tuesday of Herrera's Dec. 22 decision. "This is very upsetting to the members of our church. It was quite a holiday present."

The Quaintances face up to 40 years each in prison if they are convicted as charged. They expect to appeal the decision.

The couple was arrested with 172 pounds of marijuana on Feb. 22 in Lordsburg, N.M., just seven days before the U.S. Supreme Court ruled unanimously that a small religious group based in Santa Fe that combines Christianity and American Indian practices could use hallucinogenic tea in its ceremonies.

The tea, called hoasca, contains dimethyltryptamine, or DMT, known for its hallucinogenic properties.

The pair say they founded their Church of Cognizance in Pima, Ariz. - about 90 miles northeast of Tucson - in 1991.

Dan Quaintance, 54, said the church has 40 to 50 members in Arizona. He and Mary Quaintance, 51, stepped down as leaders of the church following their arrests.

Cocaine Ring 'supplier' Sentenced (CTPOST)

By Daniel Tepfer

Connecticut Post, December 28, 2006

BRIDGEPORT — A city man, who police said was supplying drugs to dealers in the greater New Haven area, was sentenced Wednesday to eight years in prison.

Johnny Rolon, 31, of Sherman Street, pleaded guilty to possession of narcotics with intent to sell and criminal possession of a weapon.

He was sentenced by Superior Court Judge Patrick Carroll III to 15 years, suspended after he serves eight years and followed by five years probation.

"This disposition was the culmination of a wide-ranging investigation involving federal and local law enforcement," said Assistant State's Attorney Charles Stango. "And it would not have been possible without the successes of Project Safe Neighborhoods."

According to police, in March agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration infiltrated a cocaine distribution ring operating in the greater New Haven area. That led to several arrests of drug dealers.

Police said they subsequently learned that Rolon was supplying the ring with cocaine.

In May, a task force of federal and local law enforcement officers raided Rolon's Sherman Street home. Police said they seized under an ounce of cocaine, drug processing equipment, $12,000 in cash and a .22-caliber rifle.

L.I. Gambling And Drug Rings Are Broken Up, Authorities Say (NYT)

By Nicole Cotroneo

HAUPPAUGE, N.Y., Dec. 27 — A sophisticated Long Island gambling ring that took in $8.6 million a year was broken up with the arrest of 14 people, the Suffolk County district attorney said on Wednesday.

The district attorney, Thomas J. Spota, said that the 14-month investigation also uncovered lucrative marijuana and fireworks smuggling rackets that were run by the chief bookmaker, Salvatore Gerrato, 45, of Seaford. In addition, three people were charged in the drug case.

“Surveillance of phone and computer communications established that the gambling ring took in an average of $165,000 a week in bets,” Mr. Spota said. He added that the operation, which involved betting on professional and college sports, had a wire room in Costa Rica. Mr. Spota said that a 59-year-old accountant, Stephen Tarnofsky of Merrick, was the leader of the wire room.

The gambling case eventually led investigators to the marijuana and fireworks operations. According to the authorities, Mr. Gerrato oversaw the smuggling of fireworks from Maryland and marijuana from California, and these were distributed throughout the New York metropolitan region.

In May, the Suffolk Highway Patrol seized nine tons of illegal fireworks from a vehicle returning from Maryland, according to Mr. Spota.

The authorities also confiscated more than $300,000 in cash from a recreational vehicle that the smugglers planned to use to buy 100 pounds of marijuana in California, Mr. Spota said. He added that on a typical cross-country run, the smugglers could stash the vehicle with enough marijuana to yield $1 million to $1.5 million in street sales.

In raids on Dec. 14, investigators seized $1 million in cash, including $600,000 from Mr. Tarnofsky’s home, Mr. Spota said. Of the 17 people arrested, 14 have been charged with promoting gambling in the first degree, including Mr. Tarnofsky, Mr.

Gerrato and Frank Lonigro, 33, of Hauppauge. Three others were charged with fourth-degree conspiracy to possess marijuana. Both charges are felonies and carry a maximum prison sentence of four years, the district attorney's office said.

Mr. Gerrato was previously convicted of promoting gambling and, in 2001, was sentenced to five years' probation, Mr. Spota said.

Detectives were still looking for Andrew Petrone, 34, of Freeport, a lawyer who, according to the authorities, participated in the marijuana operation. He was arrested in June for possession of a controlled substance in an unrelated case, Mr. Spota said. He pleaded guilty and was scheduled for sentencing next month.

All the defendants were released on desk appearance tickets, and were scheduled to appear before a judge in March, the authorities said.

Mr. Spota added that the investigation was not over. "I am sure it's a much larger operation," he said.

Gambling Ring Probe Uncovering Other Illegal Activity (NSDY)

By Alfonso A. Castillo, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, December 28, 2006

Suffolk District Attorney Thomas Spota stood Thursday before a table covered with more than $1 million in neat stacks of hundreds and several large bags of marijuana, and said that the seized loot may be just a hint of "three major criminal enterprises" uncovered by Suffolk investigators.

Spota announced the results of a yearlong investigation that began as a sports gambling sting, but grew to uncover multimillion-dollar marijuana and illegal fireworks trafficking rings operating in Nassau, Suffolk and Queens.

Police arrested 17 suspects on assorted gambling and conspiracy charges, and continue to search for one more -- a Freeport attorney charged with helping run "hundreds of pounds" of pot from California to Long Island.

All 17 suspects were given desk appearance tickets and ordered to return to court in March. Among those arrested were Salvatore Gerrato, 45, of 2337 Hampton Ave., Seaford, who authorities said ran all three rings; Frank Lonigro, 33, of 745 Terry Rd. in Hauppauge, who helped run the marijuana and gambling operations, and accountant Stephen Tarnofsky, 59, who Spota said earned $6,000 a week running a Costa Rican wire room for the gambling ring.

All suspects face a maximum of 1 1/3 to 4 years in prison if convicted. Calls to all three men were not returned Thursday.

Spota said prosecutors will convene a special grand jury "to conduct a much more extensive investigation" and likely bring more serious charges. Spota said 30 search warrants uncovered computer and paper records indicating that the criminal operations go far deeper than investigators knew.

Spota said nine tons of illegal fireworks, transported from Maryland to Long Island, were seized in May, and that the gambling ring alone took in an average of $165,000 a week in bets. During one trip, the marijuana traffickers were found on their way to California with $300,000 cash in a Winnebago recreational vehicle -- much of it in a hidden "trap" compartment.

The owner of the vehicle, Jeffrey Ackerman, 43, of 9 Trapper Lane, Levittown, was charged with conspiracy. His attorney, Edward Burke Jr. of Sag Harbor, declined to comment.

Spota said during each trip, the suspects returned with marijuana worth $1 million to $1.5 million on the street.

Gesturing to the seized money before him, Spota said, "If it's a million dollars, than you can rest assured it's many, many, many million dollars."

Investigators used phone and electronic surveillance, including a first-of-a-kind in Suffolk computer wire tap to collect data from suspects' computers that uncovered "details that we've never seen before" on a sports betting operation.

One suspect in the marijuana ring remains at large -- attorney Andrew Petrone, 34, of 725 Miller Ave., Freeport. Authorities said Petrone has already pleaded guilty, but skipped his sentencing on drug possession charges after being stopped in June 2005 with 300 Vicodin prescription pills and $54,000 in cash.

Petrone could not be reached for comment. "We will get him," Spota said.

17 Accused In NY Gambling, Drug Rings (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- Police investigating a lucrative bookmaking operation came across a related drug smuggling ring and busted both, arresting 17 and seizing $1 million, authorities said Wednesday.

Thirteen men and a woman were arrested on gambling charges, while three men were arrested on charges of conspiracy to possess marijuana, Suffolk County District Attorney Thomas Spota said.

"Surveillance ... established that the gambling ring took in an average of $165,000 a week in bets," Spota said.

The bookmaking operation focused on professional and collegiate sports and involved electronic transfers to Costa Rica, generating $8.6 million a year, he said.

While investigators were conducting surveillance on the gambling probe they discovered two of the bookmakers were also involved in transporting marijuana from California to Long Island, authorities said. Four men were trying to buy 100 pounds of pot for $300,000 in California when the plot was thwarted, investigators said.

Police started making arrests last month. All have been released and are scheduled to be arraigned in March.

One more man, an attorney, has eluded arrest on a conspiracy charge and was being sought, prosecutors said. More arrests are expected.

Feds Say Internet Drug Ring Shut Down (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

Federal agents say they have shut down an Internet pharmacy operation and arrested four people who allegedly sold millions of dollars of illegally prescribed drugs to customers across the nation.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents are still seeking four doctors from Puerto Rico who allegedly wrote the prescriptions based on Internet health questionnaires, DEA spokeswoman Erin Mulvey said Wednesday. The agency also continues to investigate other websites that might be associated with drug operation, she said.

Antonio Quinones, 46, and three associates were arrested Dec. 21 in the Miami area and charged with drug dealing, money laundering and tax fraud, according to an indictment filed in U.S. District Court in New York.

Quinones, arrested at his Miami Beach penthouse, and his associates ran 10 websites, Mulvey said. Customers could answer a few questions about their health and then order such drugs as Vicodin and amphetamines, she said.

The doctors being sought by authorities reviewed the forms and ordered the prescriptions, Mulvey said. The sites, in operation for at least three years, did about $50,000 a day in business, she said. Such prescriptions violate laws that require a physician to meet with a patient to determine whether there is a legitimate medical need before prescribing a controlled drug.

A message left at Quinones' Miami Beach home was not returned. Agents seized $817,000 from him, along with a 54-foot boat, a Ferrari and two guns. Prosecutors are seeking $42.6 million they say was laundered through various bank accounts, the indictment says.

"They had customers all over the United States, millions of orders," Mulvey said.

The indictment alleges Quinones and his associates operated businesses under several names, including The Doctor's Online, Inc., Health Rx Marketing and Brothers Pharmacy, Inc. Agents earlier closed two pharmacies in Georgia and one in Maryland that allegedly supplied the ring, Mulvey said.

Carlsbad Man Indicted On Federal Drug Charges (CARLCA)

By Dawn Bowen

Carlsbad (NM) Current-Argus, December 28, 2006

CARLSBAD — A grand jury has indicted Ricky Green of Carlsbad on federal drug and firearm charges stemming from the seizure of illegal drugs and a gun at his home on Townsend Road in August.

Green, 45, also known as Ricky Barksdale, was arrested during the early morning hours of Aug. 31, when agents of the Pecos Valley Drug Task Force served a search warrant at his home in the 4300 block of Townsend Road.

On Dec. 21, a federal grand jury indicted him on three charges possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute, possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute and possession of a firearm in the furtherance of a drug trafficking crime.

Green was originally charged in state court, but those charges were dismissed after authorities sought federal charges against him, hoping for a more severe, longer sentence.

"We pushed for the indictment because he has a long history of selling narcotics and we wanted a stiffer penalty on the drug crimes," Commander David Edmondson of the Pecos Valley Drug Task Force said on Wednesday.

Edmondson said pursuing federal charges was the only way to ensure a stiffer penalty. He said because Green has at least three prior drug crime convictions he is eligible for a life sentence through the federal court system.

Green was released into the custody of U.S. Marshals on Oct. 10 at the Eddy County Detention Center, where he had been held in lieu of a $1 million cash bond since his arrest in August.

Green's arrest came after a three-month investigation into the trafficking of a variety of illegal drugs in the area, according to task force agents.

"He was distributing crack cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana in the Carlsbad area," Edmondson said.

According to documents filed in state court, agents seized a loaded Beretta 9mm semi-automatic pistol, 60.58 grams of crack cocaine, 18.8 grams of methamphetamine, .43 grams of heroin, 109.19 grams of marijuana, and $4,569 in cash from his home while executing the search warrant. They also found digital scales, spoons with cocaine residue on them, and a plastic bag containing numerous unused bindle bags consistent with those commonly used by drug traffickers.

Authorities have said that Green was involved in violent acts against people for drug debts in the months leading up to the arrest.

'Here We Are Prisoners' (SANBS)

By Sara A. Carter, Staff Writer

San Bernardino Sun, December 28, 2006

NUEVO LAREDO, Mexico - The gunfire was deafening. Street corners all over the city were darkened by smoke from grenades and light artillery.

The dead lay in pools of blood flowing into the gutters that drain into the Rio Grande.

Men with automatic assault rifles stood stoic after the carnage. Then, one by one, they picked up the bodies of their victims, threw them into the back of pickup trucks and headed out of downtown.

Bystanders hid inside shops, behind trash bins - wherever they could find refuge from the explosive showdown between members of rival drug cartels.

"(I watched as) the men threw the bodies into the back of the trucks and SUVs," whispered Manuel, who was working at a parking garage that day. "This city is controlled from the inside out by the cartels. ... They are killing anyone who gets in their way."

The April street violence, witnessed by several residents interviewed by The Sun's sister newspaper, the Inland Valley Daily Bulletin of Ontario, was but one recent example of how Mexico's cartels are fighting each other over the four major U.S. highway systems that provide transit routes into the United States.

Street violence has become a way of life for the nearly 380,000 residents of Mexico's most violent border city. According to law-enforcement officials in Mexico and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration officials, more than 500 people were assassinated in Nuevo Laredo in 2005. Official estimates, in news reports, put the 2005 death toll at 186.

This year, there have been nearly 500 assassinations, and the death toll continues to rise. Many of the dead either belonged to the cartels or were innocent victims of the carnage.

The violence has also changed the lives of American citizens living in Laredo, on the Texas side of the border, where kidnappings, narcotics trafficking and corruption have become common.

Laredo Police Officer James Boyd, who used to travel to Nuevo Laredo on archaeological projects, is now terrified to enter the city.

This year on a trip into Nuevo Laredo, he said he was chased by four SUVs and his car shot at several times by cartel members.

"People should know that the border has been taken hostage by the cartels," Boyd said. "So many officials try to cover up what's going on. Why? I guess they don't want the public to know the truth."

The truth is tied up in trucks, trade and transcontinental smuggling.

The World Trade Bridge between Nuevo Laredo and its sister city, Laredo, as well as Interstate 35 and highways 59, 359 and 83, are like veins feeding the Mexican syndicates, running from south Texas to as far north as Canada.

For Mexico's most powerful drug lords, controlling the routes and protecting the cargo sent along them - drugs, weapons and people - is worth the cost in lives.

It's also reason to focus U.S. border patrol efforts sharply on Nuevo Laredo, say law-enforcement officials, since the city is the largest inland port from Mexico into the United States and is a major point of origin for truck traffic into the U.S.

"Those who control Nuevo Laredo control the U.S. highways and the flow of narcotics into the United States," said Sheriff Rick Flores, whose Webb County territory runs along the Texas-Mexico border.

"This city is an open gateway for narcotics and terrorists," Flores said. "If the price is right, anyone - and I mean anyone - can move weapons of mass destruction, people and drugs into the United States."

Not one local Mexican or U.S. newspaper reported the April street violence. Reporters don't go into Nuevo Laredo's streets often, and when they do, they don't report on the cartels.

Not one Nuevo Laredo municipal police officer ever appeared at the scene, either.

It was as if the bloodbath never happened.

Cartel culture

Comandante Enrique Sanchez of the Nuevo Laredo Police Department said he couldn't recall the April shootings, although he compared the violence in Nuevo Laredo to that in Iraq.

His department has been plagued by trouble. President Vicente Fox's administration has described the city's police as corrupt, and residents said many police officers work for the Gulf Cartel, one of Mexico's most powerful narcotics-trafficking organizations.

"You never know when the bullets are going to come flying," Sanchez said during a recent tour of the city by pickup. His men, officers Roberto Zepeda, 23, and Jose Santos, 28, stood in the bed of the police vehicle, AR-15 rifles pointed toward the streets. "You never know when you're going to die."

The dead are often forgotten. The cartels dispose of bodies on the outskirts of the city in vats of acid, mutilate them in factory machines, feed them to animals or set them ablaze in gas containers until all evidence of their existence is gone.

Not one of the city's nearly 400 official murders since January 2005 has been solved.

"The attention that the assassinations have brought to the cartels has caused them to change their tactics," said Nacho, a resident who sometimes assists U.S. law enforcement with information. "The bodies are destroyed before people even realize someone's missing."

Although Colombian cartels control most of the world's production of cocaine and heroin, the most profitable part of the trade - transport to the U.S. - happens in Mexico, said Jorge Chabat, a drug expert at the Center for Economic Research and Teaching in Mexico City.

Distribution of narcotics has come under the control of various Mexican cartels, Chabat said, including Osiel Cardenas' Gulf Cartel; Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman's Sinaloa Cartel; Francisco Javier Arellano Felix's organization in Tijuana; and the Juarez Cartel, said to be led by Vicente Carrillo.

A woman who asked to be called only Lupita for her protection, and who grew up with family members of several of the city's original narcotics organizations, remembers them all.

Lupita, who works with law enforcement, also remembers a time when Nuevo Laredo was at peace, and recalled the moment everything changed.

More than 10 years ago, the city was mainly controlled by two narcotics organizations, Flores Soto and Los Chachos, Lupita said. Mario Flores Soto, the leader of Flores Soto, joined forces with the Gulf Cartel to expand his revenue and power. The Gulf Cartel wanted control of Laredo's highway systems. Flores Soto shared the city's transit routes with the cartel, pulling narcotics revenue away from Dionicio "El Chacho" Ramon Garcia, the leader of Los Chachos.

Los Chachos members were enraged, Lupita said, and kidnapped and killed Mario Flores Soto's youngest brother, Roy, and 10 of his associates.

In retaliation for the kidnappings and murders, the Gulf Cartel's paramilitary arm, Los Zetas - a group of more than 30 special-operations soldiers, deserters from the Mexican military - assassinated many of the key members of Los Chachos. It wasn't long before the surviving members of the Chachos wanted revenge, Lupita said.

"They took Dionicio, the leader, murdered him and left him in women's underwear for everyone to see," she said.

El Chacho, who was assassinated in May 2002, was on his way back from Monterrey, a city reportedly under the control of the Sinaloa Cartel, another of Mexico's most powerful narcotics organizations.

"The violence kept growing, and the methods for killing just keep getting worse," Lupita said.

Osiel Cardenas, the leader of the Gulf Cartel, was arrested on March 14, 2003, in Matamoros, Mexico. Since then, Los Zetas has been running the organization, according to sources interviewed by the Daily Bulletin.

The Sinaloa Cartel is attempting to take control of the Gulf Cartel away from Los Zetas, and is said to have the backing of many politicians and federal law-enforcement officials within Mexico.

"The reason the government never intervened (to stop the violence) is because many of the government officials from Mexico City to Nuevo Laredo are in the pocket of the cartels," Lupita said.

"Once the killing began, it never stopped. The hatred between the narcos grew stronger and stronger."

`This used to be a good place'

Nacho, whose last name is being withheld for his safety, has lived in Nuevo Laredo most of his adult life. He is a father, husband and one of the few people willing to share the dark secrets of his city.

Although he has family in the United States, he refuses to cross the border illegally to escape the danger.

"I have applied for a visa," he said. "My family already lives in fear. We don't want to escape to live illegally as fugitives.

"People need to know the truth (about Nuevo Laredo)," he continued. "This used to be a good place. Now it is a danger to anyone who enters."

Nacho parked his car near a town square. It was once a lovers' walkway where he courted his wife. Now, only a handful of people frequent its winding sidewalks or sit on its iron benches.

"I remember it being so crowded with people, and the fresh fruit, taquitos and ice-cream vendors," Nacho recalled.

When the violence in Nuevo Laredo reached a peak in June, the Fox administration began Operation Secure Mexico, sending in Mexican military and other federal law-enforcement agencies.

"There are very clear signs of a relationship between elements of the Nuevo Laredo police and drug smuggling, hence the decisive action," government spokesman Ruben Aguilar told journalists in June.

But by the end of July, the streets were empty of military.

Comandante Sanchez chuckled when asked what happened to the Mexican military who were supposed to be protecting the city.

"That's a good question," he said, a sardonic smile creasing his face. "Where are they?"

Sanchez explained that most of the troops were as afraid for their lives as Nuevo Laredo's police and citizens. Some simply left and didn't return. Others, already in the pockets of the cartels, made an early show of enforcement, then disappeared.

Nacho said the Mexican government sent the military to appease the U.S. government, "then pulled them out of the city just as fast."

While he was speaking, a man in shabby clothes stood in the middle of the street, watching Nacho's car. A Nextel phone hung from the man's waistband.

"All over the city, there are halcones or ventanas (falcons or windows)," Nacho said. "They are the eyes and the ears of the cartels."

The man directed Nacho's car into an empty parking space.

DOJ_NMG_0109599

"Never forget to tip," Nacho said as he handed a peseta to the man. "Never forget that everybody, no matter how nice they are or what they look like, could be working for the cartels.

`Nothing has changed'

"Silver or lead," said the middle- aged, white-haired man as he sipped a martini at a hotel bar in Laredo. "That's the code in Mexico. Either you pay up or you're killed."

James Kuykendall Sr., a former special agent with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration who now runs his own business in the city, knows Mexico well.

His friend and DEA partner, Enrique "Kiki" Camarena, was kidnapped, tortured and murdered by the drug cartels in 1985 while working undercover in Guadalajara. His death brought national attention to the Mexican drug war and the corruption that plagued the Mexican government.

Kuykendall's book, "O Plata O Plomo," ("Silver or Lead") published last year, focused on the events surrounding Camarena's death and how the Mexican government failed to cooperate with the DEA in the investigation.

"Nothing has changed in Mexico. If anything, it's worse," Kuykendall said.

"Kiki died a hero. He gave his life for his country. The tragedy is that the U.S. government gave up on the war on drugs decades ago. They choose to ignore the corruption that is deeply embedded in the Mexican government."

The arrests of some of Mexico's most notorious drug traffickers - the recent capture of reputed drug kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Felix being one example - are just the tip of the iceberg when it comes to cooperation, Kuykendall added.

"Every once in a while, Mexico throws us a bone," he said. "It gives the appearance of cooperation. It's a way of making everything look like it's OK. Well, it's not."

Bazookas, bullets

Nacho ran his palm over a wall in a home that had been blasted by a bazooka. Bullet holes riddled the interior of the house.

The cartels don't just use guns, he said. They have grenades, bombs and a variety of other weapons.

"This house was rented by a group of assassins with the Sinaloa Cartel," Nacho said. The assassins were sent to the city to kill members of Los Zetas, he added.

Old mattresses, cigarette boxes and empty beer bottles were the only traces of the gunmen's presence. A brick fence running alongside the house had been blown apart with such force that the bricks were nothing but crumbled dust.

"Sometimes I just can't believe what's happened to this city," Nacho said.

Around the corner from the home, an image of Our Lady of Guadalupe, Mexico's patron saint, loomed over the neighborhood. Fresh flowers and candles stood at the base of a portrait painted on the brick wall.

"She will bring us peace," said a young girl, smiling as she walked past Nacho.

Just a few yards away, a group of young men with Nextel phones made it clear Nacho was in the wrong part of town. They only had to look at him.

"We better go," he said. "It's not good to stand around here for too long. There are many good people in this city, but you never know."

`We are prisoners'

Hector cut some cilantro and dropped it into a small bowl. He is the only vendor left at a small placita near the center of town, and his 10-year-old business is barely surviving the violence.

"I remember when I couldn't keep up with the tourists," he said as he put freshly cooked carnitas into a tortilla. The smell of cilantro, onions and pork filled the air.

"I used to have a lot of competition. Now I'm the only one left at the square, and I make less than half of what I used to make."

Nuevo Laredo once was noted for its tourism, colorful street vendors and booming border economy. But the drug violence has made this city of 400,000 a wasteland of lost businesses and lost lives.

More than 100 businesses have moved from Nuevo Laredo to Laredo over the past three years. And while its Texas sister is reaping the rewards of the World Trade Bridge and a growing economy, Nuevo Laredo residents are struggling to make ends meet.

Roll-down security shutters cover the large display windows of shops in the artisan district near the border. Dental offices and pharmacies that once thrived off American consumers have closed because the violence is keeping those customers away. For Sale and For Rent signs posted on the closed doors are pointed reminders of what the city has become.

"In Laredo, life is different," Hector said. "Here we are prisoners. In our city, we learn to live with the devil."CARTEL KINGS

Francisco Javier Arellano Felix: Was considered one of Mexico's most dangerous cartel leaders until he was captured off the coast of Baja California on Aug. 16, while on a fishing excursion. The Arellano-Felix family, which is extensive, is said to still control billions of dollars in cocaine, heroin and marijuana shipments to the United States.

Dionicio Ramon Garcia: Known as "El Chacho," Ramon Garcia was the leader of Los Chachos of Nuevo Laredo. He aligned himself with the Sinaloa Cartel, then was tortured and murdered by Sinaloa's rival, the Gulf Cartel, in May 2002. The Gulf Cartel dressed his dead body in women's undergarments to humiliate his family and the group.

Joaquin Guzman: Known as "El Chapo," he is considered one of Mexico's most powerful cartel leaders. Guzman heads the Sinaloa Cartel, which has been in a fierce battle with the Gulf Cartel for control of the Nuevo Laredo border. His organization has expanded and developed alliances with other drug lords across Mexico. Those alliances are known as the "Federation" or "Golden Triangle." Guzman is believed to have the support of corrupt Mexican government officials.

Vicente Carrillo Fuentes: Head of the Juarez Cartel, and the right-hand man to Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman of the Sinaloa Cartel. He is wanted for murder, money laundering, narcotics trafficking and a slew of other crimes. The U.S. State Department is offering a

$5 million reward for information leading to his arrest and conviction.

Osiel Cardenas Guillen: Leader of the Gulf Cartel, otherwise known as the Cardenas-Guillen family, which controls most of the Mexico-Texas border. The cartel is based in Nuevo Laredo. Cardenas Guillen was arrested on March 14, 2003. According to DEA intelligence officials, he continues to run his operation from his cell at the maximum-security Las Palmas prison outside Mexico City.

Arturo Martinez: "El Tejas" operates out of Nuevo Laredo. His cartel, Los Tejas, banded with the Gulf Cartel and forced his former partner, Dionicio "El Chacho" Garcia to align with Sinaloa. Martinez still controls large areas of Nuevo Laredo.

Gregorio Sauceda Gamboa: Part of the Gulf Cartel. Sauceda, known as "El Goyo," controls most of the Mexican border areas of Reynosa and Matamoros. Gamboa married into the Cardenas family. According to intelligence officials, a rift developed between him and Cardenas over his drug use and alcoholism. This month, he was demoted from deputy in the cartel.

Armando Valencia: Valencia, whose cartel is known as Los Valencias, was captured in 2003 in Mexico. Los Valencias still has strong ties to Colombian cocaine traffickers, and the organization has remained strong after aligning with the Sinaloa Cartel. The cartel uses the port of Lazaro Cardenas to move cocaine and other narcotics into Mexico. Members of the organization also are suspected of selling narcotics in the United States.

Ismael "El Mayo" Zambada: El Mayo's organization is based out of the resort city of Mazatlan, but has substantial control of the Mexican border state of Sonora. El Mayo is considered a powerful cartel leader, and his alliance with "El Chapo" Guzman has extended their power all along the U.S.-Mexico border. In 2003, his organization was a target of a U.S.-Mexico drug sting, Operation Trifecta, which lasted 19 months and led to 240 arrests. "El Mayo" was never found and is a fugitive wanted by both countries.BY THE NUMBERS

Mexican Journalists Caught In The Crossfire Of City's Drug-cartel Wars (SANBS)

By Sara A. Carter, Staff Writer

San Bernardino Sun, December 28, 2006

NUEVO LAREDO, Mexico - A bulletproof barrier covers the front entrance of El Manana, one of the largest newspapers in the state of Tamaulipas, Mexico.

El Manana employees put up the barrier after three masked gunmen with grenades and assault rifles burst into the newspaper's reception area Feb. 6 and started shooting. As they fired, they shouted angrily against the paper's investigations into the growing violence and drug wars in Nuevo Laredo.

DOJ_NMG_0109601

The day before, the newspaper had published the photo of a Federal Preventive Police agent injured in a gunbattle a few days earlier. The paper linked the federal agent to the Sinaloa Cartel, the main rival of the Gulf Cartel. The Gulf Cartel controls narcotics traffic along the U.S.-Mexico border in Nuevo Laredo.

Because the attack happened late in the evening, only a handful of employees were in the office. One of them was the paper's veteran crime reporter, Jaime Orozco Tey, 41.

According to sources close to the incident, Orozco Tey was dedicated to his job and fought hard to expose the growing violence in the city.

He had written numerous articles on the cartels and walked a thin line even inside his own paper, where some editors and journalists are believed to work as spies for the Gulf Cartel's military arm, Los Zetas.

The gunmen shot Orozco Tey several times in the back and abdomen. He was paralyzed. Another employee was killed.

The assassins disappeared as quickly as they came. After tossing a grenade into the building, the men jumped into waiting SUVs and sped away.

The message was clear, said employees of the paper: Don't investigate or report on the narco-wars anymore.

"If anyone knew I was talking to a reporter, they'd kill me," said an El Manana employee several months after the attack.

The employee, who spoke on condition of anonymity, pointed to two men standing by the barrier outside the front door, smoking and chatting. "They spy on everyone inside the newspaper, and almost everyone knows they get money from Los Zetas to do it," the worker said.

More than 400 journalists have been killed in Latin America over the past four decades. Since 1992, 13 journalists have been murdered in Mexico in connection with narcotics reporting, according to the U.S.-based nonprofit Committee to Protect Journalists, which offers detailed accounts of journalists killed around the globe.

"Journalists are front-line victims of the social crisis in Latin America, where official corruption, drug trafficking, unrestrained criminality, social violence and a background of political instability has made an impact in many countries," stated Gregorio Salazar, Latin American regional coordinator for the International Federation of Journalists.

Because of the growing violence in Nuevo Laredo, the Mexican federal government sent soldiers and federal and state police into the city in March 2005. In June 2005, President Vicente Fox's administration began Operation Safe Mexico, which targeted the cartels. But it couldn't stop the growing violence and ultimately was a failure, said residents interviewed by The Sun's sister newspaper, the Inland Valley Daily Bulletin of Ontario. A little more than a month after arriving, the federal soldiers were gone.

The government announced a new operation - Northern Border - in mid-March 2006. Under the program, 600 to 800 Federal Protective Police officers were deployed to Nuevo Laredo, according to the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy.

In a July interview, a Mexican police official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said many of the agents under the Northern Border initiative have either left the city or are working for the cartels.

Shortly after the new initiative, assassins gunned down four federal agents working for the intelligence unit of the Federal Protective Police. The agents had been conducting surveillance of an office building where Federal Investigative agents, similar to FBI agents, were stationed. Residents said municipal police passed through the area just minutes before a group of gunmen in SUVs opened fire on the agents.

"I don't like to remember that day," said a witness who works on Guerrero Street, where the killings occurred. "Children were still in school down the street, and the gunfire seemed to go on forever. In the end, the men were dead and the killers were gone."

Orozco Tey couldn't write that story.

He is paralyzed after suffering spinal-cord damage in the February attack. His location and that of his family are well guarded from those who still may want revenge, said a source close to the family.

"He should've died that evening," the source said. "He is a great journalist, father and husband. He was courageous and searched for the truth. But no one has ever been brought to justice - and I don't think anyone ever will."

Other Nuevo Laredo journalists who became casualties of the drug war include:

On March 10, Ramiro Tellez Contreras, a local radio reporter and police station switchboard operator, was murdered as he was leaving his home on the north side of the city. He was shot by gunmen in the early morning. Tellez worked for radio station Exa 95.7 FM. According to those who knew him, he had recently received threats.

In April 2005, radio journalist Guadalupe Garcia Escamilla was shot at least nine times outside her office and died a week later.

According to several sources inside the city, the cartels have blackmailed, threatened, killed and forced reporters to slant stories to the benefit of the drug kingpins.

"What people don't realize was that Guadalupe was under the control of the cartels as well," said a source with ties to El Manana. "She was spouting propaganda for the rival cartel. It was a planned attack to shut her up. They had already warned her with death threats in the past."

On March 14, 2004, Roberto Javier Mora Garcia, El Manana's editorial director, was stabbed more than 25 times in front of his home. Residents found him lying dead next to his car early that morning.

"I feel sick when I think about what has happened to my colleagues," said one source. "You never know if you're going to come home alive."

IMMIGRATION:

Arrests Of Illegal Migrants Drops Sharply Since U.S. National Guard Troops Sent To Border (FINDLAW/AP)

By Olga R. Rodriguez, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

(AP) - NOGALES, Mexico-Arrests of illegal migrants along the U.S.-Mexico border have dropped by more than a third since U.S. National Guard troops started helping with border security, hinting at a drop in attempted crossings, the U.S. Border Patrol said Tuesday.

U.S. Border Patrol agents arrested 149,238 fewer people from the start of July through November, down 34 percent from the same period last year, according to monthly figures provided by U.S. Border Patrol spokesman Mario Martinez.

Arrests also had dropped by 9 percent for the same period from 2004 to 2005. If the downward trend continues, it would be the first sustained decrease in illegal immigrant arrests since shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Border Patrol officials usually attribute a drop in arrests to fewer people crossing.

"We have seen some tangible results," Martinez said. "But we'll have to see over the next few months if it holds up. We are optimistic but we can't make a full analysis (yet)."

National Guard troops started arriving along the border June 15, and 6,000 were in place by August.

The troops are not allowed to detain migrants and have been limited to keeping a watch on surveillance cameras and body heat detectors, but they have freed Border Patrol agents and "have helped us tremendously to detect illegal migration traffic," Martinez said.

Victor Clark, a Mexican migration expert in Tijuana, says many migrants fear they will confront U.S. soldiers on the border.

"The presence of the National Guard has had a big impact on migrants," he told The Associated Press on Tuesday.

And border security is only going to get tougher. The United States plans to expand the Border Patrol from just over 11,000 agents to about 18,000 by 2008. The U.S. also plans to build 700 miles (1,126 kilometers) of additional border fence.

Other measures may also be deterring crossers.

In July, U.S. and Mexican officials started working together to prosecute human smugglers on both sides of the border.

U.S. immigration officials also have been raiding U.S. companies for illegal workers. Earlier this month, 1,300 people were detained in a sweep of meatpacking plants in six states.

Added to that, smugglers have increased their fees, charging as much as US$3,000 (â,¬2,270) to hide migrants in their cars and drive them across the border. Before the National Guard troops arrived, the price was about US$2,000 (â,¬1,500), migrant activists say.

Still, border experts say the downturn may be temporary while smugglers search for new routes and migrants come up with the money to pay the higher fees.

Edgar Velasquez admits it's become tougher to cross. He spent three days walking in freezing temperatures through the remote mountain country west of Tucson, Arizona, and still was caught.

Agents found a body in those mountains Dec. 19. But that did not deter Velasquez, who said he planned to slip across the Arizona border during the holiday week when he hoped the U.S. patrols will be short-handed as agents take vacations.

"I imagine they also want to be with their families," said Velasquez, resting in the border city of Nogales before embarking on his illegal odyssey to reach a construction job in Florida.

Gustavo Soto, a spokesman with the U.S. Border Patrol Tucson sector, said smugglers often tell migrants there are less border agents out in the desert on holidays or when the weather is bad, "even though we have surveillance on the border 24/7 and 365 days of year."

Some migrants are simply giving up after a single try, something that was almost unheard of only a few years ago.

Esther Ardia walked for nearly three days as temperatures dropped to 14 degrees Fahrenheit (minus 10 Celsius) in the Arizona desert, trying to get back to her job at a North Carolina pine-tree farm.

Ardia, 21, couldn't keep up with the group of about 30 illegal migrants and was abandoned by her smuggler after her legs cramped up. She was picked up by the Border Patrol and returned to Mexico.

"I knew it would be hard, but I thought I could make it," said Ardia. "It's very hard. I'm not going to try (to cross) again."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Corporate Allies In Congress's Cross Hairs (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON

When Republicans expanded their majority in 2004, their first target was the trial lawyers, virtual ATM dispensers for Democratic candidates. A new law curbing class-action lawsuits was on the president's desk by mid-February.

Now, Democrats are targeting some of the GOP's strongest corporate allies - Big Oil, big pharmaceutical companies, and, in all likelihood, defense contractors.

In their first 100 legislative hours, Democrats aim to negotiate lower drug prices for seniors, roll back subsidies for oil and gas companies, and reduce the cost of student loans. They're also quickly gearing up to investigate allegations of corruption in war contracting.

"Parties reward their constituency groups, and they go after the other party's constituency groups. Parties are never stronger than in the first few days, so they do it early," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville.

Moreover, it's popular. "You can't find people supporting big drug and oil companies, except the people who work in them," Professor Sabato says. For example, some 85 percent of Americans say the government should negotiate prescription-drug prices for the Medicare program, according to a recent poll by the Kaiser Family Foundation.

When the GOP-controlled Congress passed the Medicare prescription-drug bill in 2003, it included a one-line provision that banned the government from negotiating directly with drug companies to lower prices for seniors, as it now does for veterans. Rep. Billy Tauzin (R) of Louisiana, who drafted that provision, left Congress to become the top lobbyist for the drug industry as president and CEO of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America (PhRMA) - a controversial move that Democrats say they will make less likely with new lobby-reform legislation.

If that ban on price negotiating is lifted, House Democrats say that seniors overall could cut their drug costs by as much as $180 billion over the next 10 years. A study last year by the consumer group Families USA found that 19 of 20 drugs were priced lower through the Veterans Administration than they were for Medicare recipients.

But critics, including the White House and the Department of Health and Human Services, say that drug prices are already falling faster than expected under the 2003 law, and that mandating government to negotiate drug prices could limit the access to drugs for seniors.

Under the current prescription-drug bill, seniors are already saving an average of $1,200 a year on prescription drugs, according to the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. And the cost to the Treasury is about $30 billion, instead of $43 billion as anticipated.

The conflict sets up one of the first big battles of the 110th Congress. Since 1990, drug companies have contributed more than $134 million to national candidates, more than two-thirds of that to Republicans, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. The industry doubled its political contributions in the run-up to the 2003 legislation.

"Critics would have you believe that there are no negotiations in how prices for medicine are set. That's simply not true," said Ken Johnson, PhRMA's senior vice president, in a statement after the November elections in anticipation of the Democrats' proposal. "The negotiations are occurring - as they should be - between prescription drug plans, several of which already purchase medicines on behalf of tens of millions of Americans, and pharmaceutical companies. That's the marketplace in action and that's how America's seniors will see true savings without compromising the search for future cures."

But despite broad public support for lifting a ban, Democrats are divided on how to proceed and have yet to release specifics of their proposal. Max Baucus (D) of Montana, incoming Senate Finance Chairman, opposed a bipartisan plan in the 109th Congress that would have required the Department of Health and Human Services to get involved in negotiations between private drug plans and drug companies in some cases. If House Democrats lift the ban, as expected, Senator Baucus says he will conduct hearings on its likely impact. Meanwhile, HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt has already signaled that if given the opportunity to negotiate lower drug prices, he would not exercise it.

Similarly, Democratic calls to roll back subsidies for Big Oil are also popular, but problematic. In the first days of the new Congress, Democrats are calling for establishing a fund to promote renewable energy and conservation, which they say will be funded by money recovered from oil companies.

"Every oil subsidy will be given the highest level of scrutiny. We've been paying record energy prices at a time when Big Oil is making record profits - and record CEO compensation packages. It's unconscionable," says Drew Hammill, spokesman for incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

But even before Congress reworks subsidies provided in the Energy Policy Act of 2005, Democrats will take up proposals to recover royalties from oil and gas companies in the Gulf of Mexico. Because of a gaffe in 1998-99 oil leases, negotiated during the Clinton administration, companies have avoided some $10 billion in royalty payments. Republicans in the 109th Congress tried to go after these lost revenues; Democrats say they will push harder.

"The companies have not done anything wrong. We're a nation of law, and contract law is one of the cornerstones of our economy," says Red Cavaney, president and CEO of the American Petroleum Institute, the industry trade group. Under an agreement announced Dec. 14, five companies - BP, ConocoPhillips, Shell Oil, Marathon Oil, and Walter Oil and Gas Corp. - have already reached an agreement with the federal government to pay royalties on production that began on or after Oct. 1, 2006. "Why not let the process continue," he says.

Both the outgoing chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, Rep Thomas Davis (R) of Virginia, and incoming chairman Henry Waxman (D) of California have pledged to go after all lost royalties. Forty-one other companies are currently not paying royalties under the terms of these leases.

Still, the biggest wild card for energy companies such as Halliburton in the 110th Congress isn't energy subsidies, it's the scope of congressional investigations into wartime contracts. House Democrats are reviving an investigative subcommittee that was eliminated when Republicans took back the House in 1995. That panel will target both Defense contractors and White House officials who contracted with them, aides say.

Medicare Premiums Will Surge For Some (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

When new income-based premiums for Medicare's Part B program go into effect next month, some seniors will get an unwelcome surprise: Their monthly costs will be going up considerably more than expected because of the government's method of counting their income.

In addition to income from investments, pensions and wages, seniors will find that big but unusual windfalls -- from house sales, for instance, or from taking cash from an individual retirement account -- will also be included in government calculations.

As a result, an advocacy group for seniors says, tens of thousands of people will be counted as wealthy even though their continuing yearly income is modest. Some will be paying as much as $800 more a year for Part B coverage because they are deemed to be "higher income beneficiaries." This will be on top of the $93.50 a month standard premium that all recipients will pay.

"We are concerned that our members are just now finding out that the government is suddenly increasing seniors' Part B premiums without adequate warning," Shannon Benton, executive director of the Senior Citizens League, said in a statement.

"Making matters worse, some seniors will have a difficult time with the appeal process, perhaps having to drive hours to appear in person -- an option many seniors simply don't have available to them," she said.

Mark Hinkle, a spokesman for the Social Security Administration, said that a small number of people will indeed have to pay more for their 2007 premiums because of large 2005 capital gains reported on their income tax returns. But he said that the premiums would go down in future years once the capital gains are no longer part of a recipient's tax return.

Congress, he said, listed a number of "life-changing events," such as divorce, death of a spouse or loss of a job, that could reduce a beneficiary's premium. But capital gains from the sale of a house or an IRA payout are not on the list, he said, and so are treated no differently than wages when calculating the premium.

On its Web site, Social Security details how Part B participants can question or challenge their new premium assessments.

Provisions for "means testing" the Medicare Part B program, starting in 2007, were included in the Medicare Prescription Drug Improvement and Modernization Act of 2003. It was a contentious issue then and remains one now -- with some arguing the extra money it will bring in is needed to keep Medicare solvent, while others say it will weaken the program and result in wealthier people opting out. Means testing was included in the bill by a Republican-dominated Senate-House conference committee, although neither body had included the provision in its bill.

The actual determination of a beneficiary's income, and how much people will have to pay in Part B premiums for 2007, is made by the Social Security Administration and based on 2005 income tax returns. Letters from Social Security have been going out to Medicare beneficiaries nationwide this month telling them whether they have to pay additional Part B premiums because of their income.

Medicare's Part B covers doctor and outpatient hospital bills. The program pays about 75 percent of an average beneficiary's costs through taxes, with the remaining quarter paid through monthly premiums.

Under the new, means-tested rules, most recipients will continue to pay 25 percent of the Part B costs through their premiums, while "higher income" beneficiaries will pay progressively, and sometimes dramatically, more over the next three years. The higher-income group is defined as individuals with an income of more than $80,000 and couples with an income of more than $160,000.

The Senior Citizens League, an advocacy group with 1.2 million members, has been getting calls from seniors complaining about their new premiums. One Tennessee member, for instance, told league officials that he sold a second home in Indiana in 2005 and paid taxes on the proceeds. Now he has learned that, based on that capital gain, his Part B premium would increase next year from $93.50 per month to $124.70.

Pelosi To Visit Baltimore Childhood Home (WT/AP)

By Kristen Wyatt

DOJ_NMG_0109606

BALTIMORE -- Before Nancy Pelosi takes the reins of the U.S. House next week, the California Democrat will visit a row house in Baltimore's Little Italy neighborhood.

It was where the nation's first female House speaker grew up and learned politics long before she was old enough to vote.

The youngest of six, Mrs. Pelosi was born into a political family in a house always full of strangers asking for help.

Thirty years before going to Congress, Nancy D'Alesandro was brokering political deals for constituents of her father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., who served as Baltimore mayor from 1947 to 1959 and as a congressman from 1939 to 1947.

"She got her basic training in politics right in this room," recalled one of her older brothers, Nicholas D'Alesandro, 72, who still in lives in the Little Italy row house, now home to a health clinic on the ground floor. "We gave help to hundreds, thousands of people. It was the kind of thing she was raised to do."

The political breeding didn't convince Mrs. Pelosi's playmates that she was destined tobe second in line for the presidency.

Childhood friends said they never imagined Mrs. Pelosi's political career eclipsing those of her father and her brother, Thomas D'Alesandro III, who served one term as mayor from 1967 to 1971.

"Nancy was a very quiet, shy young lady," said Mary Ann Campanella, 65, who played with Mrs. Pelosi as a child and still lives in Baltimore's Little Italy.

"She had no interest whatsoever in politics at the time. That's what made us so shocked -- she was a very quiet shy young lady," Miss Campanella said. "But I remember we were all in awe of her being the little princess and riding in the open-top cars in the parades. Still, we're can't believe how far she's come."

So proud is Little Italy of Mrs. Pelosi's political ascension that the city will name part of Mrs. Pelosi's childhood street for her.

Neighbors also want to see her name added to the neighborhood bocce court, now named for Mrs. Pelosi's father.

Mrs. Pelosi will attend a ceremony to name the street Tuesday to kick off four days of festivities to celebrate her becoming speaker.

Mrs. Pelosi also plans to visit her Washington alma mater, Trinity Washington University, in a tour designed to show the nation she is not a California-bred liberal, but a good Roman Catholic girl from a working-class neighborhood.

The message is not lost on the Rev. Michael Salerno, a priest at St. Leo the Great, the Catholic church Mrs. Pelosi attended as a child.

Father Salerno didn't minister to Mrs. Pelosi as a child, but he will say a few words at the street naming next week.

"Fifty, 60 years ago a woman never even got to venture out of the neighborhood. Now one of our daughters is going to be speaker. It's amazing," Father Salerno said.

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly said that visiting Little Italy and Baltimore "always has the feeling of a homecoming" for Mrs. Pelosi.

"It has always had a special place in her heart," Mr. Daly wrote of Baltimore.

Scene Change How Much Does A Neighborhood Affect The Poor? (WSJ)

By Jon E. Hilsenrath And Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

JACKSONVILLE, N.C. -- A decade ago, Lydia Grayson got as far away from her drug-addled, East Harlem housing project as she could. At the time, she was a 28-year-old mother of three, and, she says, a drug user. She took a federal housing voucher and packed her family on a Greyhound bus with one-way tickets to North Carolina.

Climbing out of poverty hasn't been as easy as getting on the bus. She says her life is now drug-free and more stable, and her children are growing up in a better environment. Yet in many ways, her struggles traveled with her.

"You really need to have a focus to get out of the ghetto," says Ms. Grayson, a New York native.

Her experience offers clues to a question society has wrestled with for years: Can a family escape poverty by getting out of the neighborhood where it takes root? It also sheds light on the government's shifting efforts to use housing policy as a solution to poverty.

A $16 billion federal infrastructure has built up around housing vouchers designed to give poor families more choices about where to live. About two million families currently use "Section 8" vouchers that allow them to move with subsidized rent.

Since 1993, the government has been demolishing urban housing projects and forcing families to resettle in other places, sometimes with vouchers.

After Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, nearly 30,000 families, many extremely poor, turned to the federal government for vouchers after they were displaced, according to the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Ms. Grayson's move was part of a government test designed to study the effects of a new neighborhood on poverty in the way a researcher studies the effects of a new drug.

Beginning in 1994, the federal government offered a lottery for housing vouchers to families in five major cities. Families were randomly assigned to different groups. One group received vouchers to be used specifically to subsidize rents in neighborhoods where poverty was low. About 860 families eventually moved.

Another group, of 1,440 families, wasn't offered vouchers and, initially at least, stayed in high-poverty neighborhoods. Researchers have since tracked and compared the fortunes of the two groups.

The program, called Moving to Opportunity, was administered by HUD. A private firm called Abt Associates was contracted to track participants. Researchers at Harvard, Princeton, Northwestern and other institutions played a role in designing studies related to the program and analyzing the data.

When the program was launched, housing vouchers were seen as a promising antidote to urban poverty. Researchers had pinpointed ghettos as a culprit in the worsening fortunes of many poor, minority families. Free them from the poisonous cocktail of drugs and crime brewing in city ghettos, scholars reasoned, and the families would have a chance to leave poverty behind.

But results show that may only partially be true. "It would have been wonderful to have discovered the magic bullet," says Jeffrey Liebman, a Harvard economist who has studied the program.

Findings, he says, were more complicated. Among them: boys whose families moved actually fared worse than boys who stayed in bad neighborhoods. Girls, however, fared significantly better. Adults felt better, physically and mentally, than those who stayed behind, but didn't do better financially.

The Moving to Opportunity program, started in 1994, was a mix of liberal and conservative policy: hatched by Republican Jack Kemp and implemented by the Clinton administration. But later that year, in Baltimore -- one of the five cities participating -- suburbanites rebelled against the idea that poor families from troubled environments would be flocking to their neighborhoods. Plans to move additional families were canceled.

Over time, researchers followed the families who moved, comparing them with those who stayed. The fortunes of the families involved were surprising: Earnings of families who relocated to low-poverty areas averaged just $9,376 in 2001, a half-decade after they moved. That's just 3% higher than the $9,108 earned by those in the control group, a statistically insignificant difference.

Other measures improved. In a 2002 survey of 3,521 adults in the program -- most of them women -- 18.5% of people who moved to low-poverty neighborhoods suffered bouts of major depression, significantly lower than the 26.3% who felt depressed in the control group. Mr. Liebman, the Harvard economist, says that's roughly the same effect that's seen when depressed people are put on a regimen of antidepressant drugs.

Among nearly 800 teenage girls, 83% of those who relocated to low-poverty neighborhoods had either graduated from high school or were still in school five years after the move, compared with 71% in the control group. Alcohol use was lower. Arrest rates were lower. And mental-health measures improved. Away from the violence of the ghetto, girls seemed to flourish.

Teenage boys didn't. School participation deteriorated and property-crime rates, mental distress, and smoking all increased among those who moved with the vouchers, compared with teenage boys in families who didn't move. For property crime, there were 58 arrests for every 100 boys who moved to low-poverty neighborhoods, compared with 22 arrests for every 100 boys in the control group.

Because boys hang out more in their neighborhoods, researchers expected they would respond well to safer, more-affluent environments. Instead, many seemed to feel isolated in the new places, or harassed by police, and they acted out.

"It seems like the boys were less able to make social connections to their new areas," says Jeffrey Kling, a Brookings Institution economist who designed many of the Moving to Opportunity studies and interviewed participants. (See more on Dr. Kling's work.11)

The results ring true to Zack Sanders, 20. Last year, as part of a similar housing-mobility program, he moved with his grandmother to a quiet suburban home in Mesquite, Texas, away from the rough neighborhoods in and around Dallas where he was raised. His grandmother, Diana Sanders, 61, says she relishes the tranquility of her new home. Her voucher covers $875 of the $1,325 rent. But Mr. Sanders says he misses his old friends and neighborhood, where he walked to hamburger joints, played basketball and dominoes, and could make quick trips to the mall to talk to girls.

"I feel like I'm on Mars," he says. Most evenings he borrows his sister's car and drives to his old neighborhood, where he hangs out until midnight.

Yet Mr. Sanders's 9-year-old niece, Desiree Griggs, whom his grandmother is also raising, is thriving. She spends hours a day in her quiet room, reading and playing with dolls.

"When she goes into her room, nobody bothers her. She can relax," Ms. Sanders says. Desiree made the school honor roll, she adds. Ms. Sanders, who has a history of high-blood pressure and heart disease, says the move has helped her health. In a safer environment, she feels less tense and walks 30 minutes a day.

Harvard sociologist William Julius Wilson, who diagnosed the social isolation of the inner-city poor in the 1980s, says some families didn't thrive in mobility experiments because they didn't move far enough from their old neighborhoods. Some stayed so close that they didn't even switch school districts. "If they had been able to move children to better school districts," he says, "you might have had better outcomes."

Researchers agree that relocating people to combat poverty is a complex strategy at best. "What do you do with a program that helps some people a lot, and doesn't help others or hurts them?" says Todd Richardson, deputy director of HUD's Program Evaluation Division.

Overall, he says, it's better to move people than leave them in giant housing projects with high concentrations of poverty, one reason HUD has been demolishing public housing. But to make moves successful, scholars say, more counseling and support of those uprooted might help. Some of the families in the test are still being tracked and HUD is about to undertake a study to look at the impacts 10 years after a move.

The experience of Ms. Grayson, the Harlem transplant, shows the kind of mixed results they seem likely to find.

She was living on the 15th floor of a housing project when she heard about the Moving to Opportunity program in 1996. At the time, she says she was on welfare, trying to overcome a crack addiction. Her three children were underfed, poorly clothed and surrounded by cocaine users.

When she was selected for the housing voucher, she and her children moved to Jacksonville, N.C., where she had a cousin.

Ms. Grayson wanted a different environment for her children. She recalls scenes of drug use in her childhood home and drinking malt liquor at the age of 11. "She was a pretty tough kid," says John Goehring, a retired teacher at the Lakeside School, a Spring Valley, N.Y., school for troubled teens she attended. But she was bright, he recalls. After she earned a high-school equivalency diploma, he received a card from her that read: "I'm so happy. Tears are coming to my eyes. I won't let you down."

"I didn't really have a lot of positive people in my life," says Ms. Grayson. She started college in New York, but became pregnant with her first child, Stanley, and dropped out.

Her move to North Carolina was an almost immediate struggle. The Moving to Opportunity program provided some counseling, but it tended to focus on those who didn't move far away. Because Ms. Grayson moved so far, she was effectively on her own.

On advice from her cousin, she moved to a remote spot about 15 miles outside of Jacksonville. She couldn't afford gas to heat her home. In the winter, she sat up late shivering and crying. She says she walked about two miles to work at a school cafeteria, where she earned $5.15 an hour. She also got back into drugs, she says. Before her first year in North Carolina was up, she left her place and moved with her children into a homeless shelter, closer to town.

"That's where the trouble started," says her son, Stanley Grayson, now 19. Other children at school started teasing him. He responded by skipping school and getting into fights. "That was the worst part of my life," he says.

For the next few years, Ms. Grayson moved around Jacksonville, trying to find a place to settle with her voucher. She says one neighborhood, near a mall, was populated by the kind of drug users who made her want to leave New York. A quiet area with one-story homes and small yards was too far from work since she didn't have a car.

As they moved, Stanley struggled. When he was 14, his mother sent him to Florida where his father lived. He eventually was sent to a youth-detention facility on gun-possession charges, he and his mother say.

Stanley says if he had stayed in New York, other family members might have kept him out of trouble. In North Carolina, "I felt really lonely," he says. "There was nobody I could talk to."

At the same time, Ms. Grayson has changed her life for the better. She says she is drug-free, and her two younger children seem to have settled into life in North Carolina. Kevin, 16, became involved in sports and has a job at a KFC restaurant. His mother says he's involved in his school's Junior Reserve Officer Training Corps program. Khadijah, 12, is being home-schooled by her mother.

Ms. Grayson says her faith has been a stabilizing force. "If it weren't for God, I wouldn't make it," she says. She cites the influence of Venice Cross, a preacher who she says helped her overcome her drug addiction.

"You can move a person out of the ghetto and into the suburb," says Ms. Cross. "But if their brain is still thinking ghetto-thinking, they're going to bring the ghetto out to the suburb. You've got to change a person's thinking." Ms. Cross, a follower of the World Harvest Church, an Ohio-based evangelical group, doesn't have a church, so she preaches to a small group in homes and at local parks.

While following Ms. Cross, Ms. Grayson got to know the preacher's brother, Joseph, a retired New York City maintenance worker. She married him last year.

Earlier this year, they found a small apartment in a two-story building. A sign in the parking lot warns visitors against carrying handguns. By then, Ms. Grayson had landed a $9.74-an-hour job as a record keeper at a nearby hospital. "I never really held down a real job" before then, she says.

Ten years after leaving New York, however, challenges remain. In July, Ms. Grayson lost her job. She says she missed too much work taking care of her son Kevin after he was in a car accident. Her son Stanley was released from the correctional facility earlier this year and stayed with her for a few months. Stanley, who now lives in Florida, has hopes of becoming a rap-music artist.

The family has been helped by her husband's income doing construction work, Ms. Grayson says, but it hasn't been enough. In August, she started collecting federal unemployment benefits. They will expire early in 2007.

Ms. Grayson says she's applied for a few jobs, but hasn't landed anything. "Sometimes I get discouraged," she says. "I'd be lying if I said I didn't. But you gotta live."

Charity For Charities (WSJ)

By Arthur C. Brooks

Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Many nonprofit leaders in America could not be more pleased at the Democratic takeover of Congress in a few days. For years, they have complained (justifiably or not) that Congress has underfunded critical nonprofit services. They look forward expectantly to an environment in which Congress -- they imagine -- will tap the keg of cash for nonprofits, from symphony orchestras to soup kitchens.

It remains to be seen whether the Democratic Congress will actually be more profligate than the Republicans were; after all, part of the reason the Republicans lost substantial conservative support in the 2006 midterm election was the fiscal bender Congress has been on for the past few years. But even less clear is whether greater government subsidies are in the interest of the charities themselves.

One large nonprofit organization that helps the poor in New York state illustrates this point. The agency was relatively small a few years ago, but provided a critical service in several cities. The state, taking notice of the organization's good work, began pouring money into operations, doubling and tripling its budget. The staff was focused on managing and spending the public dollars, and allocated less and less of its time to private fundraising -- which, predictably, vanished. When the state, facing budget cutbacks, began to reduce the organization's subsidy, it led to service cuts and layoffs because there were no private funds to fill the gap. Ironically, the organization and its clients were worse off than they would have been had the nonprofit received no government "help" in the first place.

This experience is hardly unique -- indeed, nonprofits and their communities all across America are exposed in the same way when government funding grows as a source of support. According to the National Center for Charitable Statistics, a quarter of human service charities in 2002 received at least 50% of their income from the government. This represents a lot of risk, because public funding is pro-cyclical: It increases or decreases more than changes in the economy, and thus can destabilize nonprofits. In contrast, charitable donations stabilize charities because they fluctuate less than the economy as a whole. For a charitable organization, relying on government funding as the main income source is like investing your 401(k) entirely in biotech stocks: You might do great -- for awhile.

But the problem with government money goes beyond just its volatility: Studies by economists over the past decade have demonstrated that government spending on nonprofit activities actually lowers private charitable giving. In the case of social welfare services, a dollar in government funding to nonprofits generally suppresses private giving by 25 cents or more. Part of this is due to a lower perception of need among charities when they get public money. There is also evidence, however, that charities spend less effort fundraising after governments give them money.

The bottom line is that there is nothing free about cash from the government. Perhaps this should come as no surprise, given what we know about the effects of public subsidies to individuals, such as welfare recipients. I would not argue that the destabilizing effects of government subsidies and the downward pressure on giving are reasons to eliminate public funding to nonprofits. But these effects do represent serious unintended consequences of nonprofit reliance on the government. Charities and policy makers should remember this in the new congressional regime.

Trump Cards (WSJ)

By Thomas J. Bray

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

DETROIT -- It hasn't been the merriest of holiday seasons in Michigan. Recently Ford Motor Co. offered modest buyouts to 38,000 hourly employees, more than half its unionized work force in the U.S. General Motors Corp. and its former parts division, the now-bankrupt Delphi Co., did the same for 40,000 hourly workers, about a quarter of their union work forces. There is talk that Daimler will dump its Chrysler division.

All of which is another massive blow to what used to be called the "union movement." The United Auto Workers is down to slightly more than 500,000 members, compared to 1.5 million only two decades ago. Nor is it just a Michigan problem. Including public sector workers, unions now represent only about 12.5% of the U.S. work force, down from 20% in 1983 and about 35% 50 years ago.

The decline in union membership leveled off last year. "The good news is that the annual hemorrhaging of union membership slowed last year," confessed James P. Hoffa, president of the Teamsters. "And that's not really good news."

Thus not-so-Big Labor, which has dumped millions into organizing campaigns without much success, is scrambling for new ways to beef up its membership rolls. The latest hot idea is "card check," in which unions demand to be recognized as the bargaining unit for a workplace if a majority of the workers merely sign a card indicating their support. Under current law, companies are required to recognize a union only after a secret ballot of the workers -- and unions have been losing an increasing number of those elections.

Now that Congress is back under Democratic control, unions sniff a win. Card-check bills sponsored by Democratic Rep. George Miller and Sen. Ted Kennedy last year had 215 co-sponsors in the House, just shy of a majority, and 42 co-sponsors in the Senate. Union political operatives made it clear during the recent election campaign that any Democrat who opposed card check could forget about campaign backing in the future.

Republicans still have the strength to filibuster such a measure to death, and President Bush might veto it. But a weakened GOP and president might be tempted to let it through, particularly if it's attached to something they want. If so, it is likely to be seen as a fundamental reversal of the anti-union trend unleashed by Ronald Reagan's crushing of the Air Traffic Controllers strike in 1981.

The card-check tactic already is being used with some success. More than half the workers who joined unions last year did so in card-check sign-ups to which companies had "voluntarily" agreed, according to the AFL-CIO. Congressional action would make the card-check procedure routine.

Sen. Kennedy, whose bill is titled the Employee Free Choice Act, claims federal card check legislation "would level the playing field" by removing "large loopholes" in existing labor laws that supposedly allow employers to fire union organizers and intimidate workers prior to organizing elections. Union officials like Stewart Acuff, the AFL-CIO's organizing director, complain that elections "just don't work."

But it's more than a bit odd for union leaders, long proponents of what they are pleased to call "industrial democracy," to object to the secret ballot. As for Sen. Kennedy's claim that he merely seeks a choice for workers between card-check and a traditional ballot, imagine you are Joe Lunch Bucket on your way to work. A beefy organizer greets you at the plant gate and asks you to sign a card in favor of representation by a union. Are you really going to say no?

The fact that unions now call card-check their No. 1 legislative priority should be seen as a sign of weakness rather than strength. Labor's far more ambitious schemes to insulate themselves from international competition, such as trade barriers, haven't gotten very far. And labor's ability to use mandatory worker dues for political purposes -- which amounted to more than a quarter of the AFL-CIO budget in 2005 and probably far more in 2006 -- is under legal pressure at the U.S. Supreme Court.

Even card check might not produce the desired results. Dana Corp., a major auto supplier, several years ago agreed to a card check campaign at two Virginia plants, which were duly organized by the UAW. But both plants are now scheduled to be closed because of mounting competitive pressures both from abroad and non-union plants in the U.S.

True, public sector unions have been growing. But even there voter sympathy may be limited. In November, voters in Michigan by a wide margin voted down a ballot proposal backed by teachers unions that would have guaranteed annual wage hikes at least equal to inflation (as well as a state bailout of pension and health care benefits). And that was even before the true bill for piling unionism on top of civil service status for government employees is made clear by new accounting standards that begin taking effect this year.

Unfunded pension and health-care liabilities for state and local employees, the new figures are likely to show, could top $1 trillion nationwide, a huge potential tax liability. Will voters -- even in union households -- really be in a mood to make it easier for an entrenched interest to deliver dubious services at high prices?

In short, Republicans could be making a serious miscalculation if they bow to union demands for card check. Many workers themselves would view it as a sellout of their basic rights -- trading away the secret ballot, which gives them some leverage over union bosses with whom they might disagree, for short-term political gain. It will be interesting to see whether today's GOP will stick to a principle that ought to be an easy sell with most Americans.

New-home Sales Rise For Third Time In 4 Months (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, December 28, 2006

Sales of newly built homes rose a surprising 3.4% from October to November, the Commerce Department said Wednesday, as more builders offered special deals to attract buyers, and buyers took advantage of declining interest rates and mild weather to visit model homes.

This is the third increase in four months and a sign that the housing correction may be ending. Builder confidence levels, which hit bottom in September, are also slowly beginning to rise, according to December's Housing Market Index.

The sales gains haven't been easy. About half of home builders say they are cutting prices or paying the buyers' closing costs, and almost 60% are offering free upgrades such as granite kitchen counters, according to a survey by the National Association of Home Builders.

Compared with November last year, sales were off 15%. And while December results are not yet in, sales of new homes for the year are expected to be down about 18% from 2005. Sales of existing homes should be off by almost 9% this year. The National Association of Realtors will release November's existing home sales today.

"This is very much like what we saw at the time of the 1990-91 recession, even though this is not a recession in economic terms," says David Seiders, chief economist for the NAHB. "It shows to what extent this market got overheated in 2004 and particularly 2005. We knew we had soared to unsustainable levels … and knew we had one heck of a correction coming."

There are still signals that home sales could continue to slide. Applications for mortgage loans last week fell 14% from the week before to their lowest level in nearly five months, the Mortgage Bankers Association said Wednesday.

Nevertheless, sales of new homes were stronger last month in every region of the country except the South.

The supply of new homes for sale dipped to 6.3 months, down from 6.7 months in October. "Inventories fell again for a fourth-consecutive month," Wachovia analyst Phillip Neuhart says. "As long as they continue to fall, I'm going to feel better and better about the new home market."

The median price for a new home was $251,700, up 3% from October and 6% from last November. But Seiders dismissed the increase, saying it was probably because sales were strongest in the Northeast and the West, where median prices for homes are the highest.

End Of Housing Slump Seems To Be Drawing Near (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Recent firmness in mortgage applications and an increase in new-home sales suggest the housing slump may be nearly over, limiting the risk of wider damage to the overall economy.

One indication that home-buying demand has leveled off after a yearlong decline comes from the Mortgage Bankers Association, which conducts a weekly mortgage-application survey.

Yesterday, the group said mortgage applications fell sharply last week from the week before. Even so, its indexes of applications for home purchases and refinancings have been rising steadily since summer. The four-week moving average for the MBA's purchase index, which offers a less-volatile picture of the trend, has risen 12% since August, while the four-week average for the group's refinancing index has soared more than 41% since July.

A recent pickup in new-home sales also points to stabilizing demand. The Commerce Department said yesterday that new-home sales rose 3.4% in November to an annual rate of 1.05 million units. While that pace is down more than 15% from a year earlier, it has risen since July and has held fairly steady in recent months.

Despite some continued uncertainty, economists view the recent data as an early indication that the worst of the housing market's downturn may be over. "The net of all the numbers we've gotten is that it looks like the housing market and home sales appear to have stabilized, at least temporarily, in the latter part of the year," said Thomas Lawler, a former economist for Fannie Mae who now runs a consulting firm in Vienna, Va.

If this turns out to be the case, and the housing market begins to rebound next year, the economy would be likely to benefit. The slump has been one of the biggest dampers on the nation's economic growth. In the third quarter, for example, the decline in home building and residential investment shaved more than one percentage point off the annual rate of economic growth. Many economists expect a similar reduction in the fourth quarter but expect some improvement next year.

The chances of a pickup in 2007 partly depend on whether home builders can trim their inventories of unsold homes. Last month, there were 545,000 new homes on the market, or the equivalent of a 6.3-month supply at current sales rates, according to the Commerce data, down from a recent high mark of a 7.2-month supply in July.

Home-buying activity could wane, however, if interest rates rise or other factors, such as employment or the stock market, deteriorate. Economists expect the normally quiet winter months to produce volatile readings and say the best gauge of the housing market will be whether buyers come out in force as usual in the spring.

The median price of a new home -- or the price at which half sold for more and half sold for less -- was $251,700 last month, up from $237,900 a year earlier, the Commerce Department said. The figures aren't adjusted to account for the changing mix of sales. Thus, the November reading may have been distorted by the fact that sales in the higher-priced Northeast rose last month, while sales in lower-priced South fell.

Home Sales Rose 3.4% Last Month (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

Builders sold new homes at a faster rate last month than they did in October, shrinking the backlog of unsold homes on the market, the Commerce Department reported yesterday.

But many economists said the report, rather than foreshadowing a quick rebound, highlighted how fragile residential construction remained and suggested that the downturn now rattling the housing market had not yet run its course.

The report showed that sales of new single-family homes rose 3.4 percent in November, seasonally adjusted, to an annual rate of 1.05 million. That followed a 3.8 percent decline in October.

The news helped propel stocks on Wall Street to another record high — its 22nd so far this year — with the Dow Jones industrial average rising more than 100 points to finish the day above 12,500 for the first time.

It was a session typical of the often-buoyant final trading days of the year in which stocks gain on light volume as investors seek to polish their portfolios. [Page C13.]

Shares of homebuilders like Pulte Homes, Toll Brothers and Lennar all gained more than 1.5 percent as investors interpreted the home sales numbers as a sign that the slowdown in the housing market may have bottomed out.

Economists typically do not use November figures to make generalizations about trends in the housing market because the month is shortened by the Thanksgiving holiday. In fact, when the numbers are not seasonally adjusted, the number of new homes sold in November — 72,000 — was the lowest in almost four years. Inventories, a 7.7-month supply unadjusted, were the highest since December 1995.

“There’s a relatively large adjustment factor here,” said Michael Carliner, an economist with the National Association of Home Builders. “I wouldn’t read too much into those numbers.”

At first glance, many numbers in the report seemed to hint at a recovery in new-home sales. The median price of a new home in November rose, for example, and sales in the Northeast, Midwest and West all grew by double digits for the month. Beyond the numbers for November, however, few signs in the report pointed toward a reversal of the overall downward trajectory in residential housing.

Despite the November advance, sales of new homes are off 15.3 percent compared with a year earlier.

“Although the rebound in sales is consistent with the housing slowdown bottoming out, it seems too early to rejoice,” said Dimitry Fleming, an economist with ING Financial Markets. “Supply is still high.”

Many economists do not expect the market to stabilize until mid-2007.

When the statistics are adjusted for seasonal variations, the backlog of unsold new homes on the market declined to a 6.3-month supply in November, down from a 6.7-month supply in October. But that is still far higher than November 2005, when there was a 4.9-month supply.

The median price of a home rose 5.8 percent from November 2005, to $251,700. But economists said the increase was most likely the result of a rise in sales for the month in the Northeast and the West, where homes are more expensive. In November, sales in the Northeast climbed 22.5 percent compared with October, while the West saw a 19 percent jump.

The sales data from the last year, however, is more sobering. The Northeast was hit particularly hard; sales fell 42.4 percent from a year ago. Sales in the South declined 19.2 percent, and they fell 9 percent in the West. In the Midwest, however, sales rose 1.2 percent.

Despite the rise in the national median price, economists said the jump in sales during November suggested that buyers were still enjoying a market tilted to their advantage. Builders continue to offer incentives like upgraded kitchen appliances, landscaping and mortgage points at no additional charge. Incentives are not reflected in home price data.

Julia Coronado, chief United States economist with Barclays Capital, said buyers were still shopping in a market that was highly favorable to them. "We do know that it's more of a buyer's market, and builders are not eager to sit around with excess inventory on their books. It's extremely expensive to do that, so they move it quickly."

Peter E. Kretzmer, senior economist with the Bank of America, said, "Despite a monthly rise in the median new home price in November, prices remain on a flattening trend."

While the housing market has been in the midst of a sharp slowdown in recent months — some economists are calling it a full-blown housing recession — the damage to the broader economy has been limited so far. The decline in residential construction during the summer months knocked more than a full percentage point off the nation's gross domestic product growth, pulling it down to 2 percent in the third quarter.

But strength in other areas of the economy — consumer spending and commercial construction, for example — has helped to keep growth from stalling.

In another sign of distress in housing, the Mortgage Bankers Association said yesterday that its index of applications to buy a home or refinance a loan dropped to the lowest level in four months.

Dow Hits New High As Sales Of New Homes Pick Up (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

Sales of new homes picked up last month after a big drop in October, while the backlog of unsold homes on the market became somewhat smaller, the Commerce Department reported today.

The news helped propel stocks on Wall Street to another all-time high, with the Dow Jones industrial average rising more than 100 points to finish the day above 12,500 for the first time. Shares of homebuilders like Pulte Homes, Toll Brothers and Lennar all rose considerably.

Still, sales are 15 percent lower than they were a year earlier, suggesting that the correction taking place in the housing market has not yet run its course.

The Commerce Department reported this morning that sales of new homes rose 3.4 percent in November to an annual rate of 1.05 million. That followed a 3.8 percent decline in October.

While the housing market has been in the midst of a sharp slowdown in recent months — some economists are calling it a full-blown housing recession — the damage to the economy has been limited so far. The backlog of unsold new homes on the market declined to a 6.3-month supply in November, down from a 6.7-month supply in October. But that is still far higher than November 2005, when it would have taken 4.9 months to sell all the unsold homes on the market.

The median price of a home rose 5.8 percent from November 2005 to $251,700. But rather than reversing the recent downward momentum of new home prices, economists said the uptick was likely the result of a rise in sales for the month in the Northeast and the West, where homes are more expensive. In November, sales in the Northeast climbed 22.5 percent compared with October, while the West saw a 19 percent jump.

Despite the rise in the national median price, economists said the jump in sales during November suggests that buyers are still enjoying a market tilted to their advantage. The sales data from the last year is more sobering. The Northeast was particularly hard-hit, with sales falling 42.4 percent from a year ago. Sales in the South declined 19.2 percent, and they fell 9 percent in the West. In the Midwest, however, sales rose 1.2 percent.

Dow Industrials Soar Past 12500 To Latest Record (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

The holiday cheer continued to flow, as upbeat housing data helped push the Dow Jones Industrial Average above 12500 for the first time.

It was the 22nd record finish for the Dow since October began, and left the blue-chip average up 16.7% this year -- poised for its strongest gain since 2003, when it rose 25.3%. The Dow finished the day ahead 102.94 points, or 0.83%, at 12510.57.

Support came from a Commerce Department report that new-home sales rose more than expected in November. The data backed hopes that the worst of the housing slump may be over.

But the majority of the rally actually occurred before the housing news was announced at 10 a.m. EST. Many short-term investors appear to be betting that the market will finish the year with a bang. Stocks often do well in the trading days from Christmas into early January.

"The economic data pushed the market into full buy mode," said stock trader Brian Williamson of Boston Company Asset Management. "It just started feeding on itself and feeding on itself."

Small stocks, which often do well late in December and in January and also are more economically sensitive than larger ones, outpaced their larger siblings. The Russell 2000 small-stock index rose 1.21% to a record close of 797.73.

As is often the case in the year's waning days, trading volume was below average, which meant that it took less buying than usual to push the indexes higher.

The euphoria also was fed by news that crude-oil futures were falling back toward the $60 mark. The futures finished the day down 76 cents, or 1.24%, at $60.34 a barrel, amid forecasts of a warm January, which would further limit demand.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.70%, or 9.94 points, to 1426.84, up 14.3% in 2006 and just short of a six-year high.

The Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 0.73%, or 17.71 points, to 2431.22, up 10.2% this year.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.91%, or 2.19 points, to 242.49, a record.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1; bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 13/32, or $4.0625 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.656%. The 30-year bond was down 25/32 to yield 4.785%.

The dollar eased3. Late in New York, it traded at 118.78 yen, down from 119.15, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.3125 from $1.3096.

Strong Housing Report Helps Send Dow Industrial Average Over 12,500 (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

NEW YORK, Dec. 27 -- Stocks rose Wednesday, sending the Dow Jones industrial average past 12,500 for the first time as year-end bargain hunters bought shares across many sectors.

Home builders did well on the strength of a Commerce Department report that showed new home sales rose more than expected in November.

Bonds were lower. Many investors hope that signs of economic weakness will motivate the Federal Reserve to lower interest rates, so the sign of strength in the housing industry was troublesome for bondholders. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose to 4.65 percent, from 4.60 percent late Tuesday.

Ford Motor and Toyota Motor shares rose after a meeting between executives of the companies sparked hope for an alliance between the two rivals. General Motors, meanwhile rose sharply.

Increased Home Sales Give Stocks A Leg Up (USAT/BLOOM)

NEW YORK — The stock market rallied a second-consecutive day and propelled the Dow Jones industrial average to a new high Wednesday as a bigger-than-expected increase in November home sales stoked optimism that the worst of the housing slump may be over.

"If people start to see real estate prices stabilize, that's going to create a better consumer outlook," says Charles Stamey, who helps manage $14 billion at Manning & Napier Advisors. "That is very good news for people who look at overall market sentiment."

The Dow gained 102.94 points, or 0.8%, to 12,510.57, topping its Dec. 19 close of 12,471.32. The Dow is up 16.7% for 2006. The Standard & Poor's 500 index added 9.94 points, or 0.7%, to 1426.84 for a 2006 gain of 14.3%. The Nasdaq composite rose 17.71 points, or 0.7%, to 2431.22. It is up 10.2% in 2006.

Ryland gained $1.82 to $54.35 and led a rally for home builders as the November sales report eased concern that a glut of unsold homes would depress prices and make owners less inclined to spend money. Home Depot, the largest home-improvement retailer, climbed 50 cents to $39.56, while Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold rose $1.59 to $56.13, pacing gains for companies whose products are used in houses.

Sales of new homes in the USA benefited last month as lower mortgage rates and more incentives helped builders reduce inventory (story, 1B). Consumer spending, which is influenced by home values, makes up two-thirds of the U.S. economy and may play a bigger role in driving growth amid signs manufacturing is slowing.

Stocks are poised to complete their fourth annual rise in a row, partly due to hopes the Federal Reserve will cut its target for short-term interest rates.

A one-month low in oil prices Wednesday may help the inflation outlook, allowing the Fed to ease borrowing costs. Oil fell 76 cents to $60.34 a barrel, the lowest since Nov. 27. It is down 22% from July's record close of $77.03. "Any move down in oil can be viewed positively for stocks," says Michael Malone, trading analyst at Cowen & Co. "It removes inflationary pressure."

The New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq Stock Market each held a period of silence to honor former president Gerald Ford, who died late Tuesday. However, 16,200 shares of Semiconductor HOLDRs Trust traded on the NYSE during its two-minute observance starting at 9:30 a.m. ET, while about 5.2 million shares traded on the Nasdaq during its pause, which started at 11 a.m.

Mall Retailers' Numbers Seen At Low End Of Forecasts (WSJ)

By James Covert

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- Retailers posted a disappointing 1.7% increase in comparable sales for the week ended Dec. 23, putting holiday sales on track to hit the low end of expectations, according to the International Council of Shopping Centers.

A surge of last-minute purchases by consumers fueled a 2% rise in same-store sales, or sales at stores open at least a year, from the previous week's levels, with sales on Friday and Saturday particularly strong. But the 1.7% same-store increase from year-ago spending was the weakest such gain recorded by the New York-based trade group since the week ended Feb. 12, 2005.

THE YEAR'S IMAGES

While there's still a week left in the December period on the retail calendar, same-store sales for the month now appear on track to hit the low end of the trade group's estimate for a 2.5% to 3.5% increase, said chief economist Michael Niemira. That also puts same-store sales for the combined November-December holiday period on track to hit the low end of its estimate for a 2.5% to 3% gain.

"The last week of the fiscal month might exceed modest expectations as consumers redeem those holiday gift cards and shop for the bargains on clearance," Mr. Niemira said. About 18% of consumers surveyed said they planned to shop on the day after Christmas, in line with 19% who reported doing so last year.

Nevertheless, Mr. Niemira called the results of the final, crucial week of the pre-Christmas shopping season "a very mixed performance," noting pockets of strength and weakness among retailers that made it difficult to gauge overall results. Some consumers shifted more purchases online, while others bought more gift cards. Discounts were steep, although "largely planned," Mr. Niemira said. Unusual bouts of warm weather and shifts in the industry calendar also made it tricky to assess the numbers, he said.

Prior to the week ended Dec. 23, the slimmest year-over-year holiday gain had been posted on the week ended Nov. 11, when same-store sales rose 2.1%. The strongest such gain was recorded the week ended Dec. 11, when same-store sales rose 3.2% from year-earlier levels. Same-store sales are a closely watched measure of retail performance.

The International Council of Shopping Centers currently tracks same-store sales at 59 major retail chains in the U.S. The trade group's next weekly update is slated for Jan. 3.

Separately, ShopperTrak RCT Corp., which tracks total sales at more than 45,000 retail outlets, reported that sales for the week ended Saturday increased 5.2% over the year-ago period. Foot traffic fell a slight 1.3 percent during that same period, indicating that shoppers were making bigger purchases with fewer trips, according to Bill Martin, co-founder of ShopperTrak.

Much of last week's strength was from Friday and Saturday, though the finale wasn't as strong as hoped for. As a result, Mr. Martin believes that total holiday sales will probably not meet the 5% growth forecast, though holiday sales growth will be at least 4.5%.

The National Retail Federation, the industry trade association, is sticking to its holiday growth forecast of 5%. The figure excludes business from auto dealers, gas stations and restaurants.

Cyberspace Sex Scandal Heads Toward Trial (USAT/AP)

WASHINGTON (AP) — When Robert Steinbuch discovered his girlfriend had discussed intimate details about their sex life in her online diary, the Capitol Hill staffer didn't just get mad. He got a lawyer.

Soon, though, the racy tidbits about the sex lives of the two Senate aides faded from the front pages and the gossip pages. Steinbuch accepted a teaching job in Arkansas, leaving Washington and Jessica Cutler's Washingtonienne Web log behind.

While sex scandals turn over quickly in this city, lawsuits do not. Steinbuch's case over the embarrassing, sexually charged blog appears headed for an embarrassing, sexually charged trial.

Lurid testimony about spanking, handcuffs and prostitution aside, the Washingtonienne case could help establish whether people who keep online diaries are obligated to protect the privacy of the people they interact with offline.

Cutler, a former aide to Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, says she created the blog in 2004 to keep a few friends up to date on her social life. Like a digital version of the sex-themed banter from a Sex and the City episode, Cutler described the thrill and tribulations of juggling sexual relationships with six men.

One of those men was Steinbuch, a counsel to DeWine on the Judiciary Committee. Cutler called him the "current favorite" and said he resembled George Clooney, liked spanking and disliked condoms.

"He's very upfront about sex," she wrote. "He likes talking dirty and stuff, and he told me that he likes submissive women."

When Ana Marie Cox, then the editor of the popular gossip website Wonkette.com, discovered and linked to Cutler's blog, the story spun out of control. Cutler was fired and Steinbuch says he was publicly humiliated. He went to court seeking more than $20 million in damages.

The case is embroiled in thorny pretrial issues, with each side demanding personal information from the other. Steinbuch wants to know how much money Cutler received from the man she called her "sugar daddy." Cutler demanded Steinbuch's student evaluations from the University of Arkansas at Little Rock Law School, where he teaches.

Steinbuch also recently added Cox as a defendant in the case, though he has not served her with court papers. A trial date has not been set, but Matthew Billips, Cutler's attorney, said there are no settlement talks that might head off a trial.

"I have no idea what he wants," Billips said. "He's never said, 'This is what I think should be done.'"

Neither Steinbuch nor his attorney returned phone calls seeking comment. In court, attorney Jonathan Rosen said Steinbuch wants to restore his good name. Students in his legal ethics class all search the Internet and learn about the blog, Rosen said.

"It's not funny and it's damaging," Rosen told a judge. "It's horrible, absolutely horrible."

To win, Steinbuch will have to prove that the details of their sexual relationship were private and publishing them was highly offensive. Billips argues that Cutler never intended to make the blog public but, in the information age, data is easily copied and distributed beyond its intended audience.

If the case goes to trial, its outcome will be important both to bloggers and to people who chronicle their lives on social-networking sites such as MySpace and Facebook. Marc Rotenberg, director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, said he may teach the Washingtonienne case this spring during his class at Georgetown Law School.

"Anybody who wants to reveal their own private life has a right to do that. It's a different question when you reveal someone else's private life," he said, adding that simply calling something a diary doesn't make it one. "It's not sitting in a nice, leather-bound book under a pillow. It's online where a million people can find it."

Rotenberg asked, what if Cutler had secretly videotaped the encounters and sold the videos without Steinbuch's consent? There has to be a line somewhere, he said.

Since being fired, Cutler moved back to New York, wrote a novel based on the scandal, posed nude for Playboy and started a new website, where she solicits donations "for slutty clothes and drugs."

She wouldn't discuss the case but said she's amazed by what has happened.

"The fact that anyone was interested in the first place was a surprise," she said. "The fact that there was a lawsuit in the first place was a surprise. That it's still going on is a surprise."

U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman was surprised, too.

"I don't know why we're here in federal court to begin with," Friedman told attorneys for both sides in April. "I don't know why this guy thought it was smart to file a lawsuit and lay out all of his private, intimate details."

In that sense, the Washingtonienne lawsuit has become a study into when to make a federal case out of something and when to just let it go away. It's a question lawyers wrestle with all the time.

Lanny Davis, the former special counsel to President Clinton who now advises companies during times of crisis, tells clients to decide whether they want justice or simply to set the record straight and get a message across.

"If you're looking for justice, the court system is the only thing you have," Davis said. "If you're looking to get the full story, good and bad, into one coherent narrative, the court system is perhaps the worst possible forum."

Ford Disagreed With Bush About Invading Iraq (WP)

By Bob Woodward

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Former president Gerald R. Ford said in an embargoed interview in July 2004 that the Iraq war was not justified. "I don't think I would have gone to war," he said a little more than a year after President Bush launched the invasion advocated and carried out by prominent veterans of Ford's own administration.

DOJ_NMG_0109619

In a four-hour conversation at his house in Beaver Creek, Colo., Ford "very strongly" disagreed with the current president's justifications for invading Iraq and said he would have pushed alternatives, such as sanctions, much more vigorously. In the tape-recorded interview, Ford was critical not only of Bush but also of Vice President Cheney -- Ford's White House chief of staff -- and then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who served as Ford's chief of staff and then his Pentagon chief.

"Rumsfeld and Cheney and the president made a big mistake in justifying going into the war in Iraq. They put the emphasis on weapons of mass destruction," Ford said. "And now, I've never publicly said I thought they made a mistake, but I felt very strongly it was an error in how they should justify what they were going to do."

In a conversation that veered between the current realities of a war in the Middle East and the old complexities of the war in Vietnam whose bitter end he presided over as president, Ford took issue with the notion of the United States entering a conflict in service of the idea of spreading democracy.

"Well, I can understand the theory of wanting to free people," Ford said, referring to Bush's assertion that the United States has a "duty to free people." But the former president said he was skeptical "whether you can detach that from the obligation number one, of what's in our national interest." He added: "And I just don't think we should go hellfire damnation around the globe freeing people, unless it is directly related to our own national security."

The Ford interview -- and a subsequent lengthy conversation in 2005 -- took place for a future book project, though he said his comments could be published at any time after his death. In the sessions, Ford fondly recalled his close working relationship with key Bush advisers Cheney and Rumsfeld while expressing concern about the policies they pursued in more recent years.

"He was an excellent chief of staff. First class," Ford said. "But I think Cheney has become much more pugnacious" as vice president. He said he agreed with former secretary of state Colin L. Powell's assertion that Cheney developed a "fever" about the threat of terrorism and Iraq. "I think that's probably true."

Describing his own preferred policy toward Saddam Hussein's Iraq, Ford said he would not have gone to war, based on the publicly available information at the time, and would have worked harder to find an alternative. "I don't think, if I had been president, on the basis of the facts as I saw them publicly," he said, "I don't think I would have ordered the Iraq war. I would have maximized our effort through sanctions, through restrictions, whatever, to find another answer."

Ford had faced his own military crisis -- not a war he started like Bush, but one he had to figure out how to end. In many ways those decisions framed his short presidency -- in the difficult calculations about how to pull out of Vietnam and the challenging players who shaped policy on the war. Most challenging of all, as Ford recalled, was Henry A. Kissinger, who was both secretary of state and national security adviser and had what Ford said was "the thinnest skin of any public figure I ever knew."

"I think he was a super secretary of state," Ford said, "but Henry in his mind never made a mistake, so whatever policies there were that he implemented, in retrospect he would defend."

In 1975, Ford decided to relieve Kissinger of his national security title. "Why Nixon gave Henry both secretary of state and head of the NSC, I never understood," Ford said. "Except he was a great supporter of Kissinger. Period." But Ford viewed Kissinger's dual roles as a conflict of interest that weakened the administration's ability to fully air policy debates. "They were supposed to check on one another."

That same year, Ford also decided to fire Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger and replace him with Rumsfeld, who was then Ford's White House chief of staff. Ford recalled that he then used that decision to go to Kissinger and say, "I'm making a change at the secretary of defense, and I expect you to be a team player and work with me on this" by giving up the post of security adviser.

Kissinger was not happy. "Mr. President, the press will misunderstand this," Ford recalled Kissinger telling him. "They'll write that I'm being demoted by taking away half of my job." But Ford made the changes, elevating the deputy national security adviser, Brent Scowcroft, to take Kissinger's White House post.

Throughout this maneuvering, Ford said, he kept his White House chief of staff in the dark. "I didn't consult with Rumsfeld. And knowing Don, he probably resented the fact that I didn't get his advice, which I didn't," Ford said. "I made the decision on my own."

Kissinger remained a challenge for Ford. He regularly threatened to resign, the former president recalled. "Over the weekend, any one of 50 weekends, the press would be all over him, giving him unshirted hell. Monday morning he would come in and say, 'I'm offering my resignation.' Just between Henry and me. And I would literally hold his hand. 'Now, Henry, you've got the nation's future in your hands and you can't leave us now.' Henry publicly was a gruff, hard-nosed, German-born diplomat, but he had the thinnest skin of any public figure I ever knew."

Ford added, "Any criticism in the press drove him crazy." Kissinger would come in and say: "I've got to resign. I can't stand this kind of unfair criticism." Such threats were routine, Ford said. "I often thought, maybe I should say: 'Okay, Henry. Goodbye,' " Ford said, laughing. "But I never got around to that."

At one point, Ford recalled Kissinger, his chief Vietnam policymaker, as "coy." Then he added, Kissinger is a "wonderful person. Dear friend. First-class secretary of state. But Henry always protected his own flanks."

Ford was also critical of his own actions during the interviews. He recalled, for example, his unsuccessful 1976 campaign to remain in office, when he was under enormous pressure to dump Vice President Nelson A. Rockefeller from the Republican ticket. Some polls at the time showed that up to 25 percent of Republicans, especially those from the South, would not vote for Ford if Rockefeller, a New Yorker from the liberal wing of the Republican Party, was on the ticket.

When Rockefeller offered to be dropped from the ticket, Ford took him up on it. But he later regretted it. The decision to dump the loyal Rockefeller, he said, was "an act of cowardice on my part."

In the end, though, it was Vietnam and the legacy of the retreat he presided over that troubled Ford. After Saigon fell in 1975 and the United States evacuated from Vietnam, Ford was often labeled the only American president to lose a war. The label always rankled.

"Well," he said, "I was mad as hell, to be honest with you, but I never publicly admitted it."

Christine Parthemore contributed to this report.

Ford Aides Shape Bush Tenure (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Gerald Ford took office in a presidency weakened by Vietnam and Watergate -- a situation that some top aides set out to reverse upon returning to power in the Bush administration. Their effort to undo the damage done to the presidency during the Nixon-Ford years has the Bush White House on a collision course with the coming Democratic Congress.

Mr. Ford, who died Tuesday, held office for 2½ years and was the only person to hold the position without being elected president or vice president. But his tenure is felt through the ranks of aides -- most notably Vice President Dick Cheney -- who became pivotal figures in the Bush administration. They have used their years in office to restore powers of the presidency they felt were lost after Mr. Nixon's resignation and the Vietnam War. The Bush White House's assertion of presidential power in areas such as the war on terror may be Mr. Ford's most surprising legacy.

Mr. Ford became president when the balance of power between the legislative and executive branches had swung strongly toward Congress. Sparked by policy battles with President Nixon, a Democratic-controlled Congress tried to set new limits on the workings of the American intelligence community and defense establishment. Many Ford aides left office believing that Congress had usurped powers that belonged to the executive branch.

"With the arrival of Watergate and Vietnam, the president's authority was considerably weakened, and that of Congress got much stronger," says Brent Scowcroft, who was Mr. Ford's national security adviser. "We were too weakened, and had too many problems, to really push back."

When Ford aides such as Mr. Cheney and former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld joined the Bush administration, they worked to swing the pendulum back toward the executive branch, in effort to restore powers that aides felt Mr. Ford had forfeited during his tenure. For some Ford veterans, the Bush years represented an opportunity to re-empower the White House at the expense of Congress.

"Cheney and others from the Ford group were in the White House during an unprecedented assault on the power and prerogatives of the presidency, and they came away from that thinking that restoring strength to the presidency was an important institutional obligation," says Vin Weber, a lobbyist and former Republican congressman from Minnesota. "They've spent years trying to do just that."

Reversal Of Fortune (NYT)

By Barry Werth

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

Northampton, Mass.

AMERICA got its first real impression of Gerald Ford on the steamy August morning 33 years ago when he took office as president, and most people instantly liked what they saw. Mr. Ford stood in the driveway of his suburban split-level house, hours before assuming a post he never sought and hoped to avoid having to fill. One of the questions he took was about Harry Truman's comment when he had the office abruptly thrust upon him. Mr. Truman said he felt that the moon, the stars and the planets had fallen on him.

"I think that's an apt description," Mr. Ford said. "I can tell you better this afternoon after it actually happens."

"Mrs. Ford hoped you would get out of politics. What is her response?"

"Well," Mr. Ford shook his head. "She's just doing her best and we'll wait and see about the other."

Like Mr. Truman, President Ford was a seemingly ordinary Midwesterner, a career politician and party man dogged by low expectations and doubts — suitable "standby equipment," as Nelson Rockefeller called the vice presidency, but no one's idea of a commanding leader.

Still worse, he came into office not as Harry Truman and Lyndon Johnson had, inheriting the mantle of a popular fallen leader and with a supportive Congress, but replacing a disgraced and reviled figure and facing Democratic majorities in both houses, as well as right-wing rumblings about Richard Nixon's foreign and economic policies. By the time Mr. Nixon departed, Mr. Ford wrote, "he had no mantle left."

Of necessity, President Ford devised a new one — "the mantle of the presidential center," The Washington Post's Lou Cannon called it. For a month, Mr. Ford set out not just to heal America's divisions but to expunge them. He moved hard to the center, determined, he wrote, "to leave the right sputtering."

He chose Nelson Rockefeller as his vice president (over George H. W. Bush and Donald Rumsfeld, who both campaigned vigorously for the job), met with blacks and women, proposed partial amnesty for Vietnam-era draft resisters, and hewed to Mr. Nixon's realism in foreign affairs. The press corps extended him the benefit of the doubt, finding him refreshingly open and honest after Mr. Nixon, and his approval ratings soared — literally, from nowhere — to 70 percent.

Then, one Sunday morning a month after moving into the Oval Office, he pardoned Mr. Nixon before the former president was indicted. With a pen stroke, a very different Ford presidency emerged. Though he said he was forgiving Mr. Nixon because the televised spectacle of a former president in the criminal dock would stir up "ugly passions," the pardon instantly and inevitably looked like the last cynical act of the Watergate cover-up — Mr. Nixon's hand-chosen successor giving him a free pass.

The pardon was a political disaster for President Ford. His approval ratings plummeted, inviting attacks from not only the Democrats, but also the Republican right, which rallied around Ronald Reagan.

President Ford spent the remainder of his presidency trying to stave off the intraparty challenge that had suddenly emerged. Two weeks after the pardon, he appointed Mr. Rumsfeld as White House chief of staff, and Mr. Rumsfeld chose Dick Cheney, then 33, as his deputy. A year later, President Ford fired Defense Secretary James Schlesinger and replaced him with Mr. Rumsfeld, put Mr. Bush in charge of the C.I.A., forced Nelson Rockefeller off the 1976 ticket, and promoted Mr. Cheney to chief of staff. In that role, Mr. Cheney instituted a more centralized, secretive, Nixonian approach to presidential power, as he and Mr. Rumsfeld moved to replace President Ford's restraint and realism with a swaggering, messianic view of American might. If it all sounds familiar, it is.

Unlike those he elevated to power, President Ford accepted accountability and showed uncommon political and personal courage. He announced his amnesty plan before the annual convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars — the toughest audience he could find — telling reporters it would be "a little cowardice" to roll it out before a hand-picked crowd.

When it came out that Gen. Alexander Haig, President Nixon's chief of staff, went to Mr. Ford a week before the president's resignation proposing that he pardon him, Mr. Ford volunteered to testify before Congress, where he swore under oath, "There was no deal, period, under no circumstances." Suspicion still lingers that President Ford telegraphed Mr. Nixon that he wouldn't face jail — after the pardon discussion, according to a close Ford aide, he told General Haig to "do whatever they decided to do" to convince Mr. Nixon to step down. But he never complained publicly about his reversal of fortune in office.

President Ford believed that by pardoning Mr. Nixon, he was putting Watergate and the imperial presidency in the past. But by sacrificing his popularity, he also lost much of his mandate to address the aftermath of Watergate and Vietnam with moderation, bipartisanship and national humility — the very goals he set out to achieve. Forced to the right, his administration spawned many of the core attitudes and key players of the George W. Bush White House.

Mr. Ford didn't struggle for the presidency, didn't win it, but he was determined not to fail at it. His candor and decency helped restore America's faith in its institutions. It's regrettable that the pardon — shadowed by ambiguity, politically catastrophic, and with a long tail extending to the heart of today's White House — weighs so heavily on his legacy.

How Ford's Legacy Still Serves (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

The standard tribute to Gerald R. Ford is that he served the nation best simply by stepping into the presidency for the disgraced and banished Richard M. Nixon.

But to those who served with the man from Michigan, his achievements did not begin or end with his being available to help "heal our land" from the wounds of the Nixon presidency, as his successor, Jimmy Carter, said on the day he took over from Ford.

The alumni of the Ford administration -- a notable group -- insist that though he had never particularly aimed for the presidency, the "accidental president" developed a considerable mastery of the job and was on his way to building a legacy when the voters sent him into early retirement.

Instead of great deeds, they say, he left behind a great model of decency and integrity in office -- and a generous gift of friendship that has endured for many of them for the three decades since they served under him. The annual gatherings of Ford administration alumni are unique in the modern presidency and offer evidence of the loyalty he commanded.

Many of those alumni who first exercised real power under Ford remained active in government. For all that he has borrowed from Ronald Reagan, President Bush owes the greatest debt to three stalwarts of economic and national security policy inherited from Ford -- Vice President Cheney and former defense secretary Don Rumsfeld, both former chiefs of staff to Ford, and former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan, Ford's chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

In all his years, Greenspan observed, he has never been part of a more talented administration. Henry Kissinger was secretary of state, and Brent Scowcroft headed the National Security Council staff. Kissinger's personal staff included Lawrence Eagleburger, later secretary of state himself, and L. Paul Bremer. William Colby headed the CIA, and Daniel Patrick Moynihan was U.N. ambassador.

When Rumsfeld served as Ford's defense secretary, his deputy was William P. Clements Jr., later governor of Texas. The economic policy team included James Lynn and Paul O'Neill at the Office of Management and Budget, William Simon at Treasury, L. William Seidman and Greenspan at the White House, John Dunlop at the Labor Department, Carla Hills at Housing and Urban Development, Rogers C.B. Morton at Commerce, Clayton Yeutter at the Office of the Special Trade Representative, and Russell Train at the Environmental Protection Agency.

The Justice Department was headed by Edward H. Levi, a former University of Chicago president and perhaps the most nonpolitical attorney general in modern times. Serving under him, in various high staff positions, were such people as Rudolph Giuliani, Robert Bork and Antonin Scalia. And Nelson Rockefeller was vice president.

It took a while for Ford to replace some of the key players he had inherited from Nixon, but when he was finished, he had a remarkably cohesive, competent group. The overall tone of the Ford Cabinet and White House reflected the moderate conservatism of Ford's own Grand Rapids, Mich., background -- with more than a tinge of the progressivism embodied in the term "Rockefeller Republicanism."

In terms of the subsequent development of the Republican Party -- and the character of later Republican administrations -- it is difficult to say that Ford left a lasting imprint. He was challenged for the 1976 nomination by Reagan, whose ambitions nearly thwarted the incumbent at the Kansas City convention. When Ford lost to Carter, Reagan was perfectly positioned to inherit the party leadership and, ultimately, the presidency.

So Ford's legacy lies more in his personal character than in his political inheritance. That character was epitomized by the strength of his friendships, which were far deeper than any partisan or ideological lines. Only days before Nixon resigned under threat of impeachment, Ford traveled to the home state of his political rival but friend, Democratic Rep. Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill of Massachusetts, to play with him in a golf tournament.

In the final days of the Nixon presidency, Ford made a memorable visit to The Post. As vice president, he had defended Nixon against the Watergate charges, but he recognized in our meeting that he had a responsibility larger than any further claims of personal loyalty from Nixon. "I want you to know I am someone who enjoys having adversaries who are not enemies," he told reporters and editors.

It was a signal, understood by everyone in the room, that a new -- and welcome -- era was about to begin. It turned out to be a shorter period in office than Ford expected, but the standard of civility and good will he set for himself is an example that endures.

Similar Personnel, Different Approaches (WP)

By Peter Baker, Washington Post Staff Writer

Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Gerald R. Ford's administration passed from the scene relatively quickly in the 1970s, but, like much of the decade's popular culture, it left an imprint that would be felt for years to come. In fact, when George W. Bush arrived at the Oval Office 24 years later, it felt at first as if he were shooting a remake of the Ford White House.

Ford's White House chief of staff, Dick Cheney, was now vice president. Ford's defense secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld, was again the master of the Pentagon. Young aides who had learned the Washington game under the 38th president -- such as Paul H. O'Neill, John W. Snow and Stephen J. Hadley -- were to head the Treasury Department or National Security Council for the 43rd chief executive.

There were other familiar faces as well. James A. Baker III, who as Ford's campaign manager saved his nomination from an insurgent Ronald Reagan in 1976, had come to the rescue when Bush's election headed into recount overtime. And Alan Greenspan, a Ford economic adviser, was the incumbent Federal Reserve chairman who would help Bush sell his signature $1.35 trillion tax-cut program, a far cry from the $10 billion in tax cuts promised by Greenspan's onetime mentor, Ford.

"It's quite amazing how many people from his administration have gone on to big things," said retired Air Force Lt. Gen. Brent Scowcroft, who was national security adviser for both Ford and President George H.W. Bush, then served as chairman of the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board under George W. Bush.

But if the Ford administration proved an incubator for future Republican talent after the demise of Richard M. Nixon's presidency, it turned out not to be much of a model for the current Bush administration in terms of style and ideology. Where Ford governed close to the political center, working with congressional Democrats and presenting a pragmatic, cautious domestic and foreign policy agenda, Bush has styled himself as more of a crusader for change at home and abroad -- bold in the eyes of his admirers but reckless in the view of his critics.

Bush has led the nation in a more polarized time and more polarized fashion, largely eschewing Democrats and focusing on keeping his GOP base behind him. Initially at least, his administration excited conservatives, while moderates who found his approach too radical were cast out, including O'Neill, who was pressured to resign as treasury secretary, and Scowcroft, who was dumped from the intelligence board.

Ford, who spent years in the Republican minority in Congress, put a premium on collaboration to make the system work. "He was just great at that," said Scowcroft. "And as you can see, this administration doesn't believe in that and doesn't practice it. And not just this administration -- the whole town of Washington has changed."

Not that Ford had it easy. He assumed office amid the trauma of Watergate and Vietnam without being elected and, unlike Bush till now, had an opposition party running Capitol Hill. "He had a hostile Congress to deal with and, to a certain extent, a large segment of his own party that was at odds with him in the Reagan wing," said David Horrocks, a historian at the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library and Museum.

And just as Bush's team has at times been riven by deep disagreements over issues such as the Iraq war, Ford's circle had its share of internal competition. Rumsfeld was Ford's first White House chief of staff but later turned over the office to his young aide, Cheney, so that he could join the Cabinet, a possible launching pad to becoming the vice presidential nominee in 1976. George H.W. Bush, meanwhile, was made CIA director in what some colleagues saw as a move by Rumsfeld to get rid of a potential rival for the nomination.

But none of that compared to the political divisions of the current era, and Ford in his last years found the changes in the capital culture disheartening. When Time magazine journalist Hugh Sidey, who covered the Ford White House, died in 2005, the former president wrote a piece in The Washington Post lamenting the passing of a Washington where politicians and journalists could respect and even be friends with one another despite disagreements.

"It's hard to imagine how different Washington was in those days," said Ron Nessen, who was Ford's press secretary. "It's so nasty and polarized these days, and everything's political. Ford had a lot of friends in the other party."

In an interview before Ford's death, Nessen said the former president was "not happy" about the polarization of politics. "He has been definitely put off by the tone and mood in Washington, because he does come from that different era when Republicans and Democrats . . . would have a drink together."

Bush also has rued the partisanship of his tenure, though he and his aides generally place the blame on Democrats. Some of his advisers see no virtue in the sort of accommodation they associate with the Ford administration, dismissing it as an approach that would not work in an era that demands more daring leadership.

Whether Cheney sees it that way is uncertain, but of all the Ford veterans inside the Bush White House, no one appears to have changed more. Scowcroft, among others, has said he no longer recognizes the man he knew as a laid-back, good-humored pragmatist who was the nation's youngest White House chief of staff. As Bush's grim-faced vice president more than a quarter-century later, Cheney has articulated a dark view of the world and the threats to the United States while advocating preemptive war in Iraq and a free hand for interrogators grilling prisoners.

Cheney does not explain the seeming evolution, but he continued to pay homage to his former boss throughout his career. "We were at a reunion dinner . . . and Cheney told my husband and me informally, 'I owe everything to Ford,' " said Elaine K. Didier, director of the Ford library.

In a speech to the Wyoming legislature in February, Cheney seemed wistful for his days in the Ford White House. "In Gerald Ford, I had yet another fine role model," he said, "and I still look up to the man for his steadiness, for his kindness and complete lack of pretense, for the way he conducted himself during one of the most serious constitutional crises in the nation's history."

38th President Leaves A Legacy Of Healing (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

A nation deeply polarized by war and partisanship came together yesterday to mourn Gerald Rudolph Ford as a healer during a previous era of division, while Washington began preparing an elaborate, pageantry-filled farewell for the most modest of presidents.

Ford, who died at his California home Tuesday night at age 93, will lie in state at the U.S. Capitol for two days starting Saturday and will be memorialized at a service at Washington National Cathedral on Tuesday, following the pattern set by Ronald Reagan's death two years ago.

With presidents and lawmakers of both parties assembling in the nation's capital for the occasion, the ceremonies marking Ford's passage promise to set a bipartisan tone to begin a week in which power will change hands in Washington. Two days after the service at the cathedral, Democrats will assume control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years, opening a period of divided government for the remainder of President Bush's time in office.

Ford's legacy as a bridge builder before, during and after his short presidency dominated the discussion in Washington and across the country yesterday, standing in contrast to a time when leaders in both parties often seem unable to join hands on the big issues of the day. During his final years, mostly privately but sometimes publicly, Ford often expressed regret at what he saw as a coarsening political environment that personalizes policy differences and undermines national unity.

Bush has stocked his administration with veterans of the Ford White House, and he paid tribute yesterday to the 38th president's ability to work across the aisle. "He assumed power in a period of great division and turmoil," Bush told reporters at his ranch in Crawford, Tex., where he is spending the week. "For a nation that needed healing and for an office that needed a calm and steady hand, Gerald Ford came along when we needed him most."

Jimmy Carter, who ousted Ford in 1976 but became friends with him after leaving office, called him "one of the most admirable public servants and human beings I have ever known." In a statement, he said Ford "wisely chose the path of healing during a deeply divisive time in our nation's history" and "frequently rose above politics by emphasizing the need for bipartisanship and seeking common ground on issues critical to our nation."

Ford had been in declining health for months and underwent heart procedures in August. Still, in November, he surpassed Reagan to become the longest-living president. He died at 9:45 p.m. Eastern time Tuesday at his Rancho Mirage home, according to a statement issued on behalf of the family. It did not give a cause of death. White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten notified Bush, who then called Betty Ford about 11 p.m. to offer condolences.

Under plans announced last night, Ford's funeral will mirror Reagan's June 2004 services. A service will be held in California tomorrow, and his body will be flown to Washington on Saturday, where it will be brought to the Capitol for a formal state funeral that evening. His casket will lie in state in the Rotunda and will be open to the public through Monday. After the service at the Washington National Cathedral, Ford's remains will be taken to Grand Rapids, Mich., where he will be interred Wednesday in a hillside tomb on the grounds of his presidential museum.

Ford was the accidental president, the only one never elected on a national ticket, yet he served as an important transitional figure in a time of profound cynicism. An Eagle Scout, football player, lawyer, Navy officer and congressman, he never aspired to the White House but had it thrust upon him when he was chosen to succeed first Spiro T. Agnew, driven from the vice presidency by corruption charges, and then Richard M. Nixon, who resigned amid the Watergate scandal on Aug. 9, 1974.

Ford's first major act in office probably guaranteed that he would not keep it, as his decision to pardon Nixon triggered a political backlash and widespread suspicion that he had cut a deal to take over the presidency. He denied the allegation and insisted that the pardon was the only way to move the country beyond Watergate.

It took many years, even decades, but even some of his fiercest critics came to agree. Roger Wilkins, then a New York Times editorial writer who repeatedly condemned Ford over the pardon, wrote a letter to the former president just last month to say he had changed his mind. Then Wilkins delivered a speech at the Ford museum earlier this month saying the same thing.

"Ford was right," Wilkins said in an interview. "The country really needed to move on. The picture of a president in the dock with these motley Democrats hounding him, it would have made the country -- we'd gone through some ugly times, but it would have been uglier. . . . If Ford hadn't done a thing else in his presidency, that would have been a great service to the country."

Other Democrats have come around to the same conclusion. At the time, Rep. David Obey (Wis.) said yesterday, he thought the pardon was "the absolutely wrong thing to do." But now, Obey said, he realizes Ford "served as a healing agent for the country."

Gracious if not always graceful, Ford by the time he died had achieved stature and respect that eluded him in office. The amiable klutz lampooned on "Saturday Night Live" had become transformed into a symbol of decency and moderation, a throwback to a time when Republicans and Democrats would fight by day and share cocktails and war stories by night.

"He was a man who was willing to work with Democrats when and where and how he could," said Rep. John D. Dingell, a Democrat who served in the Michigan delegation with Ford. "He played golf with Tip O'Neill. After he was elevated to the presidency, we worked very closely together on energy matters -- we had huge fights, but worked together. He was a man who was very careful in his personal conduct and so his fights lent respect to him."

Ford never forgot his humble roots, famously presenting himself as "a Ford, not a Lincoln." He was not even born a Ford. His original name was Leslie Lynch King Jr., but his parents divorced and he was renamed Gerald R. Ford Jr. for his mother's second husband. After attending the University of Michigan and starring on its football team, he turned down offers from the Green Bay Packers and Chicago Bears and eventually graduated from Yale Law School. Ford served nearly four years in the Navy during World War II before returning to Michigan to run for the House.

Ford worked his way up to House minority leader, making him an easily confirmable choice as the first vice president appointed under the 25th Amendment, which set rules for filling vacancies.

Upon taking over the Oval Office, he declared, "Our long national nightmare is over." But Watergate was not the only crisis awaiting him.

"When Nixon resigned, Congress was in session, the fighting was going on in Vietnam. He had to form a government with no transition time," said Robert A. Goldwin, who worked for Ford as a special consultant and is now an American Enterprise Institute scholar. "So it wasn't a situation where you could be thinking of long-term plans with so many urgent matters not under your control."

Ford ended U.S. involvement in Vietnam, brokered a cease-fire between Israel and Egypt, signed the Helsinki human rights convention and an arms-control treaty with the Soviet Union, and dispatched Marines to free the crew of a merchant vessel captured by Cambodian communists. He survived two assassination attempts. But he could never pull the country out of the economic troubles he inherited.

"He left a fine example of a president who did what he felt was right whatever the political consequences," said James Cannon, his biographer and former aide. "What he inherited was a series of problems. He inherited a recession, the worst since the Great Depression. He inherited Vietnam, which four presidents had been unable to end, and he ended it -- raggedly, but he ended it. Most of all, he restored the integrity of the presidency."

At a time of high inflation and rising unemployment, Ford saw the economy as "job one," said John Robert Greene, a historian at Cazenovia College in Upstate New York who has written five books on Ford. "It defined his domestic agenda." By his first winter in office, Ford had proposed an end to Nixon-era price controls, combined with tax cuts, a policy of no new spending and caps on federal salaries.

In dealing with an overwhelmingly Democratic Congress, Ford relied on his veto pen as a legislative strategy, rejecting an astonishing number of bills -- 66 in all -- many of which were economic and tax measures he viewed as fiscally irresponsible. "He was the most prolific vetoer in our history," said Rebecca Deen, a political scientist at the University of Texas at Arlington.

The energy crisis of the 1970s also consumed his attention. Ford's energy policy was part of his broad faith in the deregulation that was coming into fashion in conservative circles. And he was a believer in states' rights, Greene said, ordering federal officials not to intervene in Boston's crisis over school desegregation or New York City's fiscal emergency.

Ford, who always said his greatest ambition was to be speaker of the House, waged a vigorous campaign in 1976 to hold on to the White House, barely beating back a nomination challenge from the right in the form of Reagan. But he could not overcome the travails of his tenure to beat Carter in the fall.

Reagan briefly explored the idea of making Ford his vice presidential running mate in 1980. Ford settled into a long post-presidency serving on corporate boards, playing in charity golf tournaments and occasionally teaming up with onetime rival Carter for bipartisan statements.

The tributes poured in yesterday. Vice President Cheney, who served as his chief of staff, saluted Ford's "strength, wisdom, and good judgment" and said, "He was a dear friend and mentor to me until this very day."

Former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who served Ford in the same capacity, hailed his "great decency and towering integrity." Former president George H.W. Bush, who served as Ford's CIA director and envoy to China, called him "one of the most decent and capable men I ever met."

But the words Ford might have appreciated most came from former senator Robert J. Dole, his 1976 running mate. "He was a friend to everyone who met him," Dole said. "He had no enemies."

He Led By Listening (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0109627

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — After Gerald R. Ford became president in 1974, he assembled a staff of strong, brilliant and highly opinionated personalities. Ford's most enduring legacy, some have argued, is the people he brought into power, including Donald H. Rumsfeld, Dick Cheney, Brent Scowcroft and James A. Baker III.

Under three Republican presidents, it is a group that has shaped U.S. foreign policy through the end of the Cold War and its aftermath, nowhere more than during the presidency of George W. Bush, where Rumsfeld and Cheney helped set the course for a war on terrorism and the invasion of Iraq.

"I've talked to people over and over again, and if there is such a thing as a Republican national security apparatus in personnel, they're all Gerald Ford's people," said Scowcroft, who replaced Henry Kissinger as national security advisor in the Ford years. "That's pretty remarkable."

Despite the continuity of the personnel, the way they made policy under Ford and the current president could not be more different, say officials familiar with both administrations. And that contrast has drawn attention as critics have probed the judgments that led to an Iraq war that is increasingly troubled.

In seeking answers to problems, Ford — a veteran of more than two decades of debate in the House of Representatives — relished the give-and-take of open and sometimes heated debate. He would force the strong egos that surrounded him to make their case in person during lengthy White House sessions, where he would constantly question the most minute details.

James T. Lynn, Ford's budget director, recalled one particularly heated discussion among Cabinet members in front of Ford, which ended with the president thanking both sides and retreating to the Oval Office: "I had to go back into the president's office with him, and he turned to me and said, 'Wasn't that fun?' "

Said L. William Seidman, a top Ford economic advisor, "I worked for three or four presidents, and I think more than any other president, [Ford] was determined that all views be presented to him before he made a decision. I think it's very clear in the early days of the Bush administration, they did not have a process like that, and you had people like [Secretary of State Colin L.] Powell saying the State Department never had a chance to present to the president what would happen after the war started."

Critics have cited the Bush team's strong ideological position on Iraq from its earliest days, and questioned why faulty assumptions about that nation's unconventional weapons program and its reaction to a U.S. military occupation were not more vigorously challenged before an invasion was launched.

Presidential historians and former Ford aides warn that too much can be made of the comparison in White House management styles. Bush, they contend, appears to be listening to more outside voices, particularly in his recent rethinking of Iraq policy. And Ford's White House in his early months as president was a place of contention between holdovers from the Nixon administration and former House aides who moved down Pennsylvania Avenue.

In building his administration, Ford aides said, the former president brought in skilled advisors of varied ideological backgrounds. In addition to up-and-comers like Cheney and Rumsfeld — who worked closely with Ford when they were fellow congressmen — Ford tapped for his Cabinet leading intellects such as University of Chicago president Edward H. Levi, who became Ford's attorney general, and William T. Coleman Jr., a distinguished civil rights lawyer who became Transportation secretary.

Ford, they said, was comfortable with being less knowledgeable than his advisors and was unthreatened by strongly voiced disagreements. Unlike almost any subsequent president, Ford was able to create a White House that was open to dissent. To this day, Ford alumni meet annually.

"I know that my friends in the Carter administration said they could never do anything like this, and the Reagan people didn't because there were such rivalries and contests," said James Cannon, a domestic policy advisor to Ford who went on to write one of the few biographies of the former president.

The comparisons with Bush's style first broke into the public debate two years ago. Paul O'Neill, a senior official in the Ford White House's budget office who three decades later became Bush's Treasury secretary, cooperated with author Ron Suskind on a book that made critical contrasts between the two presidents.

In Suskind's book "The Price of Loyalty," O'Neill described Ford as a man comfortable around strong personalities, like Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and James R. Schlesinger, his first Defense secretary — a trait O'Neill attributed to a quiet self-confidence mixed with a non-ideological approach to finding solutions.

In one passage, O'Neill recalled a meeting with Bush in the Oval Office in which he recounted to the president an economic conference he helped set up shortly after Ford took office, a forum featuring economists, business executives and labor leaders with widely differing views on fiscal policy.

"Ford was really good at the meeting," O'Neill recalled telling Bush. "He showed that he was attentive and really knowledgeable about all competing positions." Bush agreed to hold an economic conference of his own, but instead of opposing experts, attendees would almost universally be Bush supporters, and many were political donors. "It'll just be a lot of people reading from a script that says, 'I love the president,' " O'Neill told his staff when he saw the invitation list, according to Suskind's account. "Where, exactly, does that fit in the grand American ideal of free and honest inquiry?"

Stephen Hess, a presidential scholar at the Brookings Institution, argued that O'Neill's view of Ford's presidency is somewhat idealized, and that Ford's White House did not become well functioning until the last months of his presidency.

Bush administration officials have dismissed O'Neill's criticism as the result of bitterness over his dismissal. "Paul has had his say," said Cheney in 2004. "I disagree with his analysis, obviously.... I feel badly for him, to some extent, that he has ended his career on this note."

Other Ford White House veterans, many of whom asked not to be named because they did not want to appear critical of Bush, say they share O'Neill's view of the contrasts.

"The difference is, Ford was looking for answers to questions; he was looking for a way to formulate policy and what policies would work," said one Ford alumnus who has discussed the issue with counterparts in the Bush administration. "These guys came in, and they knew what they wanted to do. They wanted people just to execute. They didn't want to debate."

To the Ford veterans, rigorous internal debates were a model that Bush was ignoring.

According to Suskind, what troubled O'Neill, along with then-Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, who had been chairman of Ford's Council of Economic Advisors, and some other Ford alumni, "was how the order was reversed, how discussions of desired messages seemed to come first and real policy debates came later as justification, or never. That made them fearful."

Ford's Touch As A Mentor Is Part Of Legacy As Leader (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The public's most vivid memories of the late president Gerald Ford may well be his pardon of his predecessor, Richard Nixon, and the gleeful imitations of Ford that comedian Chevy Chase used to do on Saturday Night Live.

But the nation's 38th president, who will lie in state this weekend in the U.S. Capitol where he served most of his political career, left a less heralded but far more enduring legacy in the form of the people he attracted to public service.

Ford's "flair for finding really good people," in the words of Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, has extended his influence far beyond the day his three-year tenure ended in 1977.

Many whose careers Ford launched or nurtured are still in government and shaping policy today. Several Ford advisers played key roles in the administration of President Bush; other protégés will be leaders in the Congress that convenes next month.

Vice President Cheney, a former colleague from the U.S. House, served as White House chief of staff to Ford. In a statement Wednesday, Cheney alluded to the time after Ford replaced President Nixon in the wake of revelations about the Watergate scandal.

Ford "assumed the nation's highest office during the greatest constitutional crisis since the Civil War," Cheney said about the man he called his mentor. "In that troubled era, America needed strength, wisdom and good judgment, and those qualities came to us in the person of Gerald R. Ford."

Recently retired Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld was another congressional colleague who served as Defense secretary for Ford. In Congress, Rumsfeld had managed the campaign that resulted in Ford ousting the more conservative Charles Halleck of Indiana as House Republican leader in 1965.

Ford launched James Baker on a career that would see him serve as an adviser to three presidents. Baker, an undersecretary of Commerce in Ford's administration, later became later secretary of Treasury for Ronald Reagan and secretary of State for George H.W. Bush. Now, he's advising the current president on Iraq.

Another Ford find: Alan Greenspan, who retired this year after 18 years as chairman of the Federal Reserve. "Ford really brought Alan into government," said Hutchison, a friend of both men. Greenspan, who served as chairman of Ford's council of economic advisers, called the former president "the most decent man I have ever encountered."

Ford got one appointment to the Supreme Court, in 1975, and he is still there. John Paul Stevens, 86, is now the oldest justice. In a statement, Stevens said Ford "was a wise president who had the courage to make unpopular decisions that would serve the country's best interests in the long run. Time has proven that his decision to pardon Richard Nixon was such a decision."

The fact that Ford alumni include Cheney and Rumsfeld, now viewed as arch-conservatives, as well as Stevens, one of the court's most liberal members, speaks volumes about the former president, according to those who knew him.

"That's Jerry Ford," said former senator Alan Simpson, a friend of nearly 50 years. "He has a big wingspan. There are a lot of people who fly under the spread of that eagle."

It was Ford who, as Republican House leader, urged George H.W. Bush to run for Congress. Later, as president, he appointed him head the CIA. "I owe much of my life in politics to Jerry Ford," Bush, the father of the current president, said Wednesday. "He campaigned for me in '66, and I won. Then he gave me the great assignment of being equivalent of ambassador in China."

Two relatively junior Ford appointees, Paul O'Neill and John Snow, both served as Treasury secretary for the current president.

"He's got the most magnificent set of alumni, in my opinion, of any president since George Washington," said James Cannon, who served as Ford's domestic policy adviser and later wrote a book about his administration, Time and Chance.

Ford's influence spanned generations. Hutchison, who now holds a Senate GOP leadership position, says Ford was a trailblazer when it came to promoting the careers of women. "He gave me my first real major federal appointment," said the senator, who served as vice chair of the National Transportation Safety Board under Ford.

Ford battled other forms of discrimination. Rod Hills, who served as Ford's chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, said the former president excoriated U.S. bankers and Saudi officials when he learned they were excluding financial services firms with historic ties to Jewish families from participating in Saudi loan issues.

Ford appointed William Coleman, an African-American, to head the Transportation Department and backed him when Coleman insisted that half of the stations on Atlanta's MARTA commuter rail systems be designed by black architects. "The president was very effective in that," Coleman said.

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., said Ford, the Republican House leader, took an interest in him when Lott was working for Rep. William Colmer, D-Miss.

When Colmer died in office in 1980, Ford called Lott and urged him to run to succeed his boss — as a Republican. He also sent him a campaign contribution.

It was a classic example not only of Ford's ability to spot political talent — Lott will serve as the deputy Republican leader of the Senate next year — but of his ability to reach across the divides of party and social status. "I was 28 years old," Lott said. "He took the time to be friendly to me; he didn't just ignore me as a piece of furniture which often happens up here with staffers."

Ford's remains will lie this weekend on the Lincoln catafalque, the velvet-covered bier that was built to hold Abraham Lincoln's coffin. It has been used ever since as a resting place for those honored in the Rotunda of the Capitol. It's a lofty end for a man who endeared himself to members of Congress when he told them, moments after being sworn in as president, "I'm a Ford, not a Lincoln."

That lack of pretentiousness was one of the qualities that drew people to him, those who worked for Ford said. Frank Zarb, who served as Ford's energy czar and later went on to chair NASDAQ, the nation's largest electronic stock market, remembered when Ford realized he had forgotten his cufflinks moments before a TV appearance. He coolly paper-clipped his cuffs together, and told his aides: "Let's go," Zarb said.

Former Defense secretary Melvin Laird, another former House colleague and longtime Ford friend, was with him the night Ford learned that he would become president. Laird says Ford spent the evening sitting on the floor of his suburban Virginia home explaining the situation to his children.

When Nixon was about to fire Agnew as his vice president, Laird enlisted members of Congress to convince the president to replace him with Ford, Laird said in an interview. The main reason: Laird knew that the vice president soon might replace Nixon himself.

"I loved Jerry. I respected him. I admired him. I knew he was a straight shooter," Laird said.

Those feelings reflected Ford's own management style. Robert Hartmann, a counselor in Ford's White House, said his old boss had two rules: "Never look down on anybody and always be good to your friends."

Some of those friends included Democrats. "He loved Tip O'Neill," said Simpson, referring to the late Democratic speaker of the House.

Both Lott and Bob Michel, who served in the House Republican leadership after Ford, said they modeled their own efforts to reach bipartisan compromise after Ford. "I learned a lot from his stewardship," Michel said.

The most senior member of the House, Democrat John Dingell, served 17 years with Ford in the Michigan delegation and considered him a friend and a tough competitor. As president, Ford vetoed bills passed by the Democratic-controlled Congress 66 times, Dingell said, but added: "We could work with him."

Ford served as "a balance point between the increasingly conservative wing of the Republican Party and the more liberal wing," said presidential historian Carl Sferrazza Anthony. "He was always seeking middle ground."

Ford's White House was free of the "leaks and internal bickering" that have characterized many administrations, Zarb said. "He's a man who had the extraordinary confidence to surround himself with excellent people," Zarb said. "Those persons became a team with an extraordinary chemistry."

That loyalty was evident at the annual reunions that Ford staffers held to fete the former president.

At the last one, the former president and his wife, Betty, unable to stand for the entire receiving line, gamely propped themselves on barstools so they could pose with their guests for photos, Michel said.

Ford even won over another up-and-comer whose career he inadvertently advanced. "He was a really sweet man," said Chevy Chase, a self-described liberal who became friends with the former president because of his SNL imitations.

To the end, Laird said, Ford never failed in his concern for others. Laird, who had his last conversation with the ailing former president a week ago, said that Ford told him: "Mel, I've got to hang on to Christmas. The whole family is going to be here."

Praise Pours In For Ford; State Funeral Plans Underway (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The funeral of Gerald R. Ford will begin Friday in California, then move here for a state funeral before the 38th president of the United States is buried in his home state of Michigan, a family spokesman said today.

Ford, who died in his home at Rancho Mirage on Tuesday, will begin his final trip from St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in nearby Palm Desert, family spokesman Gregory D. Willard told an afternoon news conference.

President Bush led the tributes and praise from government leaders and California neighbors that poured in to the family throughout the day.

"My family and I are touched beyond words by the outpouring of affection and the many wonderful tributes we have received following the death of my husband," said Ford's widow, Betty, in a prepared statement read at an afternoon news conference by family representative Gregory D. Willard.

"The nation's appreciation for the contributions that President Ford made throughout his long and well lived life are more than we could have ever anticipated. These kindnesses have made this difficult time more bearable. On behalf of all of the Ford family, we are deeply grateful," she stated.

According to Willard, the casket carrying Ford's body will arrive at St. Margaret's after noon at Friday. At 12:30 p.m., there will be a private prayer service.

Public repose will begin at about 4:20 p.m.

On Saturday, the casket will be moved to Washington. The motorcade from the airport will pause at the World War II memorial in tribute to former Navy officer.

The state funeral will be conducted in the Capitol Rotunda that evening and after that, the public will be able to pay its respects.

Ford will be the 11th president to lie in state in the Capitol Rotunda. The Rotunda has been used for public viewing since Henry Clay died in 1852. Last year civil rights pioneer Rosa Parks was honored there – the first woman and only second African American to lie in state at the Capitol.

Ford's body will lie in repose outside the House of Representatives where he served for 25 years and outside the main entrance to the Senate chamber, a nod to his legislative career that led to his appointment as vice president and his promotion to president when Richard Nixon left office in disgrace.

Ford was expected to lie in state until Tuesday morning when the body will be taken for a service at the National Cathedral. From there it will be flown to the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum in Grand Rapids, Mich.

Burial will be the following day at hillside near the museum, Willard said.

President Bush earlier ordered that American flags fly at half-staff at the White House and on all U.S. buildings in honor of Ford as politicians on both sides of the aisle praised the 38th president as the leader who tried to ease the country past a troubled period.

"As a congressman from Michigan, and then as Vice President, he commanded the respect and earned the good will of all who had the privilege of knowing him," President Bush said this morning of Ford in Crawford, Texas.

"On August 9, 1974, he stepped into the presidency without ever having sought the office. He assumed power in a period of great division and turmoil. For a nation that needed healing and for an office that needed a calm and steady hand, Gerald Ford came along when we needed him most."

In Grand Rapids, the Gerald R. Ford Museum opened its lobby for 24 hours, so that well wishers could offer condolences. And in New York, the Stock Exchange held two minutes of silence before the start of trading and Nasdaq asked traders to refrain from making trades during that time.

Both Republicans and Democrats praised Ford.

"An outstanding statesman," said former President Jimmy Carter, who defeated Ford in 1976. "One of the kindest, most sincere elected officials whom I have known," said Sen. Robert Byrd of West Virginia.

"Made Michigan proud as he led our nation through one of the most challenging times in our history," said Sen. Debbie Stabenow of Michigan.

"No man could have been better suited to the task of healing our nation and restoring faith in our government," said California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger.

"When he left office, he had restored public trust in the presidency," said Vice President Cheney, who served as Ford's White House chief of staff.

"A good man who became the respected leader of the free world in unique times," said Patricia Nixon Cox, daughter of the man Ford succeeded. "An American hero whose integrity and honesty helped lead our nation through times of uncertainty and skepticism."

Many praised Ford for his moderate views and consensus approach to governance.

Log Cabin Republicans, the nation's largest gay GOP organization, said that Ford always believe in inclusiveness in welcoming gays into the party and advocating equal rights for them. "President Ford recognized that all Americans deserve to be treated with dignity and fairness," said Log Cabin Republican President Patrick Sammon. "Throughout his presidency, President Ford served with integrity as a leader for all Americans."

And former first lady Nancy Reagan, in a statement, said that Ford's support for stem cell research his early support of stem cell research was important "in getting the U.S. Congress to debate the potential lifesaving cures and treatments that may result."

A creature of Capitol Hill – Ford served in Congress for 25 years – he was also the last of the moderate Republicans who, like his Vice President Nelson Rockefeller, aimed for the center. As a result, fond memories and warm tributes came from both Republicans and Democrats today.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said "Gerald Ford did not seek the presidency, but it was thrust upon him. And as he said, he did not 'shirk' those responsibilities. He helped heal the nation and close the wounds of the past. President Ford will be remembered for putting the good of the nation above his own personal, political fortunes. It is this type of public service that should be a model for all who follow."

Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) said: "President Ford restored transparency to the White House. He did what he thought was right and explained his actions without spin. By showing himself as a regular guy who happened to achieve great things, he brought renewed respect to the presidency when the country really needed it. I was a freshman in Congress when he was president. During his presidency and many times afterward, whenever I talked to him, he was an all-American, regular guy."

The Michigan delegation also praised their former colleague. Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), put out a statement saying, "Gerald Ford and I came from different sides of the aisle, but we forged a wonderful friendship as we served Michigan together in the House of Representatives. When his nation called on him to serve this country in the most difficult of times, he rose up and held the country together. It will certainly be his legacy. I will remember him fondly and I will miss him dearly."

Another Michigan colleague, Democratic Sen. Carl Levin said, "Gerald Ford was deeply respected on both sides of the political aisle for his fairness, his bipartisanship, and his integrity. He helped smooth out the rough edges of politics. Over time, we will honor his memory in many ways, but one immediate way is to return the Gerald Ford quality of civility to the nation's capital."

Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson also issued a statement, noting that "before the world knew him as president, vice president or congressman, Gerald Ford served our nation proudly in the Navy during World War II. Even after ascending to the highest office in the land, President Ford kept a military man's perspective and never forgot what it meant to serve his nation. Aptly, he once said, 'The presidency and the vice-presidency were not prizes to be won, but a duty to be done.' President Ford spent a lifetime answering the call to duty.'"

It was a time of deep division and political uncertainty in America. Gerald Ford tried to bridge the chasm of enmity with a plain-spoken reminder: The Constitution works; the US is a nation of law, not men. As he delivered his remarks, several of the listeners teared up.

This could have been from his inaugural address in 1974, when President Ford declared the "long national nightmare" of the Watergate scandal over, and spoke of "truth" as "the glue that holds government together." But the occasion was more recent: the 200th-anniversary celebration of the first White House. The event just happened to fall as Al Gore was calling for a hand recount in Florida in an unresolved presidential election that was turning into its own nightmare.

The formal dinner party in the White House East Room on Nov. 9, 2000, was "providential," Mr. Ford stated calmly. The anniversary brought together four presidents who had been bitter rivals, but who joined amicably that evening in honoring something bigger than individuals and their campaigns.

Gerald Ford, who died on Tuesday, led a political life of conscience and comity. These qualities helped heal a nation after President Nixon resigned for covering up a 1972 break-in at Democratic headquarters. Ford pardoned his disgraced predecessor early on, explaining that his "conscience" told him that he could not "prolong the bad dreams that continue to reopen a chapter that is closed."

The pardon brought howls of criticism from all sides, but as the years passed, it has come to be viewed as the right thing to do. Ford himself believed that his greatest achievement was the healing of national division caused by Watergate.

Ford's candor and amicability are sorely needed in Washington politics today, given the steadily rising shrill, partisan tone. One might be tempted to think that the Ford way was unique to his situation - a president never elected to the Oval Office, and as a result, freer to be his own man. But his life shows a consistency of approach from his earliest days in politics.

In 1948, he successfully ran for the US House as an "internationalist," seeking the best role for America in the world. That played out later in his controversial presidential decision to back the Helsinki Accords with the Soviet Union - a move that again proved wise in the long run, because it encouraged dissidents to demand that Moscow live up to its Helsinki human rights commitments.

As the House Republican minority leader, he refused to discipline party members who crossed the leadership. Punishment is "counterproductive," he said. "That person knows that he disappointed you. To rub it in makes it, the next time,... impossible to get his cooperation."

Ford had a rough time as president. He was unable to tame nearly 12 percent inflation, and he presided over the fall of Saigon. He lost narrowly to Democrat Jimmy Carter in the bitterly contested election of 1976, in part because of the Nixon pardon.

And yet Ford and Carter later became friends. With his typical offbeat humor, he brought a little levity to the White House party in 2000: "Take it from someone who knows all about losing a close election," Ford quipped. "There is life after [leaving office]."

Certainly his was a full and exemplary life.

Unassuming Ford Was Perfect Salve For A Wounded Nation (USAT)

It's hard to imagine an English muffin being an important part of governing. But it was for Gerald Ford.

In 1974, after the trauma of Watergate, the nation yearned for a less imperial presence in the White House, and Ford was determined to fill that role. Taking office after the resignation of Richard M. Nixon, he re-established a sense of normalcy in part by being an everyman president. On his first day he made his own breakfast and announced he would do so in future.

Over the years, it has been easy to dismiss this as a trivial photo opportunity. It has also been easy to dismiss the Ford presidency as merely adequate, if that. Both assessments have been proven wrong.

Ford, who died Tuesday at 93, was a fine president who returned integrity to the White House and restored faith in government at a time when both were desperately needed. He was the right man at the right time to lead the nation. He was the perfect antidote to the corruption and paranoia of the Nixon White House. And for that, the nation owes him much.

His abrupt yet courageous pardon of Nixon, while clearly damaging to his political career, is increasingly seen as having been in the country's best interest. It spared the nation years more of wallowing in Watergate and the likely spectacle of an ex-president going to prison. Only one-third of the public supported the decision at the time but, by 2002, that number had risen to three-fifths in an ABC News poll.

Ford's largest accomplishment, however, was in being the embodiment of a phrase he used in his speech after he took the oath of office: "A government of laws, not of men."

Ford's style was understated, unglamorous. Though an accomplished athlete, by 1975 he had even developed an underserved reputation for clumsiness, and was lampooned weekly on Saturday Night Live by actor Chevy Chase. Combined with the Nixon pardon, an inflationary economy not of his making and weariness with Republican rule, it is perhaps inevitable he would lose when he ran for the office in his own right in 1976 against Jimmy Carter.

But in hindsight, his down-to-earth ways look good. In the weeks after taking office, they were a salve on the open wound left by the Nixon presidency. And they stack up well against some of the more ego-driven and polished presidencies that preceded and followed his.

Sadly, it's unlikely we will have another president like Ford any time soon. Today's presidential candidates are ruthless in their pursuit of the office and possess a willingness to spend years campaigning and raising millions of dollars.

Ford, who never even aspired to be anything higher than Speaker of the House, lacked these traits. Nor did he have a particular talent at being rigidly partisan or vindictive.

He was only an outstanding public servant. Wise yet humble, he possessed a keen sense of what America needed after Watergate. That included a president who didn't require a bevy of servants to make his breakfast.

After Ford's Death, Tributes Are Set For Capital (NYT)

By David Stout And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 27 — The body of former President Gerald R. Ford will lie in the Capitol this weekend amid tributes marked by considerably less pageantry than the funeral of former President Ronald Reagan in 2004, Congressional officials said Wednesday.

Services for Mr. Ford, the 38th president, who died late Tuesday, will begin Friday in Palm Desert, Calif., with private prayers for the family at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church, Gregory D. Willard, a Ford family spokesman, said at a news conference.

The next day, his body will be flown to Washington. The hearse is to pause at the World War II Memorial on the National Mall in recognition of Mr. Ford's naval service in the Pacific. His state funeral is to be conducted on Saturday evening in the Capitol Rotunda, after which the public will be allowed to file by the coffin.

A service will be held next Tuesday in the Washington National Cathedral.

After the cathedral service, Mr. Ford's body will be flown to Grand Rapids, Mich., where he got his start in national politics. The next day, after services at Grace Episcopal Church there, he will be interred on a hillside near his presidential museum. (Mr. Ford's presidential library is at Ann Arbor, Mich.)

Two senior Congressional officials familiar with the plans for the services said these would include the full military honors that accompany a state funeral. But the officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said the plans called for a less elaborate ceremony inside the Capitol and leading up to the service than the proceedings for Reagan.

In an unusual feature meant to highlight Mr. Ford's long service in Congress, his body is to lie in repose outside the main door of the House of Representatives and, later, outside the main door of the Senate, said Mr. Willard, the family spokesman.

"I know personally how much those two tributes themselves meant to President Ford," Mr. Willard said. Mr. Willard and Terry O'Donnell, who both worked in the Ford White House and remained close to the former president, are organizing the services.

More than most presidents, Gerald Ford was a man of the Congress. He was Republican leader in the House, denied his dream of being speaker by his party's long minority status decades ago. As vice president, he was the president of the Senate.

Like Reagan, who never served in Congress, Mr. Ford was a son of the Midwest. But by personal inclination and design, Mr. Ford was less a performer than Reagan, and he seemed far more comfortable with plain language and a minimum of trappings.

Public officials and politicians of all persuasions were united Wednesday in praising Mr. Ford as a man who could be partisan without being polarizing and as a throwback, in a way, to a time when Republicans and Democrats battled during the day and afterward enjoyed one another's friendship.

"The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character and the honorable conduct of his administration," President Bush said at his ranch in Crawford, Tex., as he ordered American flags at the White House and "all buildings, grounds, and naval vessels of the United States" flown at half-staff for 30 days.

It was not clear Wednesday evening whether Mr. Bush intended to fly to Washington from his Texas ranch to attend the Saturday evening service at the Capitol. The president's schedule was to be announced Thursday.

Democrats, too, remembered Mr. Ford with affection.

"To his great credit, he was the same hard-working, down-to-earth person the day he left the White House as he was when he first entered Congress almost 30 years earlier," former President Bill Clinton and his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, said in a joint statement.

Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, called Mr. Ford "a healer" who unified the nation after the ordeal of Watergate. "But we in Michigan hold Jerry Ford in affection and esteem for his lifetime of service, including 13 terms in the House of Representatives," Mr. Levin said. "We take particular pride in this son of Michigan and the manner in which he always treasured his West Michigan roots."

"Over time," Mr. Levin added, "we will honor his memory in many ways, but one immediate way is to return the Gerald Ford quality of civility to the nation's capital."

The state funeral for Mr. Ford, details of which were still being worked out, will be only the third in 34 years. Reagan's state funeral in Washington was the first since former President Lyndon B. Johnson's in January 1973.

And Harry S. Truman was laid to rest in his native Missouri in 1972 after a minimum of pomp. For those who like presidential trivia, Truman also died on Dec. 26. Like Mr. Ford, Truman was a man of Middle America who inherited the presidency, was unpopular for a time and was willing to let history be the final judge.

Presidents, former presidents and presidents-elect are entitled to a state funeral, which include military pallbearers, military music, gun salutes, a flag-covered coffin and other embellishments. They are typically attended by kings, queens, prime ministers and other high foreign officials. Perhaps the most famous state funeral in United States history — and an indelible memory for those of a certain age — was that for President John F. Kennedy in 1963.

Some presidents and their families have chosen less elaborate farewells. Richard M. Nixon, driven from office by the scandals that vaulted Mr. Ford to the White House, was buried in a simple ceremony at his presidential library in Yorba Linda, Calif., in 1994. The rites for Franklin D. Roosevelt were held at the family home in Hyde Park, N.Y.

Justice John Paul Stevens, whom Mr. Ford nominated for the Supreme Court in 1975, called him "a wise president who had the courage to make unpopular decisions that would serve the country's best interests in the long run."

"Time has proved that his decision to pardon Richard Nixon was such a decision," Justice Stevens said in a statement issued by the court. "We mourn his passing but remember his all-American career with admiration, affection and total respect."

Justice Stevens's "all-American" allusion was to Gerald Ford's football prowess at the University of Michigan. Mr. Ford was the frequent butt of jokes about his supposed clumsiness, even though he was among the most athletically gifted of presidents.

Justice Stevens is the only member of the Supreme Court to be chosen by Mr. Ford, and he is now the longest serving. Vice President Dick Cheney and former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld both served as chief of staff to President Ford.

"President Ford was a man of great decency and towering integrity," Mr. Rumsfeld said Wednesday. "He was a patriot who left a budding law career to join the United States Navy in World War II. I was privileged to serve with him in the Congress and saw firsthand his pride in our country and his deep respect for our system of government."

Ford's State Funeral Begins Friday (AP)

By Calvin Woodward

AP, December 28, 2006

Gerald R. Ford's state funeral will begin Friday in his beloved California, with the late president then to lie in state in the U.S. Capitol over the weekend, a family representative said Wednesday.

Giving the first details of funeral arrangements for the 38th president, family representative Gregory D. Willard said events will last until Wednesday, when Ford will be interred in a hillside tomb near his presidential museum in his home state of Michigan.

Ceremonies begin Friday, with a private prayer service for the family at St. Margaret's Church in Palm Desert, Calif., visitation by friends and a period of public repose.

On Saturday, Ford's body will be flown to Washington in late afternoon, his hearse pausing at the World War II memorial in joint tribute to the wartime Navy reserve veteran and his comrades in uniform, Willard said.

The state funeral will be conducted in the Capitol Rotunda that evening and after that, the public will be able to file in to pay last respects. Ford was expected to lie in state until Tuesday morning.

In a departure from tradition meant to highlight Ford's long service in Congress, his body will lie in repose outside the main door of the House and, later, outside the main doors of the Senate chamber.

A Cross-country Goodbye For The 38th President (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, December 28, 2006

President Gerald Ford will lie in state this weekend in the U.S. Capitol Rotunda and have a state funeral Tuesday at Washington National Cathedral, a family spokesman said.

His final place of rest will be a hillside tomb in Grand Rapids, Mich., the city he lived in as a boy within the district he represented in Congress for a quarter-century, said family spokesman Gregory Willard.

President Bush will be among many dignitaries to attend the Washington service for Ford, who died Tuesday at age 93.

A cause of death was not disclosed, but Ford had been in declining health in recent years. In January, he was hospitalized for 12 days for pneumonia. In August, he underwent angioplasty at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn.

Speaking to reporters Wednesday before sunrise from his ranch in Crawford, Texas, Bush described Ford as "a man of complete integrity who led our country with common sense and kind instincts.

"Our 38th president will always have a special place in our nation's history," Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0109637

On Friday, a small, private ceremony will be held at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, Calif., near the Fords' home. The Rev. Robert Certain, the family's pastor, said the public would be invited to pay respects to Ford at the church later in the day.

On Saturday, Ford will be flown to Washington and lie in state through Tuesday morning. In a departure from tradition meant to highlight his long congressional service, Ford's remains will lie in repose outside the doors of both the House and Senate for short periods.

Following services at the cathedral, Ford's casket will be returned to Grand Rapids. There, Ford will be buried on Wednesday in a tomb on the grounds of the Gerald R. Ford Museum. Ford represented Grand Rapids in Congress from 1949 until he was tapped as President Nixon's vice president in 1973.

Ford's grace and bipartisanship became the theme of the many tributes offered to him by Bush, former presidents Clinton, Carter and George H.W. Bush, and congressional leaders.

Ford will be the 11th president to lie in state. His funeral will not feature as much pageantry as that of President Reagan in 2004. Reagan's funeral was the first state funeral since Lyndon Johnson's in 1973, and his casket was carried in a funeral procession down Pennsylvania Avenue — an honor granted to only eight presidents. Funeral processions were held for all four presidents who were assassinated: Abraham Lincoln, James Garfield, William McKinley and John F. Kennedy.

Presidential funerals are painstakingly planned years in advance, with presidents typically participating in the decision-making. After a president dies, the U.S. Army Military District of Washington and the family handle the details.

Former Republican Senate majority leader Robert Dole of Kansas told CNN that he would be one of the honorary pallbearers.

In Michigan, mourners paid their respects at the Ford museum Wednesday. The museum said its lobby would remain open 24 hours a day until the burial.

Low-Key Services Planned In D.C. And Michigan For Modest President (WP)

By Steve Vogel

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

The body of Gerald R. Ford will arrive Saturday in Washington and lie in repose in the Capitol Rotunda, but in keeping with the unassuming former president's style, his state funeral will be as modest as such an affair can be.

Unlike the 2004 state funeral for Ronald Reagan, the funeral for Ford will include no horse-drawn caisson, no caparisoned horse and no grand military parade down Constitution Avenue. Instead, at the request of the family, the body of the nation's 38th president will be whisked by motorcade around town in a hearse.

"That's the decision of the family," said Army Col. James Yonts, a military spokesman for the command overseeing funeral arrangements.

Ford's death at 93 nonetheless triggered preparations both intricate and massive in and around Washington yesterday, with plans culminating in a funeral Tuesday morning at Washington National Cathedral.

After a private prayer service tomorrow in Palm Desert, Calif., Ford's body will be flown Saturday to Andrews Air Force Base in Prince George's County, with arrival expected about 5:20 p.m. A motorcade will take the former president's body to the Capitol via the Mall, pausing in tribute at the National World War II Memorial.

After arriving at the Capitol, the former president's casket will be carried up the east steps to the door of the House of Representatives, where Ford represented Michigan from 1949 to 1973.

At 7 p.m. Saturday, a service will be held in the Capitol Rotunda. Ford's body will continue to lie in state until Tuesday morning, allowing the public to pay last respects. The hours of visitation have not been announced.

On Tuesday morning, the casket will be moved from the Rotunda to the U.S. Senate, and following a departure ceremony on the east steps, taken by motorcade to Washington National Cathedral for a 10:30 a.m. funeral.

Ford's casket will be taken afterward to Andrews and flown to Grand Rapids, Mich., site of the Gerald R. Ford presidential museum. Services will be held Wednesday, followed by burial in a tomb on a hillside near the museum.

A special military task force created for the funeral began assembling key personnel at Fort McNair in Washington early in the morning yesterday, soon after Ford's death was reported.

The commander of the Joint Force Headquarters for the National Capital Region, Army Maj. Gen. Guy C. Swan III, departed from Andrews about 6 a.m. aboard a military aircraft with dozens of personnel on a flight to Palm Springs, Calif., near the Ford family home in Rancho Mirage. A second planeload left later in the morning.

"This is really the Super Bowl for the command, so these soldiers are ready," said Yonts, spokesman for the command.

About 3,000 to 4,000 service members in the Washington area are expected to be involved in the funeral.

Swan met with members of the Ford family beginning late in the morning yesterday to review existing plans that had been prepared with the involvement of the family, including the former president.

Ford was known for his consideration for others, and the funeral preparations reflect that, officials said. "The family is very sensitive to the approaching holiday weekend and a lot of key members of the leadership being out," Yonts said.

The military party sent to California includes an honor guard, chaplain and band members. They are preparing formal ceremonies to mark the casket's departure from Palm Springs and to greet it at Andrews.

The task force, known as Joint Force Headquarters-National Capital Region, has established an operations center at Fort McNair that will be operating 24 hours a day for more than a week. The command has recalled some military personnel from holiday leave to begin the preparations. "We've asked them to cut leave short," Yonts said.

Military officials began coordinating road closings and security with National Park Service, U.S. Capitol and District police. The Capitol and Washington National Cathedral were showing signs of bustle and dash. "All those sites are starting to take on the look of activity," Yonts said.

The funeral plans prompted D.C. officials to push back the time of Tuesday's inauguration of Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty. Fenty decided to delay all inaugural ceremonies until after Ford's body leaves Washington.

The inauguration, and the swearing-in of D.C. Council members, had been set for 10 a.m. It now is tentatively set for 2 p.m. Fenty plans to go ahead with plans for an inaugural ball Tuesday night.

Ford Assassination Attempts Recalled (AP)

AP, December 28, 2006

In the fall of 1975, Gerald Ford's presidency was rocked by two assassination attempts within less than three weeks. The first took place on Sept. 5, 1975, in Sacramento, Calif., where Ford had spent the night at the Senator Hotel. The president arose early that day to address a group of about 1,000 California businessmen gathered at the hotel.

Ford then set out to walk across a broad expanse of lawn to the California statehouse to address the Legislature in a speech on crime.

"It was a nice, sunny morning and a crowd of about 500, many of them state employees, had gathered along the way to greet him," recalled The Associated Press' Howard Benedict, who was in the White House press pool that day.

"About five minutes after Ford left the hotel, all hell broke loose as several news people burst into the press room (on the first floor of the hotel) shouting things like, 'Someone pulled a gun on the president!' "

Walter Rodgers of AP Radio was among the first through the door, and he started dictating a story to his desk, Benedict said.

"I immediately relayed what he said to the San Francisco bureau, something like: 'A woman in a red dress pulled a gun on President Ford today, but she was wrestled to the ground by a Secret Service agent,'" Bennedict said.

Bennedict then ran out to the scene. The Secret Service had already hustled Ford into the statehouse, but agents "had the young woman pinned up against a tree, her hands behind her in handcuffs. I was struck by the fact that she was completely in red: long red dress, red bandanna and red shoes," Benedict said.

"The Secret Service said she had pulled a .45 caliber pistol while standing in the crowd about 4 feet from Ford and that her name was Lynette Fromme. She muttered something like: 'The gun didn't go off, it didn't go off. Can you believe it?' "

It was later determined that though the automatic pistol was loaded with five bullets, the slide had not been pulled to place a bullet in the firing chamber, making it impossible for the gun to fire.

Several women who witnessed the incident described it to Benedict:

"Ford was shaking hands with everyone and smiling when suddenly he turned ashen and froze as he saw the gun being raised only a few feet away. Then a Secret Service agent grabbed the woman with the gun and another hit Ford from behind, buckling his knees and knocking him to the ground. They got him on his feet and ran him to the Statehouse."

While relaying this information to AP's San Francisco bureau, Benedict mentioned the name Lynette Fromme.

"It brought an immediate response: 'Yeah, Squeaky. We've had run-ins with her before. She's a follower of Charles Manson, the one serving a life term for murder in San Quentin.' "

Meanwhile, reporters waited outside Gov. Jerry Brown's office with Secret Service agents while Ford and the governor conversed.

"Strangely, we learned later, Brown had not heard about the assassination attempt, and Ford did not mention it until one of his aides in the room brought it up about a half hour into the conversation," Benedict said.

But the legislators had heard, Benedict recalled, and they gave Ford a rousing reception when he walked into the chamber. Ford delivered his address on crime, but did not mention the Fromme incident.

In Washington, when Ford stepped off the helicopter from Andrews Air Force Base, the entire White House staff was on the lawn to give him a cheering return, Benedict said.

Fromme was convicted of attempted assassination of the president and is serving a life sentence.

The second assassination attempt occurred just 17 days later on Sept. 22, 1975 in San Francisco.

Ford had made a luncheon speech to a foreign affairs group at the St. Francis Hotel. The president then left the hotel to take the motorcade to the airport for the flight back to Washington.

Benedict was in the press room inside the hotel, while AP's Frank Cormier was in the pool that was to accompany the president. Cormier was standing outside his motorcade car when Ford emerged from the hotel with the hotel manager.

"Suddenly, Bob Pierpoint of CBS rushed into the press room, shouting something like, 'You won't believe this, but somebody just took a shot at the president and they have rushed him off to Air Force One,' " Benedict said.

"I quickly dictated what Pierpoint had said, and the initial bulletin on the shooting quoted him.

"Meanwhile, Frank heard the shot and saw Secret Service agents push the president down. He quickly jumped into the motorcade car, grabbed his phone and dialed Washington, reaching the bureau just after the Pierpoint bulletin cleared. A swift ride to the airport and a quick boarding of Air Force One got the president safely away from San Francisco."

Later, Benedict learned from press briefings and interviews that the shooter was Sara Jane Moore, a middle-aged radical turned FBI informant who had been standing in a crowd about 40 feet from Ford as he emerged from the hotel.

As she raised her .38 caliber revolver to fire, Oliver Sipple, a disabled former U.S. Marine who was standing next to her. He quickly pushed up her arm as the gun discharged. The bullet flew over Ford's head by several feet, ricocheted off the side of the hotel and slightly wounded a cab driver in the crowd.

Moore pleaded guilty to attempted assassination of the president and was sentenced to life in prison. She escaped prison in 1989, but turned herself in two days later.

Infamous 'Drop Dead' Was Never Said By Ford (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

Gerald R. Ford and Marie Antoinette did not have much in common, but being misquoted cost both of them their jobs.

In Hollywood's latest biography of the French queen, she denies having callously suggested that breadless peasants eat cake instead. "I never said that," the actress Kirsten Dunst pouts. "I wonder why people keep saying I did."

Mr. Ford, on Oct. 29, 1975, gave a speech denying federal assistance to spare New York from bankruptcy. The front page of The Daily News the next day read: "FORD TO CITY: DROP DEAD."

Mr. Ford never explicitly said "drop dead." Yet those two words, arguably the essence of his remarks as encapsulated in the immortal headline, would, as he later acknowledged, cost him the presidency the following year, after Jimmy Carter, nominated by the Democrats in New York, narrowly carried the state.

"It more than annoyed me because it wasn't accurate," he recalled years later. "It was very unfair."

That view is echoed in an evolving version of historical revisionism. Only two months after saying or meaning or merely implying "drop dead" — or, perhaps, resorting to tough love by holding the city's feet to the fire — Mr. Ford signed legislation to provide federal loans to the city, which were repaid with interest.

Gov. Hugh L. Carey, among others, argues that Mr. Ford's public recalcitrance bought time for the city to make its case to an even more reluctant Congress. ("He told me he didn't have the votes," Mr. Carey recalled Mr. Ford saying.)

Moreover, the speech spurred New York's civic, business and labor leaders to rally bankers in the United States and abroad, who feared their own investments would be harmed if New York defaulted on its debt.

Mr. Ford was also an unlikely whipping boy. His resolve against profligacy was stiffened by more inviting villains, especially his treasury secretary, William E. Simon, whom even the president referred to as "hard-nosed."

Mr. Simon warned that bailing out the city would amount to nationalizing municipal debt and rewarding local officials who lacked the will to stanch the inevitable hemorrhaging inflicted by bankrupt liberalism. (The investment banker Felix G. Rohatyn, recruited by Mr. Carey to rescue the city, would liken default to "someone stepping into a tepid bath and slashing his wrists — you might not feel yourself dying, but that's what would happen").

The Ford administration's politically suicidal demands to city officials — raise transit fares, abolish rent control, scrap free tuition at the City University — prompted Victor Gotbaum, the municipal labor leader, to complain that Mr. Simon barely believed in government at all, except for police and fire protection, "and he's not sure about fire."

David R. Gergen, an assistant to Mr. Simon at the time and later a presidential adviser, recalled that Mr. Ford himself "was one of those moderate Republicans who actually liked New York" — he chose Nelson A. Rockefeller as his vice president — but that "he was offended by the city's profligate spending."

"The president's speechwriters whipped up one draft, and I was asked by the White House chief of staff to write an alternative version," Mr. Gergen said. "I wrote a hard-hitting piece, assuming that if it ever saw the light of day, the White House would, in the normal course, invite me to smooth the rough edges. Instead, someone plopped a few of my rough, unedited paragraphs into the final text."

In the speech, the president said: "The people of this country will not be stampeded. They will not panic when a few desperate New York officials and bankers try to scare New York's mortgage payments out of them."

The speech had a powerful impact, Mr. Gergen said. "It was a doozy of a speech, but events caught both sides by surprise," Mr. Gergen remembered. "New Yorkers had not foreseen how tough the president would be, and Republicans in Washington had not anticipated how angry the response would be."

Howard J. Rubenstein, the public relations executive who was an adviser to Mayor Abraham D. Beame, recalled that the speech "galvanized New York like I've never seen before." Mr. Rubenstein still has a framed copy of the headline on his office wall.

With 30 years' hindsight, some of the players say that if Mr. Ford had acquiesced to the city's appeals months or even weeks earlier, New York might never have recovered.

"Ford was good for New York, because he made us clean up our act," said Henry J. Stern, a former parks commissioner and city councilman.

On balance, Mr. Rohatyn said, "I think he was a plus," he said. "Ford did change his mind, and you can't say that about every president."

Edward I. Koch, who succeeded Mr. Beame, said of Mr. Ford: "Obviously he was persuaded his original position was wrong, and that shows a great man open to change. I hold nothing against him. And there are very few people, even when they're dead, that I hold nothing against."

Not long ago, Mr. Ford was interviewed for a tribute to Lewis Rudin, the New York real estate magnate and civic booster who fought mightily for federal help from the Ford administration in 1975. Praising Mr. Rudin's relentless lobbying, Mr. Ford once again returned to the famous headline that had haunted him for decades.

"It was totally untrue," he said, adding with a weak smile, "We burned all those papers."

Ford's Economic Record Belies His Reputation (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

The economic policies of Gerald R. Ford are usually remembered as a joke. Soon after he took over as president, in August 1974, he tried to tame runaway price increases by urging Americans to wear round red lapel pins emblazoned with the initials WIN, for "whip inflation now."

That didn't work, of course, and the pins soon disappeared amid public ridicule.

But Ford didn't give up the fight against what was then called stagflation: a debilitating mix of rapid inflation, high unemployment and slow economic growth. In fact, before his 30-month administration ended, he discarded his original plans and cobbled together an unconventional set of programs that succeeded, at least for a while, in slowing the country's financial slide.

Among his economic policies, "what President Ford is most remembered for is the inflation campaign, which was kind of silly," said Alice M. Rivlin, a former vice chairman of the Federal Reserve Board and a director of The Washington Post Co. "But in the end, I think, he did quite well."

The U.S. economy was in sad shape when Ford replaced the disgraced Richard M. Nixon to become the nation's 38th president. Then it got worse. The economy fell into the steepest recession since World War II, coupled with an upward price spiral that was faster than at any time in modern memory.

Unemployment approached 9 percent, inflation ran at a 12 percent annual rate, and the gross domestic product was flat or declining. Energy prices, in particular, soared due to an oil shortage.

"The '70s were probably the most difficult decade in which to formulate economic policy," Rivlin recalled. "Economists don't know how to cope with inflation, slow growth and unemployment at the same time."

Initially, Ford believed that fiscal austerity, a tenet of his Republican Party, would solve the country's woes. He convened a summit called the Conference on Inflation, with economists and leaders of business and labor focusing on recommendations to slow price increases. He then proposed to cut federal spending and raise taxes and, for a short period, he embraced the idea of a voluntary wage-price freeze.

Ford also hoped to jawbone his way out of the crisis by going on national television in October 1974 and urging citizens to "make up a list of 10 ways you can save energy and fight inflation." In a separate speech to Congress, Ford declared that inflation was "public enemy number one" and asked Americans to wear the anti-inflation pins.

WIN was laughed into oblivion as a hollow gimmick, and Ford was forced to regroup. Under the tutelage of Alan Greenspan, then chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers and later Federal Reserve chairman, Ford was persuaded that the most pressing problems were unemployment and sluggish economic growth, not inflation.

As a result, Ford decided to accept exactly the opposite remedy that he prescribed at first. Under pressure from the Democratic-controlled Congress, he endorsed measures that increased spending and cut taxes rather than the other way around. The goal: to stimulate economic growth despite the danger, which he continued to battle with dozens of vetoes, that those actions might widen the federal budget deficit.

"When the chips were down, in the interest of providing stimulus, he agreed to a tax cut and other measures that helped the economy recover from the 1975 recession," said Charles L. Schultze, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Jimmy Carter. "He came around to realize that the economy would be better off with a stimulus than without one."

In March 1975, Ford signed into law a bill that provided individuals with a 10 percent rebate on their 1974 tax liability, a fattened standard deduction, and a temporary $30 tax credit for each taxpayer and dependent. For companies, the investment tax credit was temporarily increased to 10 percent.

Ford also accepted spending increases that he originally opposed. When, early on, Congress passed an anti-recessionary spending package, Ford was urged by his economic advisers to veto it. But he solicited other advice, including from his political staffers and Democratic economists such as Walter Heller and Arthur Okun. They told him the economy needed a boost. So Ford executed what his press secretary Ron Nessen termed a "179-degree" turn and signed the measure.

By 1976, these controversial efforts to rev up the economy had begun to pay off. When Ford ran for president, the economy was showing signs of recovery. Unemployment had dipped to about 7 percent, inflation had abated to 4.8 percent, and the gross national product was humming along at a robust rate of growth.

"We were headed in the right direction," Ford later boasted.

Ford offered other ideas that might have benefited the economy even further. He proposed a long list of deregulatory measures, for industries ranging from trucking to airlines, as a way to make the economy more efficient. They didn't come to fruition until after he left the White House, however. His efforts to increase energy supplies also foundered on Capitol Hill.

The economy faced tough times after Ford left office. An oil embargo further fueled inflation until Paul A. Volcker, the new chairman of the Federal Reserve appointed by Ford's successor, Carter, began a painful increase in interest rates that finally squeezed rapid inflation out of the system but also threw the economy into recession and caused unemployment to skyrocket.

Finally, under President Ronald Reagan in the 1980s, a full-fledged recovery got underway -- and it is that recovery that has stuck in the public mind as the real end of the disastrous economy of the 1970s. Ford's own temporary economic uptick had been so uneven and came so late in his short stay at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave. that it went largely unheralded.

Voters focused instead on a non-economic issue: Ford's unconditional pardon of Nixon. After issuing that pardon, "he could not convince the American people that he deserved another shot at the presidency," said Bernard Firestone, a political science professor at Hofstra University and an organizer of a Ford retrospective.

Nevertheless, Firestone predicted that historians will eventually see Ford "as a much more capable president than the public gave him credit for," in large measure because of his economic policies.

The 38th President (WT)

By Alvin S. Felzenber

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

On the morning Gerald R. Ford was sworn in as the nation's 38th president of the United States, I received a call from a close friend, Katherine Neuberger, the then-Republican National Committeewoman for New Jersey. Of the new president, Mrs. Neuberger, said, "Well this proves once again the truth of that old adage that 'the Good Lord watches over drunks, orphans and the United States of America.' " Mrs. Neuberger knew her presidents. She certainly knew Gerald Ford.

Her one-liner said all about Mr. Ford that anyone needed to know. It conveyed a sense of those wholesome, middle-American Western values that also characterized and guided two presidents who Mr. Ford greatly admired, whose pictures he would place in the Cabinet Room, Harry S. Truman and Dwight D. Eisenhower.

As the nation pauses to mark the passing of a former president who is revered more for who he was than for what he was able to achieve in office (he was president for too short a time to have enacted much of a program, assuming he could have gotten it through the heavily lop-sided Congress the voters sent him in 1974), public affairs shows are certain to show footage of Mr. Ford's hasty swearing-in. They are bound to replay again and again the most famous line he delivered as president, "My fellow Americans, our great national nightmare is over."

Hopefully, they will also show Mr. Ford, in a State of the Union address, repeating a favorite quote of his own; one he lifted from Ike. Of the nation he now headed, Mr. Ford proclaimed that "America is not good because she is great. She is great because she is good." This Ford believed with every fiber in him. The "hipsters" of the era dismissed both this sentiment and the new president as "corny." They saw both as remnants of the bygone era of "Leave it to Beaver" and "Father Knows Best." Mr. Ford seemed not to mind. He also seemed not to mind when they mocked his tailoring (especially the shortness of his trousers), his clumsiness in descending airplanes, his supposed awkwardness on the slopes, his penchant for toasting his own English muffins or television's insistence on showing movers placing a large double bed into the bedroom Mr. and Mrs. Ford were to occupy in the White House.

What his tormentors saw as "uncool," Mr. Ford regarded as a "golden age" when neighbors helped neighbors, crime was low, jobs were plentiful, and, of yes, when the president said something, he was believed. Coming from the "heart" of his country (as his hero Ike once said of his own Kansan roots) Mr. Ford embodied a kind of conservatism that, if it has not fallen entirely out of fashion, at least has been eclipsed by a different kind. Mr. Ford believed in balanced budgets, a strong national defense, and, cognizant of his party and its Lincolnian roots, civil rights. One area in which he challenged the once-prevailing political culture of his native region was on foreign policy. A World War II naval veteran and political acolyte of Michigan Sen. Arthur Vandenberg, the man who guided Truman's containment policies through the supposedly "do nothing" Republican Congress, Mr. Ford drew the line at isolationism. (He catapulted himself into Congress by besting, with Mr. Vandenberg's help, an old-line isolationist dinosaur.)

On most other measures, save for civil rights and voting rights, Mr. Ford's votes in Congress placed him in opposition to virtually all of Lyndon Johnson's "Great Society" programs. For his troubles, Johnson dubbed upon Mr. Ford two insults liberals would furl upon him for the rest of his career: 1) that Mr. Ford could not chew gum and walk at the same time; and 2) that Mr. Ford had played football too long with out the benefit of a helmet. (History records both that Mr. Ford, unlike Johnson, left the nation in better shape than he found it and that, as Ike, Ronald Reagan and George W. Bush can attest, dismissing Republican and conservative presidents as dumb had become the liberal elite's most favored mechanism. Perhaps it all started with Calvin Coolidge.)

Through a combination of the circumstances of Mr. Ford's elevation to the presidency, his status as the first vice president becoming the first non-elected president, his stated preference for competence over ideology in his selection, of Nelson Rockefeller as vice president, double-digit inflation, soaring unemployment, energy shortages and his steadfast pursuit of his predecessor's detente polities toward the Soviet Union, conservatives of the era misjudged Mr. Ford as much as had the liberals. As they rallied behind the rising star of Mr. Reagan, who personified bold color conservatism as opposed to one shaped in pastels, they overlooked the 50 vetoes Mr. Ford unfurled against spending bills the Democrats sent him, his resistance to the Humphrey-Hawking full employment act, his refusal to provide a federal bail out to New York City without guarantees of accountability (second to the Nixon pardon, nothing cost Mr. Ford more votes than the famous "Ford to City: Drop Dead" headline the Daily News put on its front page) and the portions of the Helsinki accords that would help the West prevail in the Cold War.

That Mr. Reagan had a case to make, which proved essential to his own ascendancy, and conservatism's future triumphs have long clear. That Mr. Ford provided service to his country in ways that went beyond his cleaning up for his predecessor is becoming increasingly apparent with the passage of time.

How Lieutenant Ford Saved His Ship (NYT)

By Robert Drury And Tom Clavin

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

East Hampton, N.Y.

FOR Americans under a certain age, Gerald Ford is best remembered for his contribution to Bartlett's — "Our long national nightmare is over" — or, more likely, for the comedian Chevy Chase's stumbling, bumbling impersonations of him on "Saturday Night Live." But there's a different label we can attach to this former president, one that has been overlooked for 62 years: war hero.

In 1944, Lt. j.g. Jerry Ford — a lawyer from Grand Rapids, Mich., blond and broad-shouldered, with the lantern jaw of a young Johnny Weissmuller — was a 31-year-old gunnery officer on the aircraft carrier Monterey. The Monterey was a member of Adm. William Halsey's Third Fleet, and in mid-December, Lieutenant Ford was sailing off the Philippines as Admiral Halsey's ships provided air cover for the second phase of Gen. Douglas MacArthur's "I shall return" Philippine invasions.

The Monterey had earned more than half a dozen battle stars for actions in World War II; during the battle of Leyte Gulf, Lieutenant Ford, in charge of a 40-millimeter antiaircraft gun crew on the fantail deck, had watched as a torpedo narrowly missed the Monterey and tore out the hull of the nearby Australian cruiser Canberra. Two months later, in the early morning hours of Dec. 18, the Japanese were the least of the Monterey's worries, as it found itself trapped in a vicious Pacific cyclone later designated Typhoon Cobra.

Lieutenant Ford had served as the Monterey's officer of the deck on the ship's midnight-to-4-a.m. watch, and had witnessed the lashing rains and 60-knot winds whip the ocean into waves that resembled liquid mountain ranges. The waves reeled in from starboard, gigantic sets of dark water that appeared to defy gravity, cresting at 40 to 70 feet. In his 18 months at sea, Lieutenant Ford had never seen waves so big. As breakers crashed over the carrier's wheelhouse, he could just barely make out the distress whistles sounding about him — the deep beeps of the battleships, the shrill whoops of the destroyers.

After his watch Lieutenant Ford had strapped himself into his bunk below decks, and it seemed that his head had barely hit the pillow when the Monterey's skipper, Capt. Stuart H. Ingersoll, sounded general quarters, calling all hands to their stations. Lieutenant Ford bolted upright in his dark sea cabin. He thought he smelled smoke amidships. Racing through a rolling companionway dimly lighted by red battle lights, he reached the outside skipper's ladder leading to the pilothouse and began to climb. At that precise moment a 70-foot wave broke over the Monterey. The carrier pitched 25 degrees to port, and Lieutenant Ford was knocked flat on his back. He began skimming the flight deck as if he were on a toboggan.

Just as he was about to be hurled overboard, Lieutenant Ford managed to slow his slide, twist like an acrobat, and fling himself onto the catwalk. He got to his knees, made his way below deck, and started back up again.

By the time he reached the Monterey's pilothouse, the fighter planes in its hangar deck had begun slamming into one another as well as the bulkheads — "like pinballs," Mr. Ford recalled 60 years later — and the collisions had ignited their gas tanks. The hangar deck of the Monterey had become a cauldron of aircraft fuel, and because of a quirk in its construction, the flames from the burning aircraft were sucked into the air intakes of the lower decks. As fires broke out below, Lieutenant Ford remembered the smoke he smelled when he'd bolted from his bunk.

Admiral Halsey had ordered Captain Ingersoll to abandon ship, and the Monterey was ablaze from stem to stern as Lieutenant Ford stood near the helm, awaiting his orders. "We can fix this," Captain Ingersoll said, and with a nod from his skipper, Lieutenant Ford donned a gas mask and led a fire brigade below.

Aircraft-gas tanks exploded as hose handlers slid across the burning decks. Into this furnace Lieutenant Ford led his men, his first order of business to carry out the dead and injured. Hours later he and his team emerged burned and exhausted, but they had put out the fire.

Three destroyers were eventually capsized by Typhoon Cobra, a dozen more ships were seriously damaged, more than 150 planes were destroyed, and 793 men lost their lives. It was the Navy's worst "defeat" of World War II. But the Monterey and nearly all of its men survived to take part in the battle of Okinawa, and the future president ended his Navy stint in 1946 with the rank of lieutenant commander.

Like his fellow World War II veterans, Mr. Ford returned home and resumed his life, rarely speaking publicly of his heroism. But in contrast to the public's image of him as a clumsy nonentity, Mr. Ford was a man whose grace under pressure saved his ship and hundreds of men on it.

Gerald R. Ford (NYT)

Gerald R. Ford was an accidental president, his tenure brief, his legacy limited. Yet he was the right man summoned at the right time to begin the necessary process of healing a country exhausted by war abroad and scandal at home. Elevated to the nation's top job when Richard Nixon was forced by threat of impeachment to resign, he was everything his predecessor was not — transparent and largely content with life as he found it. His many friends saw him as plain old "Jerry," a get-along, go-along product of the House of Representatives whose self-assurance and modest ambitions perfectly suited a country that wanted little more than a few months' rest.

Mr. Ford's unplanned and largely unsought rise up the American political ladder was assisted not once but twice by scandal. In 1973, when Spiro Agnew resigned the vice presidency after a scandal unrelated to Watergate, Mr. Nixon sought advice from senior Congressional leaders about a replacement. The advice was unanimous. "We gave Nixon no choice but Ford," House Speaker Carl Albert recalled later.

Which was fitting, because Mr. Ford was in essence a creature of Congress — more precisely, of the House of Representatives, a place of perpetual compromise that encourages neither the vision that sometimes attaches to the Senate nor the managerial skills that come with being a governor. Michigan voters elected Mr. Ford 13 times, and of his 25 years in the House, he served eight as minority leader. He saw himself as a negotiator and a reconciler, and the record shows it: he did not write a single piece of major legislation in his entire career.

As president, Mr. Ford would have had little room in which to pursue lofty ambitions even if he had them. Domestically, he was bedeviled by inflation and then recession, and his effort to cure both embroiled him in constant combat with his old friends in Congress. Abroad, he had his hands full maintaining American power and sustaining détente with the Soviet Union, in the aftermath of the collapse of Vietnam and Cambodia.

But he judged, correctly, that his primary mission was to quiet national passions inflamed by war and Watergate — to end, as he put it, "our long national nightmare" — and in so doing to restore a measure of respect to the presidency itself. To that end he made several small gestures largely forgotten now but symbolically important at the time. He announced that he would be lenient to draft resisters, he opened the White House to people on Mr. Nixon's "enemies list," and he crisscrossed the country endlessly, speaking to groups large and small in an effort to open up an office that Mr. Nixon had all but closed to public inspection.

Yet his wish to heal led him to do something that reopened the very wounds he was trying hard to close. On Sept. 8, 1974, barely 30 days into his presidency, Mr. Ford announced his decision to give Mr. Nixon a "full, free and absolute pardon." The reaction was immediate, intense and largely negative. Mr. Ford had expected criticism, but not the outrage that erupted in Congress, in many newspapers and among the public at large.

This page, for example, condemned the pardon as "a profoundly unwise, divisive and unjust act" that in a stroke had destroyed the new president's "credibility as a man of judgment, candor and competence." The critics' fundamental point was that a nation in which the law applies equally to rich and poor, the meek and the powerful, cannot exempt anyone, least of all a president, from the requirements of justice.

History has been more sympathetic to Mr. Ford's argument that to allow Mr. Nixon's prosecution to go forward, perhaps all the way to a trial, would have been profoundly destabilizing to a nation that was already in shaky health. In 2001, the trustees of the John F. Kennedy Library honored Mr. Ford with its Profile in Courage Award for the decision, which Senator Edward Kennedy, a onetime critic, described as essential to the restoration of national unity. When Senate and House leaders bestowed on Mr. Ford and his wife, Betty, a Congressional Gold Medal in 1999, President Clinton — who had his own experiences with prosecutors — said the critics had been "caught up in the moment," and that Mr. Ford's decision had helped "keep the country together."

Our own bottom line continues to be the same: that the nation is strong enough to endure almost anything but burying the truth. Still, Mr. Ford deserves to be remembered for more than the pardon. Marking the end of a national nightmare is no small thing.

Gerald R. Ford (WP)

"OUR LONG national nightmare is over," Gerald Ford declared when he took office as president a little over 32 years ago. Those words were to prove the most memorable of his brief administration and also the most apposite. The feverish dream of Watergate, with its byzantine intrigues, Borgia-like treachery, and months of hearings and trials, was suddenly gone: The country awoke to a new president who lived in Northern Virginia and toasted his own English muffins before commuting to work in Washington.

The image of suburban simplicity was quickly seized on by the media and conveyed to a national audience eager for the return of that condition for which President Warren G. Harding had invented a new word many years before: "normalcy." As always, there was quite a bit of bunk to the image. Mr. Ford had been deeply involved in practical politics for more than a quarter-century. He soon acclimated himself to the White House, and before long decided he liked it enough to set his sights on a full term. He didn't achieve that goal, but in the period between Richard M. Nixon's resignation and Jimmy Carter's inauguration -- just under 2 1/2 years -- Gerald R. Ford did the main thing that needed doing, even though there were some in the Nixon White House who had thought him unqualified for the presidency: He reassured the people about the nature and quality of their government.

It was said of Franklin D. Roosevelt that he had a second-class intellect but a first-rate temperament. Something of the same might be said of Jerry Ford, although he was no Roosevelt and, as far as intellect goes, he took some unfair hits for a fellow who was in the top quarter of his class at Yale Law. On assuming office, he presented himself as what he was: open, friendly, honest (at least in comparison to what had gone before) and above all "decent," as people never tired of saying. That last adjective can, of course, be both high praise when speaking of someone's personal integrity and a somewhat fainter commendation when applied to the sort of job he's done. Mr. Ford felt both sides of it.

Thirty years ago, as Mr. Ford was departing office, we wrote on this page of him: "In his first days and months, it was as if he had liberated Washington -- from its personal fears and hostilities and suspicions, from the dark and squalid assumptions that people had come reflexively to make about one another and about the way things 'really' worked. God knows who was (and is) still listening on whose line or who is plotting what gruesome revenge against what political foe. Our point is merely that Gerald Ford brought to the White House an open, unsinister and -- yes -- decent style of doing things that altered the life of the city and ultimately of the country."

He was the last of the traditional Midwestern Republicans to occupy the White House: internationalist, fiscally conservative, supportive of civil rights legislation -- a throwback to the pre-Goldwater era. His odd route to the presidency -- he was chosen to replace the disgraced and departed Spiro T. Agnew as vice president, then elevated by Mr. Nixon's resignation -- was undoubtedly the only one that would have gotten him there, given the direction his party was going. Indeed, when he ran for election in 1976, he had to jettison the vice president he'd chosen, Nelson A. Rockefeller (too liberal), and fight off a formidable challenge from the avatar of the Republican future, Ronald Reagan.

That battle didn't help him in the general election. But Mr. Ford was also the victim of a series of misfortunes that he'd done nothing to precipitate: economic troubles that included both inflation and stagnation; the fall of South Vietnam and Cambodia; the new and explosive problem of volatile energy prices; even the rising popularity of a Saturday night comedy show that portrayed Mr. Ford, onetime college football hero and probably the most athletic president in the country's history, as a stumbling klutz.

But what hurt him most was an act of his own, taken one month into his presidency: the pardoning of Richard Nixon for whatever the former president had done or might have done. Today, with the passions of the period greatly diminished, it's hard to recall how much discord that decision created, even among those who believed Mr. Ford to be a trustworthy successor to Mr. Nixon. It's also hard, from today's vantage point, to see how an indictment and trial would have done the country much good. The pardon may have come too soon and been too broad, but it was basically the right thing to do. It hurt Mr. Ford politically, however, probably costing him the 1976 election.

In the spring of 2001, Mr. Ford received a John F. Kennedy Profile in Courage award for that decision. The late Mary McGrory recalled in her column in The Post the uproar that had followed the pardon, and noted: "I myself contributed to the din with a series of screeds about unequal justice. But almost 27 years later, it looks a little different. What seemed then to be cynicism now looks more like courage. A most dubious decision has acquired the patina of the only one possible."

In January 1977, Jimmy Carter began his inaugural address: "I want to thank my predecessor for all he has done to heal our land." That still stands, both as a tribute to Gerald Ford and as a reminder to his successors of the importance of what used to be praised as the gentlemanly virtues.

President Ford (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

The abiding cliché about Gerald Ford -- who died Tuesday at age 93 -- is that he was a decent man who steadied the country but held the White House too briefly to leave a major imprint. We've always thought that view of his Presidency is too diminishing, not least because he led the nation at a dangerous time and resisted political furies that could have done the U.S. far more harm.

"America's Suicide Attempt" is how the historian Paul Johnson describes the 1970s. And it is important to recall the bad temper of the times that Ford inherited in becoming the 38th President. He succeeded Richard Nixon, who had resigned over the Watergate coverup and amid an unpopular war in Vietnam. He faced large liberal majorities in Congress that were emboldened by their ouster of Nixon and set to revive the Great Society. And he had to clean up the financial problems caused by a burst of inflation and wage and price controls. Ford navigated all of these traumas better than he gets credit for. * * *

It is true that Ford was something of an accidental President, the only one in U.S. history never elected as either President or Vice President. Before Nixon picked him to replace the disgraced Spiro Agnew as his Vice President, Ford had been contemplating retirement from his Grand Rapids, Michigan, House seat. But like another unlikely President from the Midwest, Harry Truman, he had reserves of honesty and fortitude that served him well.

He made a particular contribution in pardoning Nixon, though he knew Nixon's enemies would accuse him of a quid pro quo. The decision cost him dearly in the polls and may have cost him the election in 1976, but it also spared the country from years of division over a criminal trial that special prosecutor Leon Jaworski seemed determined to pursue.

Congress had trampled over a weakened Nixon, and another Ford contribution was restoring some measure of executive authority. Far more than Nixon, he used his veto pen (66 times in 895 days), blunting liberal excesses after Democrats picked up 46 House seats in 1974. He also deserves credit for resisting the isolationism that was rampant as the Vietnam War wound down. It was a rare period in postwar U.S. history when the public favored spending less on defense.

Democrats exploited the mood in early 1975 to block Ford's funding request for our allies in South Vietnam, as the North began its offensive. Ford pleaded with Congress that "American unwillingness to provide adequate assistance to allies fighting for their lives could seriously affect our credibility throughout the world as an ally," but to no avail. Saigon fell by April, and the boat people and massacres in Southeast Asia soon followed. Thus one irony of this week's praise for Ford as a unifying President: At the time, he was mocked as clumsy and dull, and he was vilified for blocking Congressional priorities. Any of this sound familiar?

Vietnam was a scarring American defeat, but it could have been worse had Ford capitulated to the Congressional stampede. Instead, he fortified U.S. relations with the rest of free Asia, and he sent in the Marines despite liberal howls when the U.S. ship the Mayaguez was taken hostage by Cambodia's Khmer Rouge.

Given the weak hand he inherited, it is perhaps understandable that Ford continued the Nixon policy of pursuing détente and arms control with the Soviet Union. But that strategy was already beginning to fail due to growing Soviet adventurism abroad and conservative skepticism at home. Ford also joined Leonid Brezhnev in signing the Helsinki Accords guaranteeing civil liberties in the Soviet bloc; while criticized by conservatives, the Helsinki pact probably helped to undermine Soviet moral authority over the years.

The Ford Administration's economic record is also better than its reputation, sandwiched as it was between two of the three worst economic Presidencies of the 20th century. Hoover's was the worst, then Nixon's followed by Jimmy Carter's.

Ford is famous for having initially rebuffed New York City's bid for a financial bailout, but New York's trouble was merely one symptom of the financial woes caused by Federal Reserve Chairman Arthur Burns's monetary blunder. Burns opened the easy-money spigots in Nixon's first term, leading to 12% inflation, a spike in interest rates and wage and price controls, and setting the stage for financial crises from Mexico to Britain, among other places. Despite such early follies as the WIN program -- "whip inflation now" -- and a failed proposal to raise taxes, Ford ran a strong Treasury under Secretary William Simon, adopted sounder policies and left the economy better than he found it. * * *

In historical political terms, Ford was something of a transition figure -- from the traditional Republicanism of Eisenhower, with which Ford identified, to the more energetic reform conservatism that would triumph with Reagan. Arguably Ford's biggest political mistake was choosing Nelson Rockefeller as his vice president over Reagan. The New York Governor was deeply unpopular with the GOP base, and the selection left Ford vulnerable to Reagan's primary challenge in 1976.

The Gipper came within a handful of delegates of taking the nomination, a challenge that weakened Ford for the autumn race against Democrat Jimmy Carter. In the event, Ford ran one of the better Presidential campaigns of the modern era and came close to beating the former Georgia governor who had run as a conservative himself.

Perhaps President Ford's greatest achievement was in demonstrating to a nation angry and dispirited over Watergate and Vietnam that its political system was resilient and the Office of the Presidency still worthy of respect. In that sense his Presidency was a triumph of Ford's personal character -- not the first, or last, time America has been fortunate in the leaders our democracy has produced.

President Ford (WT)

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

"Our long national nightmare is over," Gerald Ford told the nation on assuming the presidency. And soon it was. For that the nation owes a large debt to the sacrifice of Gerald Ford.

The honest and forthright Mr. Ford, who died at his California home Tuesday evening at the age of 93, did what had to be done, even at the sacrifice of his presidency. In retrospect, his controversial and reviled pardon for Richard Nixon was clearly the right thing to do. He spared the country years of uncertainty, put Watergate to rest, returned the nation's eye to the future and restored tradition, honor and dignity to the nation's highest office.

To hear Mr. Ford explain it, there was never a question in his mind about what he had to do, which he explained in the logic and language of everyman. This was the mark of the man. He reasoned that Richard Nixon was only one American among many millions, and he owed the larger responsibility to the many millions who deserved to have the national nightmare put to rest. The nation had to move on.

"I paid a price, sure, but it is a price a president has to pay when he thinks he is doing the right thing, whatever the polls show," he told columnist David Broder in 1994. "The first month I was in office, I spent 25 percent of my time talking to lawyers about what to do about the Nixon tapes, the Nixon papers. Ninety percent of the questions at my first press conference were about Nixon. I thought I had to get the Nixon questions off my desk.

"I had a helluva lot more important business. The Russians and our allies didn't know what we were going to do. We had a serious recession starting. So I came to the conclusion, wholly on my own, that I ought to spend all my time on the business of 230 million Americans, and not 25 percent on one man."

This was a simple explanation, mathematical in its reasoning, and for that reason it was all the more compelling. Many Americans have changed their minds since about the pardon. In an ABC News poll taken in 2002 on the 30th anniversary of the Watergate break-in, 6 in 10 Americans said the pardon was the right thing to do.

Some argue still that the pardon deprived the nation of a "full telling" or the nation of an opportunity to "fully heal." This is nonsense. Most every significant detail of the Watergate break-in and cover-up has come to light without a drawn-out ordeal for a disgraced president, which would have amounted to a show trial.

"The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character and the honorable conduct of his administration," Mr. Bush said when he learned Tuesday night that Mr. Ford had left us. How true.

Closing The Chapter On Watergate Wasn't Done Lightly (WP)

By Bob Woodward

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

On Sunday, Sept. 8, 1974, President Ford attended church alone. He sat by himself in a pew at St. John's Episcopal Church on Lafayette Square. He took Holy Communion.

Back at the White House at 11:05 a.m., he went on television to announce that he had decided to pardon Richard Nixon for any crimes he committed during Watergate. The country's obsession with the scandal "could go on and on and on, or someone must write the end to it," he read from a statement. "I have concluded that only I can do that, and if I can I must." The core reason for the decision, Ford said, was to put Watergate and the Nixon presidency in the past.

The reverberations from that decision may well have cost Ford his presidency in the next election. In the first week after the pardon, his public approval rating plummeted from 71 percent to 49 percent. Jerry terHorst, Ford's press secretary and friend of 25 years, resigned as a matter of conscience.

Ford had been in office only a month. The pardon came as a surprise -- to Congress and the public -- and it unleashed a wave of outrage and suspicion. Had there been a deal between Nixon and Ford promising a pardon in exchange for Nixon's resignation?

The following account, which attempts to answer that question, comes from official documents, interviews with key players, contemporaneous handwritten notes, memoirs written by participants and conversations with Ford himself.A Talk With Haig

The chain of events that would lead to the pardon began only five weeks earlier when Ford, who had been vice president only eight months, learned he was about to become president.

At 3:30 p.m. on Aug. 1, 1974, Nixon's chief of staff, Alexander M. Haig, entered the vice president's suite. He looked troubled and on edge.

"Are you ready, Mr. Vice President, to assume the presidency in a short period of time?" Haig asked. New Watergate tapes, he said, would show Nixon had ordered the coverup of the burglary.

Ford was stunned.

Haig presented Ford with six scenarios: Nixon could step aside temporarily under the 25th Amendment, he could just wait and delay the ongoing impeachment process, or he could try to settle for a formal censure. In addition, there were three pardon options. Nixon could pardon himself and resign. Or he could pardon the aides involved and then resign. Or Nixon could agree to leave in return for an agreement that the new President Ford would pardon him.

Haig handed Ford two pieces of paper. The first sheet contained a handwritten summary of a president's legal authority to pardon. The second sheet was a draft pardon form that needed only Ford's signature and Nixon's name to make it legal.

"It's my understanding from a White House lawyer," Haig said, "that the president does have authority to pardon even before criminal action has been taken against an individual."

After extracting a pledge of secrecy, Ford told his top aide and speechwriter, Robert Hartmann, what had just occurred with Haig.

"Jesus!" Hartmann said. "What did you tell him?"

"I told him I needed time to think about it."

"You what?" Hartmann fairly shouted. Even entertaining any agreement of resignation for a pardon, Hartmann believed, was a monstrous impropriety that could taint a Ford presidency forever.

Ford didn't think so. He hadn't promised anything to Haig. He wanted to talk to his wife, Betty.

Betty Ford was firm that he shouldn't get involved in making any recommendations to Nixon or to Haig.

About 1:30 a.m., Ford called Haig.

"Al," he said, "our discussion this afternoon, I hope you understand there was no agreement, no decision and no deal."There Wasn't a Deal

The next day, Ford told his adviser and former House colleague John Marsh about the visit from Haig and the options, including one in which Nixon would resign.

"I then, what I would do, I would give Nixon a pardon," Ford said.

Marsh couldn't believe it. "Look, you can't do this," he said gently.

"You could make a strong case for a pardon, that it would be in the national interest," Ford told Marsh.

"You can't do that," Marsh repeated. It would look like a quid pro quo for Nixon's resignation.

Alarmed, Marsh went to see Hartmann. Together, the two went to talk with Ford, who then told them about his late-night phone call to Haig saying no deal.

Hartmann and Marsh both told Ford there had to be no connection between a Nixon resignation and a possible pardon. They urged Ford to talk to former Nixon White House counselor Bryce Harlow.

Harlow persuaded Ford to place a second call to Haig to explain that he had no intention of recommending what President Nixon should do about resigning or not resigning.

Afterward, Hartmann, Marsh and Harlow had a drink together. They celebrated and declared that they had forced Ford to dodge a bullet.Making Up His Mind

On Friday, Aug. 9, 1974, Nixon resigned.

Ford held his first news conference on Aug. 28, and a third of the questions were about Nixon. To Ford, though, it felt more like 90 percent. He feared that without a pardon, Nixon and Watergate would haunt his presidency for years.

"My mind is 99 percent made up," Ford told Haig, Hartmann, Marsh and former law partner Phil Buchen in the Oval Office two days later.

Marsh was deeply worried. He went to see Ford during his lunch in a study off the Oval Office.

DOJ_NMG_0109650

"Questions are going to be raised about a deal," Marsh said.

Ford stopped eating. "Jack," he said, "I know exactly where you're coming from, and I have thought of that, and there was no deal."Custody of the Tapes

Ford called in longtime friend and former Justice Department lawyer Benton Becker to determine exactly what a president's pardon powers were prior to someone's indictment and conviction, and to determine what should be done with Nixon's papers and tapes.

After resigning, Nixon asked to have the materials shipped to his home in California. Traditionally, a former president owned all his papers. But Becker immediately saw that returning them to Nixon would make Ford complicit in hiding the truth.

"You will be writing the history of your presidency in the first weeks," Becker told Ford, "and history is going to say Jerry Ford participated in the final act of the Watergate coverup."

Ford authorized Becker to ensure the government would retain the tapes. "That history must be preserved," Ford said. "Do whatever you have to do. . . . I'm not shipping that stuff out."

Becker worked out an arrangement in which Nixon and the government had joint custody of the tapes for 10 years. Congress and the courts eventually saw that the tapes were preserved.

But Becker also returned to Washington with concerns about the health of Nixon, whom Ford still considered a friend. Nixon was "more depressed than any person I've ever seen," Becker reported. "I really have serious questions in my mind whether that man is going to be alive at the time of the election."

"Well," Ford noted, "1976 is a long time away."

"I don't mean 1976," Becker said. "I mean 1974." Congressional elections were two months away.

As Ford reviewed the pardon statement the morning of Sept. 8, with a felt-tip pen, he inserted a phrase saying the threat of prosecution hung "like a sword over our former President's head, threatening his health."

Hartmann, who was in the Oval Office that morning, had been pushing Ford to delay the pardon, to allow more time to pass.

"You know, if I decided to do it and then something happened to him and I hadn't done it because I was just waiting for a better time," Ford said to Hartmann, "I would never be able to forgive myself."A Nation's Outrage

The new president had misjudged the mood of the country. Rather than sympathy, the public and the media voiced outrage at the pardon. It seemed to be totally on Nixon's terms -- early, complete and without acknowledgment that he had committed crimes or even impeachable offenses. Suspicions about a deal surfaced almost immediately.

Ford agreed to testify about his decision before a House subcommittee. His staff went to work preparing his statement.

Haig learned of the testimony being drafted in a phone call from J. Fred Buzhardt, who had remained at the Ford White House during the transition. It stated that Haig had offered the presidency in return for the pardon on Aug. 1 but Ford had rejected the deal.

"Al, I think you'd better come to the White House," Buzhardt told Haig. "These boys have prepared sworn testimony for the president that could very well result in your indictment."

Haig drove to the White House and insisted on seeing President Ford. Within minutes, Haig was in the Oval Office.

"What do you want?" Ford asked.

"The truth," Haig replied. "That's all."

"You'll have it, Al," Ford said. He handed Haig a yellow legal tablet and said, "You write that portion as you remember."

So the conclusions of Ford's top aides that a deal had been offered were initially in Ford's testimony but were excised at the insistence of Haig.'I Was Naive'

Twenty-three years later, on Sept. 22, 1997, in a suite at the Waldorf Towers in New York, I asked Ford whether he thought Haig had offered him a deal.

"Well, I guess I was naive," Ford said. "I was naive that anybody would offer a deal, because all my political life people never came to me, 'I'm going to give you a political donation, I expect something in return.' People never came to me that way, because they knew damn well I wouldn't be a part of it. So when Al Haig comes with those six terms, I just didn't visualize him as one making a proposition to make a deal. It never went through my mind."

I continued to press Ford. Did he agree, when all the facts and conclusions were examined now, decades later, that Haig had offered a deal?

"I would agree," Ford said, "because after talking to Hartmann, Marsh and Harlow, I wanted the record clear that I did not agree to consummate. . . . So that it has to be very clear that, yes, on paper, without action it was a deal, but it never became a deal because I never accepted."Nixon's 'Confession'

I interviewed Ford on the subject again on May 20, 1998, at his home office in Rancho Mirage, Calif., situated on a golf course in the midst of the desert. He was alone.

He brought up his pardon decision, noting that no president had "caught as much hell as I did." His recollections were clear. I suspected he had replayed them many times in his mind.

"I was overwhelmed with the public reaction," he said. "I guess I anticipated a lot, but not to the extent that happened. But . . . it didn't faze me one bit. If anything, it made me more stubborn that I was right."

I asked why he hadn't pressed Nixon harder for an admission of guilt.

"We were under a time pressure," he responded. Once he'd made the decision to grant the pardon, he had to move quickly. "The longer it took to resolve some of these things, the more likely that the issue would have come to the surface and it could have been a different ballgame."

I said I agreed, it would have leaked. Still, a forthright acknowledgment by Nixon could have ended the historical debate on that question. Why didn't Ford make more of the 1915 Supreme Court decision in Burdick v. United States that held that accepting a pardon is tantamount to confession of guilt?

"I still carry it around in my pocket, that statement," Ford said. "I've got it in my wallet here because anytime anybody challenges me, I pull it out. I've got it here someplace." He searched around in his wallet, and handed me a folded, dog-eared piece of paper. It was a portion of the Burdick decision.

I began to read aloud. "Most important, the justices found that a pardon 'carries an imputation of guilt, acceptance, a confession of it.' " Ford seized on the last phrase and repeated it: " 'Acceptance, a confession of it.' " See, Nixon had confessed, he said. "That was always very reassuring to me."

Bush Recalls Ford's Integrity, Instincts (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, December 28, 2006

President Bush on Wednesday remembered former President Gerald Ford as a "man of complete integrity who led our country with common sense and kind instincts" and helped restore faith in the presidency after the Watergate scandal.

"On Aug. 9, 1974, he stepped into the presidency without ever having sought the office," Bush said. "He assumed power in a period of great division and turmoil. For a nation that needed healing and for an office that needed a calm and steady hand, Gerald Ford came along when we needed him most."

The president, who personally expressed his condolences in a phone call late Tuesday night with former first lady Betty Ford, called the former president a "man of integrity" who devoted the best years of his life to the nation. Bush said Ford commanded the Oval Office for 2 1/2 years with commonsense and kindness.

Ford "reflected the best in America's character," Bush said.

Ford helped restore Americans' confidence in the White House after President Richard Nixon's downfall in 1974 through the "honorable conduct" of his administration, Bush said.

Bush, who is spending the week at his Texas ranch, made his statement before sunrise inside a hangar at a helipad outlined in blue-green landing lights. Dawn was breaking over the ranch after he finished expressing his sadness over Ford's death.

"Our 38th president will always have a special place in our nation's history," he said.

Bush's father, former President George H.W. Bush, served in the Ford administration as a diplomat and CIA director. The president borrowed from the troupe of Ford advisers in making up his own presidential team more than a quarter century later.

DOJ_NMG_0109652

Vice President Dick Cheney served as Ford's chief of staff, while just departed Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld served Ford in the same job.

Cheney called Ford a "dear friend and mentor" and hailed his former boss' role in bringing the nation out of what the vice president called the "greatest constitutional crisis since the Civil War."

"In that troubled era, America needed strength, wisdom, and good judgment, and those qualities came to us in the person of Gerald R. Ford," Cheney said in a statement. "When he left office, he had restored public trust in the presidency, and the nation once again looked to the future with confidence and faith."

Rumsfeld called Ford "a man of great decency and towering integrity."

"As President, his personal character helped to restore the reservoir of trust in government and its leaders that is needed for our system to function effectively," Rumsfeld said.

Democrats and Republicans alike recalled Ford's willingness to work across party lines.

"President Ford was one of the kindest, most sincere elected officials whom I have known and with whom I have worked," said longtime Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va. "Although he and I were from different political parties, we often were able to find common ground and work together for our country."

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who served with Ford in the House, praised the former president for his commitment to his wife Betty and family.

"Jerry was warm gentle, friendly, pleasant courteous individual. He never used bad language, he loved his family, his kids and above all else he loved Betty," Dingell said.

Former Republican Sen. Bob Dole from Kansas, Ford's running mate in 1976, said Ford could be described in three words: "A good man."

"He was a friend to everyone who met him," Dole said. "He had no enemies."

White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten notified Bush about Ford's death shortly before 11 p.m. EST after getting the news from Ford's chief of staff. Deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel said Bush, who is scheduled to return to Washington on Jan. 1, will attend the funeral.

Bush Pays Tribute To Gerald Ford (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

President George W. Bush expressed sadness over the death on Wednesday of former president Gerald Ford, saying he had helped “heal” America in the aftermath of the Watergate scandal.

“With his quiet integrity, common sense, and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the presidency,” Mr Bush said. “The American people will always admire Gerald Ford’s devotion to duty, his personal character, and the honorable conduct of his administration.”

Mr Ford was aptly named the “accidental president” after the dramatic resignation of President Richard Nixon in 1973 over Watergate unexpectedly catapulted him into the Oval Office. He assumed the presidency as the US was winding down its controversial involvement in Vietnam.

Just one month after becoming the 38th president of the US, Mr Ford himself drew condemnation for pardoning Mr Nixon, a move that was widely credited as helping Jimmy Carter defeat Mr Ford in the 1976 presidential election. But Mr Ford, who said the pardon was needed to close the Watergate era, appeared well aware of the possible repercussions of his decision.

When his aides suggested that a pardon could doom his chances of being re-elected, Mr Ford shot back: “It could easily cost me the next election if I run again. But damn it, I don’t need the polls to tell me whether I’m right or wrong.’’

Historians later credited Mr Ford with restoring dignity to the office of the president, which had been badly tarnished by Mr Nixon and Spiro Agnew, who resigned as Mr Nixon’s vice-president after being charged with tax evasion.

Vice-president Dick Cheney, who became chief of staff to Mr Ford after Donald Rumsfeld moved from that job to become defence secretary, said on Wednesday: “He assumed the nation’s highest office during the greatest constitutional crisis since the Civil War. In that troubled era, America needed strength, wisdom, and good judgment, and those qualities came to us in the person of Gerald R. Ford."

Democrats and Republicans mourned Mr Ford. Harry Reid, the incoming Democratic Senate majority leader, said Mr Ford helped lead the US from "one of its darkest hours with grace and bipartisanship". John McCain, the Arizona Republican senator said he "sacrificed his own ambitions to help move our country beyond the divisions and disillusionment caused by Watergate and a lost war".

John Bruton, the European Union ambassador in Washington, said he was "deeply saddened" by the death of Mr Ford, whom he described as a "healing force" in US history.

German President Horst Köhler offered his "deeply felt condolences'' and described Ford as "a great American" who played an important role in advancing trans-Atlantic ties and as "one of the founding fathers of the world economic summits of the leading industrial nations".

Czech President Vaclav Klaus called Ford "an outstanding politician'' whose work ''was instrumental for freedom in my country and for the fall of the Iron Curtain in Europe".

Ford's Integrity Praised (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

Washington Times, December 28, 2006

President Bush and other lawmakers paid their respects to Gerald R. Ford yesterday, as plans were completed for several days of funeral services and memorials, which will include the late president's body lying in state at the U.S. Capitol on Sunday and Monday.

Gregory Willard, a Ford family representative, told reporters yesterday that services will begin tomorrow in California and last until Wednesday, when Mr. Ford will be interred in a hillside tomb near his presidential museum in Grand Rapids, Mich.

Speaking from his ranch in Crawford, Texas, Mr. Bush praised the former president for restoring integrity to the White House after the scandal-forced resignations of President Nixon and Vice President Spiro Agnew.

"With his quiet integrity, common sense and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the presidency," Mr. Bush said. "The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character and the honorable conduct of his administration. We mourn the loss of such a leader, and our 38th president will always have a special place in our nation's memory."

The curators of Mr. Ford's presidential museum opened their lobby for 24 hours a day starting yesterday and said the lobby will remain open until further notice.

Mr. Willard said the funeral ceremonies begin tomorrow, with a private prayer service for the family at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, Calif., which Mr. Ford and his wife, Betty, had attended. On Saturday, the 38th president's body will be flown to Washington for a state funeral in the Capitol Rotunda that evening. On its way to the Capitol, the hearse will pause at the World War II Memorial, in tribute to the Navy veteran's service.

The public will be able to file into the Capitol to pay last respects to Mr. Ford from the conclusion of the funeral until the coffin leaves for a funeral service at the Washington National Cathedral on Tuesday morning. His remains will leave Washington for the final service and interment in Michigan, the former president's home state.

The tributes poured in yesterday. Vice President Dick Cheney, who served as Mr. Ford's chief of staff, praised his former boss in a statement, calling him a "dear friend and mentor."

"Throughout his career -- as a naval officer, congressman, vice president and president -- Gerald Ford embodied the best values of a great generation: decency, integrity and devotion to duty," Mr. Cheney said.

Mr. Ford had close ties to the Bush administration. Mr. Bush's father, former President George Bush, served in the Ford administration as a diplomat and CIA director. And just-departed Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld also served Mr. Ford as chief of staff.

Mr. Rumsfeld yesterday called his former boss "a man of great decency and towering integrity." The elder Mr. Bush called Mr. Ford "one of the most decent and capable men I ever met."

DOJ_NMG_0109654

Former Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, who was Mr. Ford's vice-presidential running mate in 1976, said Mr. Ford "was a friend to everyone who met him" and "had no enemies."

Praise for Mr. Ford was not limited to his former political allies. Former President Jimmy Carter, who defeated Mr. Ford in the 1976 presidential election, also had kind words for his one-time opponent.

"An outstanding statesman, he wisely chose the path of healing during a deeply divisive time in our nation's history," Mr. Carter said. "He frequently rose above politics by emphasizing the need for bipartisanship and seeking common ground on issues critical to our nation."

Former President Bill Clinton and New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton issued a joint statement, saying that Mr. Ford "to his great credit ... was the same hard-working, down-to-earth person the day he left the White House as he was when he first entered Congress."

Mr. Bush ordered all flags at federal buildings, including Congress, the White House, and U.S. diplomatic missions and military bases abroad, to be flown at half-staff for the next 30 days, according to the U.S. Flag Code guidelines for a former president's death. Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm, Michigan Democrat, followed suit for her state, ordering all flags on state office buildings to be flown at half-staff through Jan. 25.

"I remember in his inaugural speech he said, 'You have not elected me as your president by your ballots, and so I ask you to confirm me as your president with your prayers,' " said the Rev. Billy Graham. "God certainly answered those prayers. President Ford was the great healer, and brought us together. We owe a great debt to him for how he put principle over politics at a crucial time in the life of our nation."

Historians have viewed Mr. Ford's legacy as focusing on the stability he provided after Mr. Nixon's resignation. However, polls show that his standing has continued to improve with the American public over the years.

In March 1975, his popularity sank to 37 percent, the lowest point of his presidency. The drop in his poll numbers is attributed to his decision to pardon Mr. Nixon the September before and the continued fallout from the Vietnam War.

In September 1974, just 33 percent of respondents told Time magazine that they agreed with the pardon. Yet by 1980, 55 percent of respondents said they had a favorable opinion of Mr. Ford in a CBS News/New York Times poll.

Those positive sentiments appear to have solidified over time. According to a June 2006 Gallup poll, 60 percent of Americans said they approve of the job Mr. Ford did as president, with only 26 percent registering disapproval.

"For most, the legacy of Gerald Ford will be the unity he brought to the nation after the divisive and bitter experiences of Watergate," presidential historian Doug Wead said yesterday on the Web site NewsMax.com. "In those days, Republican and Democrat, journalist and pundit could agree that the new president was honest and decent and he would make every effort to be fair. It was a time for healing."

Even Chevy Chase, the comedian whose "Saturday Night Live" parodies cemented the image of Mr. Ford as a klutz, said yesterday that he had come to have a high opinion of the former president, who was actually a star athlete in college and later a football and boxing coach.

After the show's run, "we became friends and he was a very, very sweet man," Mr. Chase told [a wire service] news agency.

"He took my wife and I on a whole lovely trip through Grand Rapids to show us where he had been as a child. We kept in touch, and he was just a terrific guy."

Gerald Ford Dead At 93 (CHIT)

By William Neikirk

Chicago Tribune, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Gerald R. Ford, who struggled to heal the nation's Watergate wounds in a short and turbulent tenure as president, died Tuesday. He was 93.

The death was announced by his wife, Betty. No cause of death was immediately disclosed, but the longest-living U.S. president had suffered from pneumonia and heart ailments in the past year.

DOJ_NMG_0109655

``The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character and the honorable conduct of his administration," President Bush said in a statement from his Texas ranch. Bush said Ford "will always have a special place in our nation's memory."

Ford took over as the nation's 38th president on Aug. 9, 1974, after the resignation of Richard Nixon, but economic woes and his pardon of Nixon undercut his campaign of reconciliation and eventually his presidency. He was the only person to ever serve as chief executive without being elected president or vice president.

He died near his California home. After his body is flown to Washington Saturday, Ford's motorcade will pause at the World War II Memorial en route to the Capitol.

Ford's body will lie in state in the Capitol where he represented Grand Rapids, Mich., as a House member for 25 years and as House Republican leader. His body is expected to arrive Saturday evening in the Rotunda, to be met by House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Senate President Pro Tem Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) for a short ceremony.

The casket will be available for public viewing Saturday night, Sunday and Monday. On Tuesday morning, a large-scale funeral service will be held at the National Cathedral. Then, next Wednesday, Ford will be interred outside his presidential library and museum on the banks of the Grand River in Grand Rapids.

Those arrangements may change slightly as Congressional and White House officials work with the Ford family.

"Our long national nightmare is over," Ford told an anxious country after taking the oath of office to replace Nixon, who stepped down rather than face almost-certain impeachment over his role in covering up the Watergate scandal.

Referring to Nixon's departure, Ford added: "Our Constitution works. Our great republic is a government of laws and not of men."

But as he took charge with those reassuring words, events would later show that moment was perhaps the high point of a presidency that suffered for lack of a true electoral mandate.

It came to an end in 1976. Ford managed to eke out a narrow yet party-dividing victory for the Republican nomination after a strong primary challenge from former California Gov. (and later president) Ronald Reagan. But in November he lost to Democrat Jimmy Carter in one of the closest elections in U.S. history after starting out far behind in the polls. Carter, a former Georgia governor, made the pardon a central campaign issue.

Ford achieved a rare distinction in 2003, when he became only the fourth former president to reach age 90, after John Adams, Herbert Hoover and Reagan. He told an interviewer upon turning 90: "I'm still playing golf. I'm still a nine-holer--my legs can't handle 18 very well."

Though Ford left the Oval Office with a reputation for being one of the nicest, most decent presidents in U.S. history, in the end the nice guy failed to extend the Republican electoral victories that began with Nixon's capture of the White House in 1968. Many observers saw Ford as a victim of his predecessor's scandal and the distrust it brought his party.

But in the first few weeks after Nixon's departure, the genial Ford brought a calming presence to the highest office in the land, shunning the imperial atmosphere fostered by Nixon. His straightforward manner eased the nation's concerns after a major constitutional crisis had nearly torn it apart. He also communicated a spirit of openness and sincerity as he crisscrossed the country, visiting all 50 states during his first 16 months in office.

Ford's wife, Elizabeth Ann "Betty" Ford, had stayed out of the spotlight during his congressional career. She spent much of her time raising their four children, Mike, Jack, Steve and Susan. But as first lady, she assumed a larger public role, stressing help for handicapped children and favoring the Equal Rights Amendment.

After she had breast cancer surgery in 1974, she campaigned for greater public awareness of the disease. And then, after successfully battling her own dependency on drugs and alcohol, she helped establish the Betty Ford Center at the Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif.

`Accidental president'

The "accidental president," as some have called Ford, was also prone to accidents. His occasional stumbles and gaffes made him a favorite target of comedians, including Chevy Chase on NBC's "Saturday Night Live." He bumped his head on the presidential helicopter, and on an overseas trip in 1975, he fell down the ramp of Air Force One. Yet with an outstanding football career at the University of Michigan, he was perhaps the best athlete ever to occupy the Oval Office.

Ford wrote in his autobiography, "A Time to Heal," that he laughed at the jokes made at his expense about such missteps, but he added that if the people internalized an image of him as a bumbling, stumbling leader, that wouldn't be funny at all for his presidency.

The acid-tongued Lyndon Johnson once remarked that Ford played too much football without his helmet on.

"I'm a Ford, not a Lincoln," Ford said in one notable remark uttered while he was still vice president but that nonetheless reflected a modest vision about his place in history.

Even his political advisers privately criticized his speaking style and lack of charisma, but never his sincerity or decency. To many on the political scene in Washington, he was just "Good Old Jerry Ford."

In his nearly 2½ years as chief executive, Ford also had to deal with many thorny problems besides Watergate and the Nixon pardon. He presided over the painful final act of the American withdrawal from Vietnam--the April 28, 1975, evacuation of U.S. personnel as the North Vietnamese stormed Saigon. Throughout his presidency, he strove to stabilize an economy plagued by inflation, recession and fears of energy shortages.

Early in his tenure, he ordered a clemency program for Vietnam-era draft evaders and deserters that required them to do public service. About 15,000 Americans, civilian and military, participated.

He continued Nixon's program of detente with the Soviet Union and reached out to China, although the perceived defeat in Vietnam posed a major challenge in projecting U.S. power abroad in a world divided by the Cold War.

Ford sought to counter an image abroad that America had turned into a helpless giant--and he believed one incident gave him that opportunity.

Shortly after the fall of Saigon, he authorized a military operation to rescue 39 crew members of the merchant ship SS Mayaguez, which had been seized near the coast of Cambodia by Khmer Rouge forces.

In a mission filled with miscalculation and bungling, 41 Americans died and 50 were wounded in an invasion of Cambodia's Koh Tang Island, even though the crew members had been secretly released and put on a Thai fishing vessel before all the military strikes were completed. Despite the heavy losses, Ford claimed a victory for American credibility.

Attempts on his life

There were two attempts on Ford's life in September 1975 on separate trips to California. Both of the would-be assassins were women, Lynette "Squeaky" Fromme and Sara Jane Moore. For a while, Ford cut back on his travel as a result of the attempts.

Though he was a creature of Congress, as president he often found himself at odds with a Democratic-controlled Capitol Hill, particularly on legislation to deal with the economy, and vetoed 66 pieces of legislation. He battled with Congress over energy legislation and whether spending should be cut to match tax reductions.

With inflation at 12 percent when he took office, he renounced Nixon's wage and price controls and opted instead for a "Whip Inflation Now" or "WIN" program, complete with WIN buttons that yielded more laughter than cooperation. In 1975 the economy sank into a steep but brief recession, and unemployment soared to more than 9 percent.

Joblessness and inflation abated in 1976, and tax cuts proposed by the White House helped. But the recovery slowed right before the November election--bad timing for Ford.

Ford, who was 61 when he took over the White House, was born Leslie Lynch King Jr. on July 14, 1913, in Omaha. He became Gerald R. Ford Jr. after his mother divorced and remarried.

When Ford assumed the presidency, he was a veteran congressional leader with three sons and a daughter whom his wife, Betty, almost exclusively raised as he tended to his political career. He had promised her that he would not run for president in 1976, but political demands dictated otherwise.

His family made more news than he did on occasion, with Betty Ford creating a national controversy by saying she would not be surprised to learn her children had smoked marijuana and wouldn't be shocked if her teenage daughter engaged in premarital sex.

Her husband, a Republican from the party's moderate Eisenhower wing, rose to the rank of House minority leader during a nearly 25-year congressional career before being chosen in October 1973 to be Nixon's vice president under authority of the 25th

Amendment. He replaced Spiro Agnew, who stepped down after pleading no contest to a charge of income tax evasion after receiving illegal payments.

Two Democrats, House Speaker Carl Albert and Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield, were instrumental in Ford's selection, telling Nixon that of all the potential candidates, Ford would have the easiest time being confirmed. Ford also was pushed by moderates inside the Nixon administration. His ascension to the presidency marked the only time that a person who was not elected either president or vice president has held the nation's top office.

Once he became president, Ford named former New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller as vice president, completing the only non-elected team ever to lead the national government. But in an effort to appease the party's right wing, Rockefeller was dumped as Ford's 1976 running mate in favor of Sen. Bob Dole of Kansas.

"You just lost the election," Reagan representative Drew Lewis told Ford because he did not choose Reagan as his running mate.

Though Ford and Rockefeller were polar opposites in many ways, Ford was unsparing in his praise for the New Yorker as a team player. He later said one of his biggest regrets was in caving to right-wing pressure and dropping Rockefeller from the ticket.

Rockefeller, a liberal Republican who had sought the presidency in 1964, had his troubles in the new administration. He began as Ford's czar of domestic policy but was outmaneuvered by the president's top aides in that task. Later, Ford assigned him to head a commission that investigated controversial counterintelligence operations by the CIA and FBI, including alleged CIA assassination plots against foreign leaders such as Cuba's Fidel Castro.

When the Rockefeller Commission refused to publish information on the assassination plot against Castro under President John Kennedy, a congressional committee headed by Sen. Frank Church, an Idaho Democrat, rebuffed Ford and decided to publish it as part of a report recommending overhaul of government intelligence agencies.

For his part, Ford imposed restrictions on the FBI for spying on political activist organizations and high-profile figures such as Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, he said relaxing those curbs appeared to be appropriate, even though he added he was "very, very queasy" about "going back to the bad old days when the FBI was spying on people."

Ford was plain-spoken, and not naturally given to eloquence, a Midwesterner of modest means and common-sense conservative politics who never aspired to be president. His ambition as an up-and-coming congressman pointed in only one direction--to be speaker of the House. He said he believed in limited government and admitted he did not have presidential "vision," which he defined as grand governmental schemes and the rhetorical ability to sell them to the public.

Yet when he put his principles in action, sometimes they proved costly. When he opposed a federal bailout of a financially pinched New York City, the New York Daily News splashed a "Ford to City: Drop Dead" headline on its front page. The president said a bailout would have enabled the city to escape dealing with its problems. Some critics felt that position cost him New York in the 1976 election.

But nothing compared with Nixon's pardon for political impact. On Sept. 8, 1974, roughly a month after he took over, Ford issued a "full, free and absolute pardon" to Nixon in a decision that put an indelible mark on his presidency and gave Carter a handy campaign issue.

Critics charged that the pardon had been hatched as part of a deal that would bring Ford to power, but Ford steadfastly denied that was the case.

In his autobiography, Ford said he decided on his own to pardon Nixon, explaining that Nixon's humiliation over resigning was punishment enough and that putting him on trial would revisit the sins of Watergate and cause greater turmoil. "The healing process would have been torn apart," he said.

One of his top advisers, James Cannon, wrote in a book that the president was "shocked" at the negative public reaction resulting from the pardon, thinking that the American people would be in a more forgiving mood. They weren't, and the pardon hobbled Ford throughout his presidency.

In retrospect, many political scientists give Ford credit for making a tough decision that would, over time, help heal the country--just not in time for Ford. In later years he would be honored for making one of the most courageous decisions in American politics.

On May 21, 2001, he received a Profile in Courage Award from the family of President Kennedy for his pardoning of Nixon. In his remarks, he said, "No doubt arguments over the Nixon pardon will continue for as long as historians relive those tumultuous days."

President Bill Clinton presented him the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1999 for guiding the nation through the difficult times of Watergate, Nixon's resignation and pardon, and America's difficult disengagement from Vietnam.

On June 19, 2006, a few weeks before Ford's 93rd birthday, Vice President Dick Cheney praised the former president at the Gerald R. Ford Foundation's annual dinner.

"We worked for a man who had inherited a damaged office and who swiftly and successfully restored authority, dignity and respect to the presidency," Cheney said.

He noted that Ford once said that he "never could have imagined that he would be president of the United States in America's bicentennial year," 1976.

Cheney recalled at the foundation's 2005 dinner in Rancho Mirage that Ford "called the room to silence, lowered his voice, drew us into his confidence--and announced that he was Deep Throat."

`Integrity in the White House'

Asked by the Tribune in May 2003 how he wanted to be remembered, Ford said: "When historians write whatever they write, I hope they will say that President Ford re-established integrity in the White House, that President Ford restored public support for the White House on the basis of integrity. If that's the achievement of the Ford administration, according to historians, that would please me the most."

Some of Ford's key aides went on to greater political careers--perhaps one of his biggest legacies. His top diplomat in China, George H.W. Bush, became vice president and president. Cheney, his chief of staff, became vice president.

Donald Rumsfeld, another chief of staff and defense secretary, took over the Pentagon under President George W. Bush in 2001 and became one of the most influential defense secretaries in U.S. history. His chief economic adviser, Alan Greenspan, later became chairman of the Federal Reserve.

Politically, Ford--like Nixon--mistrusted the GOP's right wing. Ford and Reagan were never close, for instance, and campaign memos written on Ford's behalf in 1976 identified Reagan's followers as "right-wing nuts." The president also said he was miffed because Reagan provided only lukewarm support for his run against Carter.

To win the nomination in 1976, the president found he had to get tough with Reagan, airing television commercials questioning his competency and judgment.

He wrote in his autobiography that Reagan always thought he was right in an argument, didn't work all that hard at campaigning and had a tendency for "offering simplistic solutions to hideously complex problems."

Ford had his shortcomings as a campaigner. His staff often criticized his speaking style and speeches that weren't considered punchy enough. At a campaign speech in Illinois, for example, he stumbled over the words "fly swatter" several times, much to the delight of Carter.

But his most serious misstep came in a debate with Carter, when he declared that Eastern Europe was not under the domination of the Soviet Union. Ford did not think he had stumbled until Cheney told him the next day, and urged a clarification. Ford clarified his remarks, but the damage had been done.

Reagan swept to the GOP nomination in 1980, but at the Republican National Convention in Detroit, lieutenants for Reagan and Ford conducted intense negotiations to get Ford on the ticket as Reagan's running mate. Each time Ford turned down the offer, even as he appeared to be holding out for a kind of co-presidency or expanded vice presidency.

Ford indicated he might be willing to go on the ticket if the right deal could be worked out, but ultimately none of the offers was satisfactory to Ford. Reagan went to his second choice, George H.W. Bush.

In a May 2003 interview, Ford gave this account:

"When Betty and I got to Detroit, we had a message that Gov. Reagan and [Reagan's wife] Nancy wanted to see us. They came to my suite and that's when Gov. Reagan said he would like me to be his running mate, which was a shocker because I had no such ambitions, but in deference to his request, I said let's think about it for 36 hours. In the meantime, both of us had advisers who analyzed the circumstances and finally, it was just generally agreed that it wouldn't work. And that's when Reagan very hurriedly called on George Bush."

While president, he had maintained his interest in sports, playing tennis often, building his own heated swimming pool on the White House grounds and going to his winter home in Vail every Christmas for a skiing holiday.

As a child, Ford lived in Grand Rapids, Mich., where he moved with his mother, Dorothy Gardner King, two weeks after his birth. Five months later, on Dec. 19, 1913, her divorce from Leslie Lynch King Jr. was made final.

On Feb. 1, 1916, his mother married Gerald R. Ford Sr., a paint salesman, who adopted her young son and renamed him. The couple had three sons of their own, but the elder Fords never told the younger children or Gerald that he was adopted. The future president didn't know he was adopted until he was 17, when his real father came to Michigan and introduced himself.

While working part time in a Grand Rapids restaurant, he noticed a stranger lingering by the candy counter one noon.

Ford described the incident in ``Gerald Ford and the Future of the Presidency," a book by Jerald terHorst, who was Ford's first press secretary in the White House and resigned in protest over the Nixon pardon.

``He stood there for a long time--he was a stranger--and finally as I was handling food or doing dishes, he walked across to me and said, `Leslie, I'm your father.' I was a little startled to be addressed as Leslie. Then he said, `Yes, I am your father; I was divorced from your mother. Would you go out to lunch with me?' "

Ford saw his father, who is believed to have died in the early 1940s, only occasionally after that.

A football star in high school, Ford attended the University of Michigan on an athletic scholarship. Although he has often been referred to as a former All-American football player, he did not make the first team at Michigan until his senior year, when he was named the team's most valuable player and was picked for the College All-Star Game.

After turning down offers to play professional football for the Green Bay Packers and the Detroit Lions, he went to Yale Law School, where he helped pay his expenses by working as an assistant football coach. He received his law degree in 1941, finishing in the upper third of his class, and joined the Navy less than a year later.

During his 47 months of active duty, he was first assigned to help shape up the hundreds of aviation cadets training at Chapel Hill, N.C. He then served on the light aircraft carrier USS Monterey in the Pacific. After the war, he returned to Grand Rapids to practice law.

In his autobiography, Ford told of being nearly swept overboard during a typhoon in the Philippine Sea that also ruptured airplane fuel tanks and caused a fire. He wrote that, as president, a fire at the height of a typhoon was a "marvelous metaphor for the ship of state."

1st taste of politics

Ford's first taste of politics was in 1940 when he served as a Michigan volunteer in Republican Wendell Willkie's presidential campaign against Franklin Roosevelt.

When he became interested in trying to solve the housing problems of young, married former servicemen, he decided to use the experience he had gained in the Willkie campaign to help organize the Independent Veterans Association. He was named vice president of the group, which effectively lobbied local commissioners and supervisors for more low-cost housing for veterans.

Meanwhile, he had met Chicago native Betty Bloomer Warren, a former professional dancer who studied with Martha Graham and worked as fashion coordinator at a Grand Rapids department store. After they dated for several months, he proposed but told her they couldn't marry until autumn because something was coming up--actually a try for Congress--that he couldn't tell her about at the time.

He won an upset victory over the incumbent in the Republican primary and was married on Oct. 15, 1948, less than three weeks before he won the general election.

The honeymoon gave way to the campaign. Married on Friday, Ford took his new bride to a University of Michigan football game the next afternoon. That evening they attended a Republican reception in Owosso, Mich., for Thomas Dewey, the Owosso-born governor of New York who was running for president.

After defeating Democrat Fred Barr, Ford went to Washington and won assignment to the House Appropriations Committee.

His first national recognition came in 1952, when he joined 18 other House Republicans in sending Dwight Eisenhower a letter urging that he return to the United States from his military post in Europe and run for president. About the same time he signed the Eisenhower letter, Ford was approached by a group of Michigan Republican leaders wanting him to run for the U.S. Senate to fill the seat of Arthur Vandenberg, who had died, but Ford turned them down to make way for a friend.

By 1959 he was being talked of as a candidate for the House Republican leadership. A year later he was endorsed by the Michigan GOP as the favorite-son candidate for vice president.

He was one of three Republicans picked for a ``truth squad'' to trail Kennedy around the country during the 1960 campaign against Nixon. He was also one of five Republicans to sign a statement denouncing Kennedy's first State of the Union Message as ``a shabby attempt'' to paint a bleak picture of the nation's economic and international situation.

Later, President Johnson would choose Ford as one of two congressmen on the Warren Commission, which investigated Kennedy's assassination.

Ford was always popular with his fellow Republicans, and that paid off in 1963 when he was elected chairman of the House Republican Caucus, the third-ranking GOP leadership post. Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) said Ford was one of four Republicans he could support for president in 1964. When Goldwater won the nomination, he considered picking Ford as his running mate.

After Goldwater's 1964 loss to Johnson by a landslide, Ford made his move for the House Republican leadership, besting veteran Rep. Charles Halleck of Indiana for the position that would nearly a decade later prove to be his springboard to the presidency.

As House Republican leader, Ford seldom rejected a plea for campaign help from GOP colleagues. He teamed up with the colorful Sen. Everett Dirksen of Illinois in the ``Ev and Jerry Show''--a television presentation of Republican views on national issues.

With Johnson's Great Society programs being passed easily by the heavily Democratic Congress, the ``Ev and Jerry Show'' had more entertainment value than political significance.

Ford's tenure as vice president was an uncomfortable part of his political career. The balance between loyalty to his president and the maintenance of personal integrity and credibility proved difficult. Even after he was told Nixon was likely to resign within a week, Ford said in several speeches he knew of no impeachable offense that had been committed and suggested Nixon somehow would overcome his problems.

An Unelected President Shone At Crucial Moment (CSM)

Posted December 28, 2006 - http://www.csmonitor.com/2006/1228/p25s01-uspo.html An unelected president shone at crucial moment Gerald Ford is eulogized for his openness and honesty in the White House after the Nixon years.

By Peter Grier | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

WASHINGTON

On Aug. 8, 1974, shortly before 11 a.m., President Richard Nixon entered the Oval Office to meet with Vice President Gerald Ford. President Nixon's face was ashen, but he was set on his course, so he shook hands and motioned Mr. Ford to sit in a chair beside him.

An awkward silence followed. Then Nixon broke it.

"You'll do fine," he said.

The formalities were yet to come, but at that moment, like a shock, the powers of the presidency leapt from one man to the other. Nixon, wounded by Watergate, was resigning; Ford was about to become the first, and so far only, unelected chief executive of the United States.

Ford, who died Tuesday at his home in California, had spent decades in Washington preparing himself for higher political office. The problem was, that office was speaker of the House. Now, in 1974, this product of Congress had to sit where Nixon had sat - and Lyndon Johnson and John F. Kennedy before him - and lead a dispirited and divided nation.

Watergate was only part of it. Ford inherited the Vietnam war, and inflation, and the cold war, too.

Did he do fine, as predicted? Ford's pardon of Nixon was deeply unpopular, and probably cost him the '76 election. His Whip Inflation Now campaign seemed all lapel buttons and no bite. The comedian Chevy Chase's imitations of his pratfalls remain legendary, however unfair.

But Ford was more, somehow, than the sum of his policies. Decent, fair, modest, and - truth be told - shrewd, he made Washington seem normal again. It was a time for healing, as he himself later said. And heal he did, steadying the economy and keeping to a moderate foreign-policy course.

The Nixon years had been as dramatic and taxing as Wagnerian opera. This political theater ended under Ford. The US could relax, and refocus on the future.

"On behalf of the entire nation, thank you for restoring the nation's confidence in itself," said President Jimmy Carter to Ford, moments after taking the oath of office in 1976.

Ford was born July 14, 1913, in Omaha, Neb. He was named Leslie Lynch King Jr., after his father, Leslie King, a Montana wool trader. His parents divorced shortly after his birth, and two years later, his mother married a Michigan paint salesman named Gerald Ford, who gave his stepson his name and raised him as his own.

Stocky and blond, Gerald Rudolph Ford Jr. grew up in Grand Rapids, Michigan's second-largest - and most conservative - city. Even in those days, boys generally wore sports shirts and sweaters to school. Jerry Ford usually wore a suit and tie.

He studied hard and got decent grades but was best known as the star center of the South High School football team. "Back then I had absolutely no interest in politics or a career in government," he later said.

Recruited by its football coach, Ford entered the University of Michigan in 1931. He played on undefeated teams in 1932 and 1933, and was named the Wolverines' "most valuable player" in 1934. The Detroit Lions and the Green Bay Packers offered him pro contracts when he graduated in 1935, but Ford, a solid "B" student, had set his sights on another line of work: the law.

He took a coaching job at Yale, and eventually talked his way into Yale Law School. He worked hard - perhaps unsurprisingly, his best grades were in legal ethics - but had time to found a modeling business on the side.

Yes, modeling. Urged on by Phyllis Brown, a girlfriend who was herself a model, Ford backed a New York agency for several years. Eventually he himself starred in a Look magazine photo spread about a weekend in the life of sports-oriented young people.

Then World War II intervened. Shortly after receiving his law degree in 1941, Ford enlisted in the Navy. Serving on the aircraft carrier USS Monterey, Ford was witness to many of the biggest naval battles in the Pacific. But his only close call came during a typhoon, when he slipped on deck and flew like a toboggan over the edge - only to drop neatly onto a catwalk.

After the war, Ford returned to Grand Rapids to practice law.

And like another young Navy vet in California, Richard Milhous Nixon, Ford's interests and experience made politics a natural career choice.

He began his political life as a reform candidate dedicated to sweeping out the prewar old guard of Michigan politics. In 1948, he beat incumbent Rep. Bartel Jonkman in the Republican primary for Michigan's Fifth Congressional District.

Eventually, the people of the Fifth District elected Jerry Ford to Congress 13 times.

In Washington, Ford quickly developed a reputation as a loyal Republican and hard worker. He wangled a spot on the powerful Appropriations Committee, and, with the help of other young members dissatisfied with the GOP old bulls, won election to the party's congressional leadership.

In 1965 he was elected House minority leader. But his long-held goal, speaker of the House, seemed as far away as ever, as Democrats kept control of the chamber in election after election.

Some thought him stolid. Others knew better.

"There is an inscrutability about Jerry," one of his friends told the Grand Rapids newsman Bud Vestal in 1974. "You think you know him, but there's always one layer of reserve between you and Jerry's inner self."

By '74 he was tired of laboring in the minority. That term would be his last, he figured - he'd go back to Grand Rapids in 1976.

But then came the scandals of the Nixon presidency. Vice President Spiro Agnew resigned in 1973, after being accused of taking bribes in political office. Nixon knew Ford from years of service together in Congress; some newsmen had even speculated in 1968 that Ford would be his running mate. When Nixon announced his new choice for vice president at a White House ceremony, members of Congress in the audience raised a deafening cheer.

"They like you," Nixon said to Ford as they stood on the podium.

"I have a couple of friends out there," said Ford, as the applause continued.

Then the Watergate crisis deepened and, less than a year later, Nixon, too, resigned. Ex-jock, ex-model, a man who'd come home at night covered with paint after working in his father's paint and varnish factory as a boy, Ford was president of the United States.

On Sept. 14, 1974, President Ford opened a National Security Council (NSC) meeting on the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) nuclear-reduction talks with a short, cogent statement of the principles at stake.

SALT was good for the country, Ford said; the US had the "obligation" of finding common ground for agreement. Better to go in with that attitude than a cynical or skeptical one, which might itself block the way forward.

"Not any agreement is acceptable ... but reaching an agreement is in our best interests," he said. "We should proceed on the basis that this is the case."

To the cabinet, accustomed to Nixon's long, rambling harangues, these words must have seemed a revelation. They were modest, yet unarguable, and after the president delivered them, he shut up. Not entirely - he asked a question here and there. But in the main, he let his advisers convince him, rather than the other way around.

To pore through the minutes of Ford's presidential meetings is to see a leader who is far from a bumbler. In at least one NSC meeting he corrected a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff about the military's own budget. But as president he did not force decisions. He had a sense of humor, even about his infamous falls, including one he took on a state visit to Austria.

"In Austria, the president indicated he tumbled into Austria," read the minutes of a June 4, 1975, cabinet meeting, "but he really felt that Betty had tripped him, then ran away and left him to get to his feet all by himself."

But it wasn't enough to win his election to the office he'd inherited. Barely a month into his presidency, Ford pardoned Nixon for any crimes he might have committed. Eighty percent of Americans disapproved; even Ford's press secretary, Jerry terHorst, resigned.

Ford's popularity recovered, and the nation was spared a divisive trial, but the pardon remained a drag on Ford's poll ratings. In 1976, he was beaten by Democrat Jimmy Carter, who won fewer states but more electoral votes.

Ford was the only Michigander, and the first Eagle Scout, to become president. He was the first appointed vice president (the second was his own vice president, Nelson Rockefeller), and the only unelected chief executive of the US. He was the only president whose motorcade was involved in an auto accident, and he held the record for number of presidential assassination attempts (two).

Yet he may forever be best known for this: He was his own man, and not Richard Nixon. For the United States, at a crucial point in its history, that was enough.

As Donald Rumsfeld, who served as Ford's Defense secretary, said in 1986: "It was a time to heal, and Gerald Ford did it as few others could have."

The Homegrown Decency Of Gerald Ford (WP)

By Wil Haygood

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

There is something about landscape and upbringing, about how it often seems to come to bear upon the temperament of an individual. Gerald R. Ford Jr., a Michigan boy, grew up to be president. If one were to flip through a sepia-tinted scrapbook, into Ford's 1920s and 1930s Grand Rapids, one might see glistening lakes, football fields, leafy trees. One might hear teakettles whistling atop stoves. And one might imagine a place where boys weren't supposed to cry.

DOJ_NMG_0109663

There was indeed that tableau, but there were also other things -- less poetic -- humming in the life of the young Gerald Ford. His mother was a divorcee; his birth father was a smoothie and a ladies' man. There would be financial woes even after his mother remarried. Young Jerry also had a stuttering problem. (By the time he reached high school, however, the stutter was gone, as if he had miraculously laid it in his hand and flung it across a nearby lake.)

There was something of a Hemingwayesque code at play in Ford's upbringing. Grace looked so sweet under pressure. One bore up coatless in wintertime if needed. One suffered quietly, and family demons never rolled beyond the window curtains.

By the time he had emerged onto the national stage, something simple and munificent had bled its way into his being: decency.

Ford was a decent man, and he seemed to admire in others, more than anything else, that trait.

Throughout his life, there were moments when he might have faltered. He might have become self-centered, paranoid about the motives of others, egotistical once entrenched behind a fancy desk on Capitol Hill. He came of age during the Depression, when people starved and homes vanished like feathers blown away by the cold financial winds.

There was indeed a Nixon enemies list, but Ford would have considered such a thing anathema. He seems to have eschewed unattractive tics. He chuckled; he rested; he backslapped. Parodied on those "Saturday Night Live" skits, he took it in stride and even made a cameo appearance on the show. Life needed humor.

Here is Ford in his unadorned autobiography, "A Time to Heal," talking about his freshman year in 1931 at the University of Michigan: "I'd saved one hundred dollars that summer working at the paint factory. For three hours every day, during the lunch period, I waited tables in the interns' dining room at the university hospital, then helped clean up the nurses' cafeteria. A wonderful aunt and uncle, Roy and Ruah La Forge, sent me a two-dollar check every week. And once every two or three months, I received twenty-five dollars for donating blood at the university hospital."

There's decency in remembrance of that aunt and uncle; they're not just aunt and uncle, they're "wonderful."

He wore plaid and made it look, well, plaid. He smoked a pipe and he talked like a man who had no time to waste on words. He thought candor decent, slipperiness indecent.

The human dramas found him sure enough, and the sword he bore against them was decency.

In his mind it was decent to pardon Richard Nixon. Here are some of the words Ford uttered upon accepting the presidency: "In the beginning I asked you to pray for me. Before closing, I ask again your prayers for Richard Nixon and for his family. May our former president who brought peace to millions find it for himself."

You could make too much of Ford's Midwestern upbringing -- as if someone were predestined by virtue of a Michigan or Ohio or Illinois birth with openness, candor and friendliness. That is a cliche burned into the nation's mind-set, along with notions that most Californians are supposed to be uber-hip and most New Yorkers fancy. What that upbringing might have given Ford was room to grow and little room to cry out. It gave him the cheeriness to do unexpected things, and he did them as simply as walking through someone's front door: He appointed William Coleman, a black man, as transportation secretary. It was not lost on blacks that Ford was the first Republican president to appoint a black as a Cabinet secretary, and it was not lost on blacks that the distinguished Coleman was not given the kind of job blacks usually got -- such as housing or health and human services. Coleman was the best individual Ford could find for the job. Ford presided over the swearing-in ceremony himself; it seemed a grandly decent and quietly historic thing to do.

He stood resolutely beside his wife, Betty, when she endured bouts with alcoholism. He encouraged her to talk about her disease. His family's demons, in time, rolled beyond the window. He blinked not an ounce of shame or embarrassment.

Politics, football, love, family. He warmed the bench at Michigan until he eventually won the job as starting center. There is a beautiful poem by James Wright, a Midwestern poet by way of Ohio. It speaks of things on the gridiron of Ford's life:

In the Shreve High football stadium,
I think of Polacks nursing long beers in Tiltonsville,
And gray faces of Negroes in the blast furnace at Benwood,
And the ruptured night watchman of Wheeling Steel,
Dreaming of heroes.
All the proud fathers are ashamed to go home.

DOJ_NMG_0109664

Their women cluck like starved pullets,
Dying for love.
Therefore, their sons grow suicidally beautiful
At the beginning of October.
And gallop terribly against each other's bodies.

The 38th president of the United States had galloped toward decency during his lifetime. Myths seemed to have meant little to him. In his memoirs, he recalled the afternoon he met his birth father during his teen years. It deeply affected him. The man had come through Grand Rapids with a pretty chippy; he idled into the small restaurant where his son was slapping burgers. They went for a ride. The words got in the way. "When I went to bed that night," Gerald Ford would come to write, "I broke down and cried."

A decent thing for a kid to do.

Wife Created New Image For First Lady (USAT)

By John Ritter

USA Today, December 28, 2006

As Betty Ford mourns her husband of 58 years, Americans recall an outspoken and candid first lady never shy about discussing her problems or pet causes.

Entering a White House East Wing vacated by the reticent Pat Nixon, Ford in less than three years put a new face on the presidential wives sorority and created a model for her successors.

"Betty was so much more outgoing and gregarious and kind of in your face about certain issues," says Craig Schermer, historian at the National First Ladies' Library in Canton, Ohio. "She paved the way for Nancy Reagan and Rosalynn Carter and Barbara Bush."

Ford, 88, is best known for openness about her breast cancer while in the White House and, after President Ford had left office, about her substance abuse. But she was even more outspoken — though it's less remembered today — about her support for the doomed Equal Rights Amendment for women.

"She publicly made phone calls and even appeared on The Mary Tyler Moore Show to urge congressional support," Schermer says. "At one point, somebody on the president's staff asked him if there was a way to muzzle her." He refused.

Here was a first lady who, when asked by a TV interviewer what she'd do if she learned that her daughter was having premarital sex, said she hoped her daughter would be on the pill.

That seemed outrageous to many in the mid-1970s. Equally courageous was Ford's decision to publicly disclose her breast cancer in 1974 and her subsequent treatment — a mastectomy. Women didn't talk openly about breast cancer in those days, much less examine their breasts for lumps. After she left Bethesda Naval Hospital, Ford appeared on the South Portico of the White House and waved.

"She was one of the first people of prominence to acknowledge it. It was not an easy thing to do," says Barbara Brenner of the advocacy group Breast Cancer Action. "She encouraged a lot of women to take better care of themselves."

Ford is also a living symbol that breast cancer need not be a death sentence, Brenner says.

The former first lady is even better known today for a painful chapter in her life, addiction to alcohol and painkillers stemming from attempts to relieve severe neck pain. Her daughter, Susan Ford Bales, then 19, arranged a medical intervention that got her mother into treatment in 1978.

In 1982, Ford co-founded, with her friend Leonard Firestone, the Betty Ford Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif. The facility has become a world-famous destination; more than 70,000 people have sought treatment there for alcoholism and drug abuse, including such celebrities as Elizabeth Taylor.

Even though Ford's addiction treatment occurred after her husband left office, "what it did was make us realize that presidential families have their own crises," Schermer says. "We make jokes today about the Betty Ford Center, but it provided a real viable place for people to go."

The Fords, married in 1948 two weeks before Gerald was elected to his first term in Congress, were a devoted and intimate couple. "They were very, very close physically and emotionally, and they genuinely truly adored each other," Schermer says.

The Fords were also the first couple to elevate the presidential kiss from a traditional peck on the cheek. "They were very open about kissing one another," he says.

Profile In Decency (WP)

By Bob Dole

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

We were fortunate in 1974, a time of crisis, to have the right person in the right place at the right time. When the country needed healing, reconciliation and restoration of confidence, Gerald Ford provided it.

He was a principled partisan, a GOP leader who worked diligently for Republican causes but who knew the limits of partisanship. He could also count -- and he knew that with Republicans in the minority, if he was to accomplish anything as House Republican leader or as president, he would often need a bipartisan approach.

He was never a person to nurse a grudge. He was willing to admit mistakes. Generally, he had a smile on his face, but he was determined and competitive, though realistic about what he could achieve.

In defeat he was gracious. Notwithstanding a heated 1976 campaign, in a race that went from a 30-point deficit to a cliffhanger, he and President Jimmy Carter became close friends and accomplished many worthwhile things together.

Gerald Ford had never sought the presidency and thus was obligated to no group or individual. His legacy will be that he stopped the national hemorrhaging over Watergate. A man of courage and integrity, he made the tough choice of pardoning Richard Nixon, which helped heal the nation but very likely cost him the 1976 election. He showed his willingness to put the country's interest first.

Becoming The President (NYT)

By David Hume Kennerly

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

I TOOK this photograph of President Gerald Ford in the White House Cabinet Room on May 14, 1975, as he met with his National Security Council about the Mayagüez crisis. The cargo ship Mayagüez had been captured by Khmer Rouge rebels, and it was up to the president to try to get the American crew released safely.

After diplomacy failed, Mr. Ford, who had been president for nine months, waved off one of the Joint Chiefs of Staff's recommendations, which involved a B-52 strike on Phnom Penh, and instead ordered a strong but limited military action that ultimately secured the crew's freedom. Tension was thick in that meeting, but the president's hand was firmly on the controls. In my mind this incident was the fulcrum of his presidency, the point at which he came of age as commander in chief, and the photo shows that.

In some of the Mayagüez meetings, the president's advisers offered up hypotheticals on how certain decisions might "play." They wanted to make sure the world knew that America might still use overwhelming force in achieving its ends. Mr. Ford didn't want to hear that. He had no bloodlust. He knew Vietnam was a debacle; it had been his painful duty to oversee the end of that horrible chapter of American history. But he refused to make innocent Cambodians pay for America's mistakes in Vietnam.

For me, 30 years later, this photo is emblematic of Gerald Ford's finally making the presidency his own. If I had to describe him in one word, it would be "resolute."

The man I came to know and admire had a quiet and very powerful sense of self. He had the least guile of anyone I've ever met and a total lack of vanity. There were no "two Gerald Fords," there was no other agenda, no secret life. An avid golfer to the end, he would never move his ball to improve his lie when no one was looking. To me that was the central theme of his character. I will miss him profoundly.

Moral Leadership (WP)

By Ron Nessen

DOJ_NMG_0109666

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

One reason Gerald R. Ford was a good president was because he never wanted to be president.

After 25 years as a congressman from Grand Rapids, Mich., he told his wife, Betty, that he was going to run for one more term in the House and then retire to spend more time with her and their children. Then, suddenly, he was appointed vice president (after Spiro Agnew's resignation) and succeeded to the presidency (after Richard Nixon's resignation).

Unlike politicians who carefully calculate for decades how their every word and deed will sound and look when they eventually run for the White House, Ford moved into the Oval Office without having his persona distorted by lust for the presidency.

And the public sensed this genuineness. What a relief to have a regular person as president, particularly after the imperial presidencies of Nixon and Lyndon B. Johnson. Ford was "the man next door."

After the resignation, it took the Nixons a few days to move their belongings out of the White House. It took a few more days to freshen up the paint in the second-floor living quarters. So for 10 days after he became president, Gerald Ford, Betty and their children Susan, Steve and Jack continued to live in their modest suburban rambler on Crown View Drive in Alexandria. I always thought: What a perfect symbol for an ordinary-guy president.

One day Ford's dog, Liberty, made a mess on the rug in the Oval Office. A Navy steward rushed to clean it up. "I'll do that," Ford said. "No man should have to clean up after another man's dog." As I say, it was nice to have a regular person as president.

Unlike some of his predecessors, Ford didn't take himself too seriously. He taped short bits making fun of himself for "Saturday Night Live," then in its first season. He invited Chevy Chase, who made his reputation on the show by spoofing Ford's foibles, to play tennis on the White House courts. And after Chase had performed his "clumsy Ford" routine at the White House Correspondents' Association dinner, the president took the podium and topped the professional comic with a brilliant routine of self-deprecating humor.

One of Ford's favorite sayings about the political and legislative debates in Washington was that "you can disagree without being disagreeable." He not only said it, he lived it. How nostalgic that seems in these days of angry, divisive, polarized, downright nasty Washington rhetoric.

But as president, Gerald Ford did more than change the post-Watergate atmosphere in Washington. The Vietnam War ended during his presidency. By what he did and what he said after the last helicopter lifted off the roof of the U.S. Embassy in Saigon, Ford headed off a bitter postwar campaign of recrimination about "Who lost Vietnam?"

One day during that dark period, I walked into the Oval Office and showed Ford an Associated Press story reporting that the House had rejected a bill providing funds to help resettle hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese refugees who would probably be targets of imprisonment and execution by the victorious North Vietnamese and Viet Cong. I'd never heard Ford curse before, but he did that day when he read the story.

He undertook a public lobbying campaign, including visits to refugee camps in Arkansas and Florida, which turned around public and congressional opposition to helping the refugees. It was his greatest display of moral leadership.

Ford also had a knack for finding and recruiting talented people to serve in government.

Henry Kissinger, Ford's secretary of state, gave a talk at the National Archives a few months ago assessing Ford's presidency. Kissinger noted that judgments about events and leaders made in the heat of the moment often must be modified or reversed when those events and leaders are reassessed from the perspective of 30 years of subsequent history.

President Ford and his presidency are viewed much more favorably today than they were the day he left office. It's good to know that he lived long enough to enjoy the reassessment.

'Our Constitution Works' (WSJ)

By Melvin R. Laird

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Years ago, in the middle of a severe national crisis, a man arose who, in biblical phraseology, had "healing in his wings." On Aug. 9, 1974, that man, Gerald Rudolph Ford, Jr., became our 38th president during the political storm of Watergate and began a vital American restoration with these words: "Our long national nightmare is over. Our Constitution works."

DOJ_NMG_0109667

Jerry Ford was my close friend for more than 50 years. Our children grew up together. We spent holidays together. It is difficult for me now to imagine moments more rewarding than an August evening in 1974, at the Fords' modest house in Alexandria, Va., where Betty and Jerry had invited their children and a few intimate friends to ponder history in the making -- Richard Nixon's resignation and Jerry's ascension to the presidency. Some of us sat on the floor of the small living room, and Betty served snacks as we talked. Having taken off his coat and tie, Jerry helped in the kitchen. He made sure everyone felt at home, paying as much attention to the opinions of his children as to those of his friends. He was no longer Jerry but the president, yet he was still the same.

He was our Accidental President -- never elected by the voters to represent anything but his congressional district, which included Grand Rapids, Mich. It was a happy accident for America, and in many ways it was no accident. It was years in the making and required hard work, planning and good fortune. Jerry often told me how fortunate he had been, beginning when he was only two weeks old and his courageous mother fled an abusive marriage to make a better life for herself and her son.

I first met Jerry in 1951, but our paths came close to crossing when we both served in the Navy in World War II and our separate ships were caught in the same typhoon that nearly took our lives in December 1944. Jerry's brush with death came when he was rushing to put out a fire on the flight deck of the U.S.S. Monterey, and lost his footing. He fell as the storm rolled the ship 25 degrees, and he slid down the tilting deck. Only his quick athletic reflexes and the two-inch rim at the edge of the deck slowed him down just enough to allow him to roll onto the catwalk below. In less than a day, Typhoon Cobra sank three of our destroyers and took the lives of 778 men. Later, some were surprised that Jerry could laugh in the midst of great political turmoil. They failed to fathom how harmless political conflicts can be to a battle-tested veteran.

Seven years later, on a visit to Washington as a Wisconsin state senator, I was introduced to Congressman Ford. He was nine years older than me. We became immediate friends. And when I was elected to Congress, we were seatmates in the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee for 16 years, before I became secretary of defense. He was as plain as bread and occasionally bland, but also unfailingly believable, honest, considerate and -- that rarest of commodities -- politically dependable.

When it was clear that the mossback Republican leadership of the House needed to be swept aside, I led a group of young Turks (which included Rep. Donald Rumsfeld) pushing Jerry forward through three successive party coups, eventually making him House minority leader. Jerry and I worked as a close team rebuilding the party with policies that offered constructive alternatives and laid the groundwork for Nixon's 1968 presidential win. * * *

Lyndon Johnson publicly ridiculed Jerry, saying that he'd "played football too long without his helmet on." Jerry was blessed with an abundance of inner security, so political barbs like that didn't bother him much. True, he was a star center for the University of Michigan football team; but he also graduated third in his class at Yale Law School and could easily hold his own with any "intellectual," including Henry Kissinger, when he challenged him on the policy of détente. Johnson insulted Jerry because as president he felt threatened, and rightly so. Jerry had become a formidable political opponent, partly as a result of his opposition to a massive escalation of U.S. troops in the Vietnam War. (In one of the secret tapes released by the National Archives, Defense Secretary Robert McNamara can be heard saying to Johnson: "Jerry Ford and Laird are dangerous." Johnson agreed.)

Jerry's most ambitious political goal was to become speaker of the House, but the lack of a Republican majority denied him. Instead, and ironically, he became president of the Senate when Nixon appointed him vice president. I was Nixon's White House domestic counselor when Vice President Spiro Agnew resigned in October 1973, and used my leverage with Nixon to persuade him to choose Jerry over the man Nixon wanted, John Connally of Texas. Jerry survived the most vigorous investigation ever conducted by the FBI up to that time and the first test of the 25th Amendment providing for the appointment of a new vice president. With a man of such integrity waiting in the wings, many in Congress were prepared to run Nixon out of office for his Watergate misdeeds.

Three days after his inauguration, President Ford spoke to a joint session of Congress, and said simply: "We have a lot of work to do. Let's get on with it." He also warned the American public: "A government big enough to give you everything you want is a government big enough to take from you everything you have." These remarks delivered in an hour of severe national trial evoked immediate acclaim.

Jerry was not perfect, and he could be faulted for allowing Mr. Kissinger to push too rapidly for détente with the Soviet Union. He could also be faulted for the misguided dumping of his vice president, Nelson Rockefeller, from the 1976 ticket in a vain hope of placating Ronald Reagan and the conservative wing of the party. Later in life he admitted to me he was wrong on both counts.

Nevertheless, in his 895 days as president, Jerry Ford accomplished a great deal of good. He inherited double-digit inflation and the worst recession since the 1930s, which he turned into a healthy economic recovery before he left office. He reformed the CIA and had a gift for some enlightened appointments, such as Ed Levi as attorney general and, in my opinion, John Paul Stevens as Supreme Court justice. The 1975 Helsinki agreement on human-rights principles, which he negotiated with the Soviet Union, emboldened leaders such as Lech Walesa in Poland and Vaclav Havel in Czechoslovakia to challenge Communist rule in Eastern Europe, leading to the eventual collapse of the Soviet empire.

Of greatest importance, however, was his righting of the ship of state. That included the controversial pardon of Nixon. I was 100% behind it, but along with Bryce Harlow urged him to delay until congressional and other support could be publicly lined up in advance. But Jerry was never one to procrastinate once he had made a decision. So when he abruptly announced the pardon a month into his presidency, the nation was stunned, and did not forgive or forget. That probably cost him the 1976 election. Typical of Jerry, he never regretted his decision.

Perhaps the most emotionally satisfying stamp of approval regarding that decision came five years ago in a small scene out of the public eye when Sen. Edward Kennedy admitted that Jerry had been right. The Kennedy-Nixon rivalry was the political equivalent of the Hatfields and McCoys, so the admission had strong emotional resonance. The occasion was the Kennedy family presentation of the John F. Kennedy Profile in Courage Award to Ford, precisely for the pardon. Sen. Kennedy praised him that day for going against the tide of popular opinion. "I was one of those who spoke out against his action then. But time has a way of clarifying past events, and now we see that President Ford was right," Sen. Kennedy said.

Jerry's reply on that occasion in Boston is something all Americans should take to heart as we mourn his passing: "The ultimate test of leadership is not the polls you take, but the risks you take. In the short run, some risks prove overwhelming. Political courage can be self-defeating. But the greatest defeat of all would be to live without courage, for that would hardly be living at all."

Mr. Laird was secretary of defense under Nixon and an eight-term congressman from Wisconsin.

Why Ford Was The Right Man For The Moment (FT)

By Art Cyr

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

"The right sort of sports fan" is how McGeorge Bundy in 1974 described America's newly-installed President Gerald Ford, immediately after the resignation of Richard Nixon.

Bundy at the time was president of the Ford Foundation, a major target of the political right, and previously had been national security adviser to presidents John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson. He appeared on the very long "enemies list" maintained by the Nixon White House,and personified the Eastern seaboard elitists who used to run foreign policy and particularly galled the now-disgraced former president.

Gerald Ford, a star football player at the University of Michigan, turned down more than one offer from the pros. Congressman Ford's "regular guy" demeanor personified the classic American athlete. Perhaps that was one reason Nixon made him vice president after the resignation of the disgraced Spiro Agnew. Nixon, by that time drowning in political fall-out from the Watergate scandal, may have sensed what the country would need to recover from his own political demise.

Nixon seemed to personify how seeking national political office could become distorting torture. In the 1960 presidential campaign, working reporters in the field on balance clearly favored the Democrat, Kennedy, over Nixon. Unfair jibes included the point that the athletic Kennedy was sports-minded, in contrast to Nixon.

In reaction, relentlessly determined Nixon became an expert on big-time sports, knowledgeable about teams and players – especially football. After each Super Bowl, he would phone the winning team (Ronald Reagan would call both teams). When massive numbers of anti-Vietnam War protesters came to Washington, the White House announced that the president was unconcerned, and planned to watch a football game.

By contrast, Ford, the “positive president”, ran an open and upfront White House. He was willing to testify before Congress, as Abraham Lincoln had done. He avoided recrimination against his own political opponents – who were never viewed as “enemies”.

Ford even took the risk of formally pardoning Nixon, avoiding the spectacle of the resigned president on trial and perhaps in prison. Many observers believe the ensuing controversy was one factor in Jimmy Carter’s victory in the 1976 presidential election, which rendered Ford our only president not elected to national office.

Time, however, has confirmed Ford’s judgment. An informal AOL online poll immediately after his death indicates about two-thirds of respondents believes pardoning Nixon was the right thing to do.

Without the mandate of popular election, and assuming office in the shadow of Nixon’s resignation, Ford was never able to assert presidential strength. A large proportion of his legislative vetoes were overturned. Congress tried to run foreign policy through the War Powers Act. That law is now defunct, but the atmosphere of the time prevented the Ford administration from intervening effectively when South Vietnam was overrun by North Vietnamese troops in 1975.

Unavoidably, any discussion of the Ford presidency involves Nixon, in ways that go beyond policy. Each man seemed to represent the average American, far removed from east coast elitists who led America into Vietnam. Reagan’s election to the White House in 1980 dramatically confirmed this popular reaction.

Meanwhile, Gerald Ford remains the right president at one particular moment in history.

Gerald Ford's Perfect Pitch (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Those who believe that a kindly Providence keeps a watchful eye on America's welfare can cite the fact of Gerald Ford. On Aug. 9, 1974, at a moment when the nation was putting aside an unhappy, tormented president, and was aching for serenity in high places, to the center of national life strode an abnormality -- a happy, normal man as president.

Watergate and a presidential resignation were only two of the nation's problems that August. The mid-'70s were years when everyday things could no longer be counted on -- inflation was undermining the currency as a store of value, and lines at gasoline pumps testified to the power of foreigners to get between Americans and their best friends, their automobiles. Ford was a political sedative for a nation with jangled nerves.

He was one of five presidents who never got elected to the office. (The others were John Tyler, Millard Fillmore, Andrew Johnson and Chester Arthur.) He was the only person to be president without receiving any popular or electoral votes for president or vice president. He was about as exotic as . . . well, as he was fond of saying, he was "a Ford, not a Lincoln."

He was born in Omaha and represented a western Michigan district, and much was made, rightly, of his Midwesternness. In the years before the Southern ascendancy in the Republican Party, the party spoke in the flat Midwestern cadences of the senator who had been Mr. Republican when Ford went to the House in 1949 -- Robert Taft of Ohio. When Ford became minority leader in 1965 -- replacing an Indianan, Charles Halleck -- the second-ranking Republican was Leslie Arends and the Senate minority leader was Everett Dirksen, both of Illinois.

Ford was an "accidental president," but there are reasons accidents happen as they do. Call it the cunning of history or an irony of American life, but this underestimated graduate of Yale Law School served a purpose Richard Nixon did not have in mind when he nominated him to replace the disgraced Vice President Spiro Agnew. Nixon probably hoped Ford's popularity in the House would enable him to rally House Republicans against impeachment. Instead, Ford's presence in the vice presidency probably made his former House colleagues less afraid of impeachment.

There is a photograph of the House chamber when President Harry Truman was delivering one of his State of the Union addresses. Scattered through the chamber in front of Truman were four future presidents -- Rep. John F. Kennedy, Sen. Lyndon Johnson, Rep. Nixon, Rep. Ford. Never before or since have four consecutive presidents gone directly from the legislative branch to national elective office.

In 1976 Ford might have won a full term if he had been less statesmanlike: His pardon of Richard Nixon unquestionably hurt him politically, but unquestionably helped with national healing. Ford also might have won if he had stepped out of character and been more adventurous -- if in selecting a running mate he had chosen, as he considered doing, Ambassador Anne Armstrong, a Texan, to be the first woman on a national ticket. Instead he chose a Midwesterner, Kansan Bob Dole, thereby giving a boost to a distinguished career that was to produce the party's presidential nominee 20 years later. Ford also might have won if some unsettling economic numbers had not come out a few days before Election Day. Or if in one of the debates he had not become lost in the labyrinth of peculiar thinking and rhetoric that went with detente. He insisted that Poland was not dominated by the Soviet Union.

He almost won anyway. A change of 12,791 votes in Ohio and Mississippi would have sufficed. The 1976 presidential election was the only one the Republicans lost between 1964 and 1992. Ford was punished for Nixon's sins: Jimmy Carter won by running as the non-Nixon.

Henry Kissinger, who continued as secretary of state through the Ford years, in 1999 wrote a tribute to Ford, the "uncomplicated man" who came to the presidency in perhaps the most complicated context since the Civil War -- in the aftermath of a disastrous war and as a result of a resignation. Kissinger understood that Ford, with his small-town, Midwestern aversion to histrionics, had perfect pitch for the needs of "a nation surfeited with upheavals."

Kissinger noted a "curious paradox of contemporary democracy," that as political leaders become more abject in trying to conform to the public's preferences, respect for the political class plummets. Ford was different: He "was immune to the modern politician's chameleon-like search for ever-new identities, and to the emotional roller coaster this search creates."

Surely subsequent presidential history has deepened the nation's appreciation of what it had for 29 months.

Ford Always Managed To Be A Good Sport (WP)

By William Gildea

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Without question, Gerald R. Ford was one of the most athletic presidents in history.

Ford, who died Tuesday night at age 93, loved to take part in sports from his days as a youth in Grand Rapids, Mich., until he occupied the White House and during the many years afterward. He is best known for playing center at the University of Michigan, where he was on the Wolverines' national championship football teams of 1932 and 1933 and was the team's most valuable player in 1934.

Even after he became president in 1974, Ford still found the time to follow sports avidly -- and to participate.

"I've always loved sports," he told a Washington Post reporter in 1976. "When I was a boy, I knew every batting average in the big leagues. I still look at the standings and I feel a day is wasted if I don't read the sports pages."

As president, Ford engaged in an array of sports: swimming, golf, tennis, skiing. As a younger man especially, he loved sailing.

"He was a good athlete and a wonderful person," said pro golfer Lee Elder, originally from Washington and now living in Florida. "One time the phone rang and the operator came on and said: 'This is the White House. The president is calling.' I thought, 'Sure, sure.' But it turned out that we played quite a lot together when he was in the White House and I was living in Washington. We played at Congressional Country Club and especially at Andrews Air Force Base. It was a fun time."

Later, they continued playing golf together, usually in California, where Ford spent much of his time after his presidency. They also exchanged greeting cards because they shared the same birthday, July 14. "I also had lunch with him a couple of times in Palm Springs," Elder said. "He told me he was keeping active, playing nine holes."

During his formative years, Ford excelled in football, playing linebacker as well as center in high school and then for Michigan. During a speech when he was president, he made light of his accomplishments as a player while noting that 1934 was a down season for the Wolverines after their back-to-back national titles.

"That was the year we lost seven out of eight of our scheduled games," he said. "But, you know, what really hurt me the most was when my teammates voted me their most valuable player. I didn't know whether to smile or sue."

Nevertheless, Ford indicated a number of times that he derived much satisfaction from playing big-time football at Michigan. The 6-foot, 198-pound center, whose jersey number 48 has been retired by the school, was named to play in two major all-star games after his senior year, for the East squad in the East-West Shrine Game in San Francisco on Jan. 1, 1935, and that August for the college all-stars against the NFL champion Chicago Bears at Soldier Field.

Two NFL teams gave Ford the chance to turn pro, but instead he went to Yale to earn his law degree. While there, he served as an assistant football coach and a boxing coach.

"When I got through Michigan, I was offered opportunities at the Green Bay Packers and the Detroit Lions," he told CNN's Larry King during a 1999 interview. "But I had a chance to go to Yale as an assistant football coach and go to law school at the same time. So that opportunity was so wonderful I couldn't turn down the chance to further my education and earn some money in the meantime. . . .

"I would, in retrospect, have liked to have played one year just to prove that I could. But the opportunity to go to Yale and be an assistant coach and go to law school at the same time might not have been available."

At Yale, he learned that "The Game" against Harvard "was as big as any game Michigan had with Ohio State," according to a 1993 USA Today article. With admiration, he recalled a pregame pep talk by Yale coach Raymond "Ducky" Pond before the 1935 game with Harvard. The coach seemed to make his points in much the same manner as Ford often would in public speaking throughout his life.

"Ducky wasn't a fiery speaker, but he spoke very movingly," Ford said. "He talked about the Yale alumni, his experiences and what 'The Game' meant to him. In a quiet way, it was very emotional."

In 1975, the NCAA named Ford the winner of the Theodore Roosevelt Award, given to a prominent American "for whom competitive athletics in college and attention to physical well-being thereafter have been important factors in a distinguished career of national significance and achievement."

Elder said that Ford gave him both "encouragement" and "praise" for breaking racial barriers as the first African American to compete in the Masters golf tournament, the first to take part in a multiracial sports event in South Africa and the first to play on the U.S. Ryder Cup team. Ford paid tribute to Elder at a reception honoring the golfer at the Washington Hilton in 1974, and played in Elder's celebrity pro-am tournaments for charity.

"He was strong and could drive the ball a long ways," Elder said. "He and I played in the Bob Hope Classic and I remember him making several nice drives. At Congressional, he chipped up on one hole for a birdie. He had a great smile."

Before the 1975 Jackie Gleason Inverray Classic golf tournament in Florida, the comedian presented Ford with a set of gold-plated golf clubs. But because Ford participated so often in sports as president, it almost was inevitable that he would be caught by reporters and photographers committing some gaffe.

One front-page photo showed him tumbling on the ski slopes, and on the golf course he plunked some spectators. But he remained active, expressing strong feelings about the importance of keeping physically fit. At age 62 in 1975, he told a Post reporter: "My health is the best. I'd be delighted to have my health record put on the table. . . . I think it's good. I'd lay mine against anybody else's."

He described himself as "kind of amused" by depictions of him as clumsy. "Most of the critics . . . have never played in a ballgame, never skied," he said. "I guess you have to live with it. The main thing is, you don't have to believe it."

But he didn't take himself so seriously that he couldn't laugh at quips by the likes of Bob Hope. "I love playing golf with Gerald Ford," Hope was quoted in the 2003 book "Bob Hope: My Life in Jokes." "He makes me feel like I'm back performing in a war zone."

And Ford himself once was quoted as saying, "I know I am getting better at golf because I'm hitting fewer spectators."

But as people who played different sports with Ford in his later years would agree, he possessed a typical athlete's sense for what he was doing -- in tennis, for example, he had a feel for how a ball might bounce when sliced or drop-volleyed. "There is no question that he thoroughly enjoys it," Rear Adm. William M. Lukash, then the presidential physician, told Tennis magazine in 1976. "He's an athlete and a competitor, and to that kind of a man, tennis is a very satisfying sport."

Those who played tennis doubles or a round of golf with him usually came away impressed by his genial personality, which he managed to retain even while trying to play his best.

One particularly happy day for Ford brought him together with his Grand Rapids South High School football teammates for a reunion at the White House in 1974. The president took them out to the Rose Garden and later showed them the Oval Office. The team's coach, Clifford Gettings, described Ford as a hard worker who developed into an excellent player.

"He came to me a spindly, awkward kid. 'What position shall I play?' he asked. I said, 'Center,' and he's been in the center of things ever since. He had a lot of drive. He always had a football in his hand and must have practiced centering that ball day and night. I used the Pop Warner double wing and the Fielding Yost short punt formation, so Jerry had to center the ball long and short. I never saw him make a bad pass. He was all-city three years and all-state in his senior year."

Notably, the group from Grand Rapids found Ford the president as unpretentious as they had remembered him.

"He was always a guy I loved," said Silas McGee, a teammate. "He was always down to earth like the rest of this group."

Ford Recalled In His Adopted Home (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

When the McCallum Theatre in Palm Desert was sinking into debt a few years ago, the City Council debated whether to approve a donation. A tall, graying figure rose from the audience to ask for help.

The 38th president of the United States told the local leaders that the theater was a jewel to enjoy and preserve. The council responded with a $5 million grant.

It was just one example of the presence built by Gerald R. Ford, who died Tuesday at his home in Rancho Mirage at 93. He and his wife, Betty, became fixtures throughout the Coachella Valley, the desert oasis in Riverside County the Fords called home since leaving the White House in 1977.

"Obviously, the whole city of Rancho Mirage is deeply saddened by the passing of perhaps one of our more treasured residents," Rancho Mirage Mayor Richard Kite said. "We were proud to call Gerald Ford one of our own because he lived here for almost 25 years."

Kite said Ford, in years past, was the most influential person in the Coachella Valley, and both he and his wife Betty were among the most generous philanthropists. They were major supporters of the McCallum Theatre and instrumental in protecting the area's big horn sheep.

"He was very approachable, and he was kind," said Kite, who served with Ford on the theater's board of directors. "He was the type of person, even though he was a past president, that didn't talk down to you."

The Coachella Valley flourished in the 1950s and 1960s as the playground for celebrities, including Frank Sinatra, Bob Hope and Kirk Douglas. The region was known for its country clubs, lush golf courses and upscale living.

According to the official Rancho Mirage website, every president since Harry Truman has visited the desert. The Fords visited during Easter vacations and decided to retire there.

After he lost the presidency to Jimmy Carter in 1976, Ford's longtime friend Leonard Firestone persuaded him to move next door to him at the Thunderbird Country Club. Ford moved into a single-story estate along the golf course at the Thunderbird Country Club in 1978, according to the website.

The Fords have helped open and fund such charitable endeavors as a domestic violence shelter, a children's museum, a teenage outreach program and a bighorn sheep preserve.

Betty Ford is best known for establishing the alcohol and drug treatment clinic in Rancho Mirage that bears her name. It has treated more than 60,000 people since opening in 1982.

Although Ford represented Grand Rapids, Mich. for 25 years in Congress, he and Betty were hometown heroes in the Coachella Valley. An elementary school and a street bear the name of the former president. A bronze bust of Ford stares from the entrance of the Children's Discovery Museum of the Desert, a facility the Fords helped fund.

It wasn't just the desert that attracted the former president.

An avid skier, Ford began vacationing in Vail, Colo. in the 1960s. Borrowing against his children's life insurance policy, he soon bought a second home in the ski resort town. He later moved nearby to Beaver Creek and remained active in Vail Valley community events until a few years ago, raising money for charities, leading the Fourth of July parade, lending his name to a golf tournament and lighting the town Christmas tree.

But it was the Coachella Valley that felt the Fords influence most directly.

"It's obviously a great loss," said Becky Stidler, 56, of Rancho Mirage. "It was always a thing of great pride to know that we had a living president residing here."

Flags stood at half mast outside St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, the church where the Ford's prayed.

"They were unobtrusive," said Father Dan Rondeau, associate rector at St. Margaret's. "They looked like other married couples, holding hands talking to each other. It was inspiring for the congregation to see them kneeling side by side."

Rondeau said the Fords were private people but they could be gracious with their time.

"If people stopped them, they talked or posed for pictures," he said. "Enough people talked to them, so it always took them a while to get from the back to the front of the church."

Rondeau said Ford was true to his faith when he pardoned former President Richard Nixon.

"He saw himself as minister of reconciliation, as a minister of Christ," Rondeau said. "It was a gracious, grace-filled act."

Ford's Former Home Languishes On Market (WP)

By Ian Shapira

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

The modest two-story colonial in Alexandria has all the trappings of an ordinary home: the pink bathroom, the Magic Chef oven, a couple of fireplaces. But 514 Crown View Dr. also boasts some signs, both subtle and overt, that indicate its unusual status in U.S. history.

Neighbors talk of the steel rods placed underneath the driveway to support the limos. A previous tenant speaks about the countless telephone lines installed in the basement and attic used by the Secret Service.

But a gold-lettered National Park Service sign affixed to the right of the front door says it all:

PRESIDENT GERALD R. FORD, JR. RESIDENCE.

The death of the nation's 38th president has focused public attention on his time in the White House. But some spotlight has also fallen on a little-known, decidedly humdrum neighborhood (about 15 minutes south of 1600 Pennsylvania Ave.), where Ford lived for nearly 20 years as a Michigan congressman, vice president and -- for 10 whole days before moving into the White House -- as president.

Mostly everything about the place appears serviceable and decently appointed (with a swimming pool out back, to boot), but the property spans less than a quarter-acre, a remarkable home simply because it is so unremarkable. It stands in humble (almost painfully humble) contrast with the mansion made available to vice presidents in 1974 in the tony Massachusetts Avenue Heights neighborhood in Northwest Washington.

Ford was the first vice president eligible to live in the house on the grounds of the U.S. Naval Observatory, but he became president before renovations were completed. Ford's vice president, Nelson Rockefeller, used the house mainly to entertain. The first full-time residents were Walter and Joan Mondale, who took up residence in 1977. Every vice president since has lived there.

Javad Khakbaz, who is the president of an Iranian English-language newspaper company, has tried to find someone to take it off his hands since September and is suffering the same indignity laid upon just about every other seller in the Washington area: No one's buying.

Khakbaz is reluctant to discuss the home's plight -- he has dropped the original price of $1.05 million to $999,000 -- but his real estate agent, Joan Dixon, is blunt: "We've had a couple people interested in it, but they wanted to lowball the price," she said yesterday, showing the home not to prospective buyers but to a bunch of curious reporters. "It's a wonderful family home. It has four bedrooms, two full bathrooms and three half-bathrooms . . . even if one of them is pink."

But what might appear to be normal about the home and neighborhood is not. The Abbruzzese family at 515 Crown View Dr. proudly showcases a copper plaque above their garage, given to them by members of the Fourth Estate whom they permitted to camp out on their front lawn while Ford was across the street doing neighborly things, like helping run the country, or his family, depending.

The Abbruzzeses, Democrats, forged a gentle bond with their powerful neighbors across the road.

"When it was Betty's birthday, or it was their anniversary, he was out of town and I invited her to dinner with some neighbors," Louise Abbruzzese recalled yesterday. "But she called me and said he was coming home early and I said, 'That's fine, he can come.' I was cooking a rib roast. He liked beef. He liked it rare."

But in the years since Ford departed Crown View Drive in 1974, the home never found a longtime resident. It changed hands twice, Khakbaz said, and neighbors speak with a calibrated air of decorum about the itinerant nature of its inhabitants.

"It's a hard house to sell because it's been a rental for a long time," said Jill McCaffrey, 63, who lives next door to the Ford home with her husband, retired four-star Army Gen. Barry McCaffrey. "Let's just leave it at that."

One of those renters, Brewster Thackeray, 37, now a senior project manager for AARP, recalled yesterday how he first found the place back in 1996. He was 27 and had just broken up with his live-in girlfriend and didn't want to pay the rent at their Cleveland Park apartment on his own. Serendipitously, he stumbled across an ad for the former president's house.

"It was super cool," said Thackeray, who was with the American Trucking Associations at the time. "I had found a picture of Gerald Ford washing dishes in his sink, but there I was using that very same sink next to the same oven next to that same knotty pine paneling on the walls."

Thackeray was so impressed that he wrote the Fords -- and Ford wrote him and his roommates back, two letters and a signed photograph. "You have our very best wishes as current occupants of the home we built and loved," one of Ford's letters said. "We were proud of it when we moved in March 1955. Thanks for enjoying it also."

And enjoy it Thackeray and friends did. The presidential refrigerator was converted into a "kegorator." And they had parties, though not necessarily of the black-tie, state dinner variety.

"The best party we had was a toga party," he said. "People came in togas and hung around the pool."

The Loss Of A President, Perfect For The Cameras (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

New York Times, December 28, 2006

Death is sad, at least in most cases. But the death of a former president has become an almost cheery television event.

It has been more than 40 years since John F. Kennedy was assassinated. His successors died out of office, relatively painlessly, and most were well into old age. The passing of a retired commander in chief perks up the day with a wallop of stately special reports and bittersweet nostalgia (plaid jackets, “Saturday Night Live,” détente), without undue anxiety or grieving.

And in Gerald R. Ford, who was 93 and served less than one term, television has found the avatar of comfortable presidential fade-outs. The deaths of Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard M. Nixon were too fraught with the Shakespearean tragedies they lived in office. Ronald Reagan’s life and two terms were so momentous that the days leading to his funeral, though full and colorful, were also weighed down with mournful Hollywood pageantry.

As president, the likable, reliable Mr. Ford was most memorable for pardoning Nixon; all day, television screens showed Mr. Ford’s address to the nation, as well as grainy color images of him looking on, stone-faced, as Nixon flung his arm in farewell from his helicopter on the White House lawn.

All the networks went live on Wednesday to Crawford, Tex., to cover President Bush’s tribute to his predecessor. Reporters stood vigil in front of the flags flying at half-staff at the White House, and in Rancho Mirage, Calif., and Grand Rapids, Mich. Most morning news programs were too respectful to repeat clips of Chevy Chase doing his pratfall impression of Mr. Ford as the great fumbler on “Saturday Night Live.” By midday, however, cable news shows were gingerly exploring the “lighter side” of Mr. Ford’s tenure.

In retrospect, it was remarkable how open to reporters the Ford White House was. On NBC “Today” flashed a black-and-white photograph by the former White House photographer David Hume Kennerly that showed Mr. Ford, seated at a table with three aides, in a long-sleeved shirt and pajama bottoms. (One of those aides was his chief of staff, Donald H. Rumsfeld, who recently retired as secretary of defense; Mr. Rumsfeld, along with Vice President Dick Cheney, who also worked in the Ford White House, stood out as among the most lasting, and contested, elements of Mr. Ford’s legacy.)

Mr. Ford's presidential retirement was dignified and decent but not particularly distinguished: old news clips showed him in the 1980s and 1990s playing golf and attending fund-raisers for Republicans, not raising roofs for the homeless or public awareness about pandemics in Asia and Africa.

Richard Norton Smith, a former director of the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum and Library, told ABC News that the former president "swam twice a day well into his 90s."

On CBS the presidential historian Douglas Brinkley somewhat apologetically told Harry Smith, a host of "The Early Show," that while Mr. Ford's post-White-House legacy is eclipsed by the charity work of former President Jimmy Carter, "we must not forget what the Fords have done for people who have a drug addiction." But it was Mr. Ford's wife, Betty, who shattered taboos, first by publicly discussing her breast cancer, and later, her dependence on drugs and alcohol, and it was she who led the way for the Betty Ford Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif.

After he tumbled into the presidency, Mr. Ford earned respect for the way he rose to the occasion. But as Wednesday's television eulogies showed, it was his first lady who seized it.

Tom Brokaw, who covered the Ford White House for NBC, went on "Today" to lead the network's special report, but on ABC it was Charles Gibson and not Diane Sawyer, who was on vacation. And that was a pity: Ms. Sawyer worked in the press office of the Nixon White House during the final days and was on the plane that took the disgraced president to San Clemente, Calif.; her reminiscences would most likely have been more interesting.

All of Mr. Ford's acquaintances and biographers spoke of his modesty and stalwart nature. In an interview with Mr. Brokaw taped for Wednesday's History Channel special, "Gerald Ford: A Man and His Moment," his daughter, Susan, described him as the "Steady Eddie" of the family.

It seems that his persona was not so overwhelming that it drove commentators to fold into the shadows.

On "Today" the NBC correspondent Andrea Mitchell mentioned that she last spoke to Mr. Ford in California last February, "when he came over to see me, and we had lunch." (It is hard to imagine a former president in his 90s going out of his way to meet a television reporter, so it was hard not to suspect that Mr. Ford was going out of his way not to invite Ms. Mitchell over to his house.)

Except for Ann Curry, who on "Today" adopted her usual smarmily maudlin tone, most of the encomiums were by turns affectionate and respectful, but not overly mournful.

Mr. Ford lived on healthily and happily for three decades after leaving the White House; as even recent clips show, he, more than anyone, made the Oval Office seem like a ticket to longevity.

Today, It's New York: Tomorrow, Oval Office? (WP)

By Michael Powell, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Presidential Hopefuls Abound in State

NEW YORK -- They sally forth one after another, this parade of presidential candidates from New York.

Some go by a single instantly identifiable name: Hillary! Rudy! Others require fuller identification: Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, a Democrat-turned-Republican who is weighing a presidential run as an independent, and former governor George E. Pataki (R).

New York may not challenge Virginia for its title as "Mother of Presidents," but the state could produce four presidential candidates in 2008 -- not to mention new Gov. Eliot L. Spitzer (D), who has harbored presidential dreams since he was in fourth grade and is already rumored to have an eye on 2012.

New York's ascendancy could reflect a change in the national temperature. The South, after dominating politics for 30 years, has maybe played out, at least for Democrats. In 2000, Al Gore did not take Tennessee, where he built his political career, and John Edwards could not carry North Carolina in 2004. The Northeast turned nearly solid blue in last month's midterm elections and, if taken together with Pennsylvania and Ohio, perhaps the Northeast is ready for a comeback as an electoral linchpin.

"At least on an hallucinogenic level, we have four presidential candidates," said Douglas Muzzio, a political scientist at the City University of New York's Baruch College. "I don't think Pataki and Bloomberg are really serious, but it reflects the changing fortunes of the city. After 9/11, there's a lot of interest and sympathy for our candidates."

It's a curious turnabout for a state and a city often seen as located offshore from the North American continent. Americans have long had a love-loathe relationship with New York, flocking here as tourists even as most insist they could never, ever live in such a cacophonous joint. New Yorkers respond in kind, secure in their conceit that anyone with any sense lives here already.

This mutual disdain held until the 1970s. As the city teetered on the edge of bankruptcy and arson fires roared, the city gained a reputation as a dangerous citadel of sclerotic liberalism. Former mayor John V. Lindsay ran in the Democratic primary for president and lasted but a few weeks.

The New York pol became a forlorn character on the national stage.

"The last time they loved us was when Martin Van Buren was elected, and he ran as a Whig," says Hank Sheinkopf, a Democratic political consultant born, raised and based in New York. "Welcome to post-9/11 New York, where the cachet is back and we're no longer seen as a bastion of left-wing insanity."

In fact, New York once produced a line of presidents, from Van Buren to Chester A. Arthur and Grover Cleveland to Theodore Roosevelt and his distant cousin Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who was elected four times. But it has been nearly 60 years since the state produced a presidential finalist, Republican Thomas E. Dewey in 1948.

The current crop offers two larger-than-life political personalities: Rudolph W. Giuliani, the crime-fighting, Manhattan-living Republican former mayor, and Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, the former first lady and the inhabitant of a New York City suburb. Bloomberg is a municipal Croesus with a pile of money so vast -- estimates of his personal fortune start at $5 billion -- that he self-financed the most expensive mayoral campaigns in the nation's history, spending a combined $150 million.

Pataki, a politically centrist Republican from an Upstate city, served three terms as governor.

Money from this mercantile city feeds the profusion of presidential hopefuls. As one investment house after another announces billions of dollars in bonuses this autumn, the wealthy overflow with guilt. Many give copiously to the candidates.

"Lincoln when he was running came to New York to meet with the rich of this city," said Mike Wallace, director of the Gotham Center for New York City History and a Pulitzer Prize-winning historian. "As money has to be raised in ever vaster quantities, more and more candidates coming here with hands outstretched."

Cesar Perales, a former deputy mayor and general counsel for the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund, said the New York pols are tutored in shaking the tin cup. "Candidates in New York," he said, "learn this from an early age."

There is a cultural shift at work, too. Perhaps the nation finds New York more palatable because it is no longer so different. The tourist precincts, which encompass most of Manhattan and a swath of Brooklyn, are wealthy, well-fed and pasteurized. The old hipster haunts of Alphabet City and Williamsburg are about as edgy as the Hard Rock Cafe.

Sure, the city's poverty rate hovers at just under 20 percent, there is a profound lack of affordable housing, and income inequality grows by the years. But, those problems, analysts say, get relatively little attention anymore.

"The four candidates represent the thinnest slice of New York," said Harvey Robins, a top official in two mayoral administrations. "They appeal to the moneyed classes, which are very representative of New York in this age. Their leadership is pretty far from the visionary leadership of Teddy and Franklin Roosevelt."

New Yorkers seem unsurprised at the profusion of candidates. Their vision is pre-Copernican: It is just more proof the universe revolves around New York. "The city is the center of the world," said actress Elena Zazanis, 32, as she walks down First Avenue to an audition. "I don't know any great mayors from Wyoming, do you?"

Not that this stops New Yorkers from dissecting their own. Pataki is suspect, as he hails from somewhere north of the New York suburbs but short of the Arctic Circle. Most give a pass to Giuliani -- he's a dark enough cup of coffee to be unmistakably New York -- but many won't vote for him (he polls well behind Clinton in the city).

As for Hillary Clinton? Lucy Cantarella, a retired arts administrator in the East Village, gives her best pained look. "She doesn't think like a New Yorker. She plays it safe. Be brilliant. Stir it up!" As for Bloomberg, he's rich enough to pass as a New Yorker these days -- but rooting for the Red Sox?

Cantarella has the ultimate test of fire for these candidates: If they're real New Yorkers, the rest of America won't vote for them. "The middle of the U.S . . . they distrust us," she said. "You see how they look at us? They think we're aliens."

John Edwards Joins Presidential Race (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, December 28, 2006

Former Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards jumped into the presidential race Wednesday a day earlier than he'd planned, prodded by an Internet glitch to launch a candidacy focused on health care, taxes and other domestic issues.

The North Carolina Democrat's campaign accidentally went live with his election Web site a day before an announcement Thursday that was supposed to use Hurricane-ravaged New Orleans as a backdrop.

The slip-up gave an unintended double-meaning to his campaign slogan on the John Edwards '08 Web site: "Tomorrow begins today."

Aides quickly shut down the errant Web site but could not contain news of the obvious, even in the shadows of former President Ford's death.

"Better a day earlier than a day late," said Jennifer Palmieri, an Edwards adviser.

Earlier Wednesday, Edwards visited the site of his planned announcement for a photo opportunity. He did yard work at the home of Orelia Tyler, 54, whose house was gutted by Hurricane Katrina and is close to being rebuilt.

The campaign Web site featured some of Edwards' expected campaign themes.

"This campaign is about changing America," the Web site read, listing five priorities that fit neatly with Edwards' message of economic equality. Among them: "Providing universal health care for all Americans," "Rebuilding America's middle class and eliminating poverty," and "Creating tax fairness by rewarding work, not just wealth."

Edwards, 53, also issued a statement on Ford's death, saying he was deeply saddened by the news and calling the former Michigan Republican a "true leader."

"He called on us to never lose faith that we can change America," Edwards said.

Taking turns with about 30 young people shoveling loads of dirt in Tyler's backyard, Edwards declined to discuss the campaign, focusing instead on the slow recovery in New Orleans, where whole neighborhoods remain a wasteland.

"Anyone who's not concerned with the rate of recovery is not paying attention," said Edwards. He said finger-pointing is part of the problem, adding that the student volunteers he worked with provided an example of what can be accomplished through cooperation.

Edwards arrived promptly at 1:30 p.m., clad in jeans and a khaki work shirt. His aides kept more than two-dozen reporters and photographers at bay as he and the students prepared Tyler's yard for landscaping.

Tyler is still living in a Federal Emergency Management Agency trailer in her yard.

"I feel like a child with Santa Claus," Tyler said before Edwards arrived.

The son of a textile mill worker, Edwards has been on a fast track most of his life despite his up-by-the-bootstraps roots.

A standout law student who became a stunningly successful trial lawyer, Edwards vaulted from nowhere politically into the U.S. Senate and then onto the 2004 Democratic presidential ticket — all in less than six years.

In 1998, in his first bid for public office, Edwards defeated incumbent Sen. Lauch Faircloth, R-N.C., a leading advocate for impeachment of President Clinton.

Edwards began building support for his first presidential bid shortly after arriving in the Senate. He quickly made a name for himself in Congress, using his legal background to help Democratic colleagues navigate the impeachment hearings.

Edwards launched a bid for the Democratic nomination in 2003 and quickly caught the eye of Democratic strategists. Although he won only the South Carolina primary, his skills on the trail, his cheerful demeanor, and his message of "two Americas" — one composed of the wealthy and privileged, and the other of the hardworking common man — excited voters, especially independents and moderate-leaning Democrats.

Edwards' handsome, youthful appearance also gave him a measure of star quality.

Those were among the qualities that led Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the Democrats' 2004 standard bearer, to select Edwards as his runningmate. It was a stunning success for someone who had majored in textile management as an undergraduate as a kind of insurance policy in case a law career didn't pan out.

Republicans have sought to cast Edwards as a money-chasing trial lawyer. It is an image that Edwards has tried to counter by arguing that he represented ordinary people wronged by big corporations.

"I spent most of my adult life representing kids and families against very powerful opponents, usually big insurance companies," he liked to say. "And my job was to give them a fair shake, to give them a fair chance."

Edwards Makes N.O. Platform To Throw His Hat Into The Ring (NOTP)

By Bruce Nolan

New Orleans Times-Picayune, December 28, 2006

What Orelia Tyler asked for was a team of volunteers to come spread a load of dirt in the back yard of her nearly restored eastern New Orleans home.

What she got Wednesday was the crush of a national political photo op for former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, who brought two dozen reporters and photographers to watch him shovel dirt in jeans and a work shirt, a choreographed background for his effective announcement of his 2008 presidential candidacy.

"No!" said an astonished Tyler, who said she had no idea her home on Stemway Drive near Lakefront Airport had become a political stage.

Edwards' campaign team scheduled the work party as a photo session, but made clear that the formal declaration of candidacy would come today.

The explicit announcement will come -- again in Tyler's backyard -- today at 8 a.m., said Edwards aide Jennifer Palmieri. And Edwards's Web site briefly -- apparently accidentally -- posted his formal announcement Wednesday, then took it down, the Associated Press reported.

"What happened was, apparently, they were testing the Web site," Palmieri told The Washington Post. "I guess, somehow, when they were testing it, AP happened to catch it."

Officials said they had always intended to post the announcement on the Internet on Wednesday night, in advance of Edwards' scheduled announcement early today, the Post reported. Edwards had also planned to send an e-mail to his supporters before speaking to the cameras from New Orleans.

Even though it was accidental, the announcement on the campaign Web site quickly spread across the Internet, the paper reported. By early Wednesday evening, Edwards' entry in Wikipedia, an online encyclopedia, noted: "On Dec. 27, 2006, he announced his entry into the 2008 presidential race."

Edwards, who also ran in 2004, limited his remarks Wednesday. He said his candidacy would emphasize Americans helping Americans, New Orleans being the most spectacular current example of the opportunities that offers.

Edwards did speak briefly to the recovery, faulting the White House for providing too little help.

"The president should've said, 'I want someone in my office every morning, telling me what was happening in New Orleans yesterday,' " he said.

One issue is poverty

Edwards announced his 2004 presidential candidacy on Jon Stewart's hip, irreverent Daily Show. This year he chose the sober wreckage of New Orleans to make a point about the "intolerable" gap between haves and have-nots all over the country, Palmieri said.

"It's about what people all around America saw," in the images of suffering New Orleanians stranded at the Superdome and the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, she said. "That there are 38 million people living in poverty."

"There's not any other place in the country that speaks to an issue -- poverty -- like New Orleans does," she said.

Edwards, 53, is a multimillionaire trial lawyer who grew up poor, the first in his family to go to college. He focused his 2004 campaign on helping the working man. He lost the nomination to Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, but ran as Kerry's vice presidential candidate.

He joins outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsak and Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich as declared Democratic candidates.

Waiting in the wings are New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, and perhaps Kerry, Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden and others.

No Republican has formally declared for president, although several have formed exploratory committees. Those include Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, among others.

Lots of help

Tyler spent part of the afternoon chatting with the young workers Edwards brought with him from Baton Rouge. She watched appreciatively as they attacked a mound of dirt she said a contractor left before he abandoned a landscaping job in her backyard.

Her house took on more than nine feet of water during Hurricane Katrina. Tyler said she returned to New Orleans two months after the storm when Reily Foods Co. welcomed her back to her job in quality assurance. She has lived in a FEMA trailer in her front yard since March, but hopes to reoccupy her nearly refurbished house as soon as she gets gas service restored, she said.

She still lacks countertops, but said she is ready to move in anyway.

Tyler said she recently told a friend she still needed help with the back yard.

In short order, her address showed up as a work site to be tackled by the students of the Achievement Academy, a tutorial program with 156 students in Baton Rouge, said its director, Kwame Asante.

Twenty-six students from the academy, sixth- through eighth-graders, arrived at Tyler's house Wednesday to shovel.

Asante is also president of the NAACP chapter in Baton Rouge -- and a contact Edwards has used in earlier relief trips into New Orleans.

Edwards and several hundred students gutted houses on spring break this year. And on Monday, Edwards and the Achievement Academy students worked at Second Harvesters Food Bank, several said.

Liked what she saw

Although Tyler said she had no idea her property would be the scene of a political announcement, she said she was grateful for the help with the dirt.

She said she voted for Edwards in the Louisiana primary of 2004.

"I remember looking him up and liking what I saw," Tyler said of Edwards.

And what was that?

She shook it off with a laugh: "Don't ask me now. That's too far to go back."

Tyler watched the work in her back yard for a while Wednesday, then excused herself for a trip downtown.

She said she had an appointment on Poydras Street: Her long-awaited Road Home interview.

"Can't be late for that," she said.

Democrat John Edwards To Announce 2008 U.S. Presidential Bid (BLOOM)

By Nicholas Johnston

Bloomberg, December 28, 2006

Dec. 27 (Bloomberg) -- Former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, the losing Democratic vice presidential candidate two years ago, will announce tomorrow that he is seeking the party's nomination for president in 2008, a spokeswoman said.

Edwards will make the announcement in New Orleans in front of a house that was destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. He spent time today helping volunteers fix up the home's backyard.

``He will announce his candidacy for president tomorrow," said spokeswoman Jennifer Palmieri.

Edwards, 53, was John Kerry's vice presidential running mate in 2004 and during the campaign spoke often about two Americas, one rich and one poor. He will use New Orleans tomorrow as a backdrop to highlight that disparity.

Edwards is the highest profile candidate to officially announce for 2008. His opponents for the nomination may include Senators Hillary Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, who haven't announced whether they will enter the race.

Edwards sought the Democratic presidential nomination in 2004, coming in second in the Iowa caucuses and fourth in the New Hampshire primary. He eventually withdrew and was picked by Kerry for the second spot on the Democratic ticket.

Edwards's Theme: U.S. Poverty (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Amid Iraq Talk, White House Hopeful Sticks to '04 Issue in '08 Run

For the roughly two dozen candidates considering a run for the White House, it is perhaps the jackpot question: What might be the winning message in a contest whose first nominating vote is still more than a year away?

Today, former Sen. John Edwards begins testing his hunch that Americans, though focused now on the war in Iraq, can be won over to a campaign built on what he calls "the great moral issue of our time" -- fighting poverty at home. He plans to do so with an unorthodox announcement of his candidacy, not standing on a flag-draped stage, but volunteering his labor in New Orleans's Lower Ninth Ward, which is still struggling to recover from Hurricane Katrina.

The North Carolina Democrat's theme of ending the "Two Americas" of haves and have-nots dates to his 2004 presidential bid. Mr. Edwards didn't win his party's nomination then, but his strong reception among voters helped him to secure a place as Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's running mate. Mr. Edwards argues that the disparity between the richest Americans and the working class has widened since then.

"When I talked about poverty in the 2004 campaign, political types said it was futile," he said in a speech this year. "They said nobody cares about poverty except for the poor. Not true, and we saw it with Katrina."

For him and other presidential hopefuls, crafting a campaign message requires striking a balance between giving voters what they want to hear, and inspiring them to something else. That is proving troublesome for the Republicans' front-runner Sen. John McCain. His popularity since 2000, rooted in his past independence from his party and President Bush on issues such as campaign spending and treatment of war prisoners, is now jeopardized by his unwavering support for the Iraq war and his unpopular call to send more troops there.

Complicating the challenge for all of the candidates: The presidential fields for both parties are taking shape earlier than before, amid stiff competition for staff, big donors and the support of state-party activists. A candidate's message first must appeal to these political insiders, even before party voters weigh in at the first state primary or caucus. Political pros are interested in how well a message ultimately might play among all voters when they go to the polls in November 2008.

Many Democratic political operatives remain skeptical that the Edwards message will resonate among either Democratic or independent voters when antiwar talk is the rage, and could continue to be into 2008. On the eve of Mr. Edwards's announcement, rival Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware drew headlines with his pledge to oppose any increase in U.S. troops to Iraq.

Other Democrats say Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, could emerge as standard-bearers for a domestic agenda that competes with that of Mr. Edwards. Mr. Obama, especially, is seen as a rival to Mr. Edwards for the candidate who best projects optimism and hope.

Those cheering on Mr. Edwards's antipoverty crusade include party strategist Donna Brazile, who was Al Gore's campaign manager in his 2000 presidency bid. Recalling Mr. Edwards's past emphasis on the "Two Americas" theme, she says: "In 2004, that message went largely unheard. To his credit, he kept at it. And Katrina demonstrated the validity of that message."

Ms. Brazile is admittedly biased toward the message if not the messenger. (She says she will remain neutral in the Democrats' 2008 contest.) A native of New Orleans, she visited her father in the city this week for the holidays. Seven siblings and her extended family were among those displaced to other parts of Louisiana and seven other states, and like tens of thousands, they continue to struggle 16 months after Katrina to rebuild lives, careers and wrecked houses, she says.

Mr. Edwards plans to officially announce his 2008 candidacy to reporters today during a break on reconstruction work in the Lower Ninth Ward, New Orleans's most impoverished and hard-hit neighborhood. He is there with college volunteers he has mobilized. Earlier this year, Mr. Edwards labored in nearby St. Bernard Parish with nearly 700 student supporters who were on spring break from colleges in 27 states.

Yet as Mr. Edwards has suggested in speeches, his antipoverty theme is broader than helping Katrina's victims. He speaks of "the forgotten middle class" and of workers generally, who have seen their wages stagnate and benefits erode. He will expand on that message in coming days, seeking to take advantage of the slow-news holidays with a post-announcement tour of early primary and caucus states that could quickly decide both parties' nominees. Mr. Edwards is set to jet to Iowa, then crisscross the nation to New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina before ending Saturday in his home state, North Carolina. He plans to host town-hall-style events at each stop.

The former senator essentially has been campaigning since 2004. He has kept most of his top staff and donors together, and operatives in key places such as Iowa; he rates high in polls in that first caucus state. His email list has grown to more than 700,000, and union leaders are enamored of his populist message, Democrats say. Mr. Edwards's recent enlistment of labor stalwart and former Michigan Rep. David Bonior as campaign manager was plainly a bid for union support.

After the 2004 election, Mr. Edwards became director of the Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, where he has solicited policy ideas for fighting poverty. He previewed his emerging antipoverty program most comprehensively in an address in June at Washington's National Press Club.

In that speech, he set a national goal of ending poverty in 30 years for the 37 million Americans living below the poverty line, lifting one-third of them above it in each of the next three decades. His "Working Society" agenda would mean a higher federal minimum wage, reduced taxes for low-income workers, universal health care, and one million new housing vouchers for working families, to help them find homes in neighborhoods with better schools.

Mr. Edwards proposes "Work Bonds" to provide tax credits to match low-wage workers' own long-term savings. He calls for the government to partner with nonprofit organizations to create a million "stepping stone" jobs, to help welfare recipients and others get experience on local projects so they can go on to better-paying private-sector jobs. And he would open "second-chance schools" aimed at the increased number of high-school students who drop out before graduating.

Mindful of the current headlines, however, Mr. Edwards has paired his domestic agenda with a call to immediately reduce U.S. forces in Iraq by at least 40,000. And he has taken pains to put his domestic vision in a global context. As he put it at the National Press Club six months ago: "How we work to improve our country and lift people up is also critical to restoring American leadership in the world."

Edwards Faces A New Set Of Hurdles (TNO)

By Rob Christensen

Raleigh News & Observer, December 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS - As he launches his second White House bid here today, John Edwards faces a different political landscape than he did three years ago when he was North Carolina's little-known freshman senator.

Last time, the Democratic primary was a wide-open affair, and Edwards intrigued some voters as a new face. This time, Edwards is a former vice presidential candidate who must contend with assumptions that New York Sen. Hillary Clinton is the favorite to capture the Democratic nomination and that Illinois Sen. Barack Obama has eclipsed his fresh-faced appeal.

"Before Barack Obama, it was clear Edwards was going to be the biggest hurdle for Hillary to overcome and had the best shot at stopping her," said Chuck Todd, editor-in-chief of the Political Hotline, a Washington-based Internet newsletter. "Obama complicates his run. ... If it wasn't for Obama, I think we'd say this is a two-person race."

Edwards, 53, of Chapel Hill, enters the race with considerable assets. Polls show he is among the best known of the Democratic contenders after being on the national ticket in 2004 with Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry. Edwards, a successful trial lawyer before he entered politics, is the only announced Democratic hopeful who has been through the presidential marathon and has an organization. He seems likely to receive solid financial support from trial lawyers, and appears poised to pick up significant support from organized labor.

The Democratic nominee could be determined in January 2008, when caucus and primary voters in Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina make their choices. The new early nominating schedule seems to favor Edwards, who has strong ties in some early battlegrounds.

Edwards is also the only Southerner in the race, with the possible exception of former NATO Gen. Wesley Clark, who is considering a run. The last Democrat from outside the South to win the the presidency was John F. Kennedy in 1960.

But Edwards has plenty of skeptics.

"He has got a lot of problems," said Allan Lichtman, an American University presidential scholar and Democratic Senate candidate in Maryland this year.

"He didn't do much for the Kerry-Edwards ticket. He came in with a lot of promise, but he didn't pan out. He lost the debate to Dick Cheney. He is going to be way outspent by Hillary Clinton. He doesn't have a natural base."

The Democratic primary can be viewed like the NCAA basketball tournament, said political analyst Charles Cook, publisher of The Cook Political Report, a Washington-based newsletter. In one bracket, everybody has penciled in Clinton. She has name recognition and a high-profile platform in the U.S. Senate, is a proven fundraiser and has a powerful political organization.

The question, Cook said, is who will survive to face Clinton in the opposing bracket.

"He's dealing, as all the candidates are, with the looming presidential campaign of Hillary Clinton and the recent excitement over Barack Obama," said Lee Miringoff, director of the New York-based Marist Institute for Public Opinion, which has done extensive presidential polling. "That having been said, there is still a following for his more progressive populism . He is certainly a force to be reckoned with down the road."

Edwards is announcing his campaign in New Orleans' Lower Ninth Ward, an area devastated by Hurricane Katrina. The location underscores Edwards' emphasis on poverty, which could be a political gamble. The theme is an extension of his "Two Americas" message from his 2004 campaign, in which he talked about the nation's inequalities. Two years ago, Edwards created the Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at UNC-Chapel Hill.

The campaign experienced its first glitch on Wednesday, a day before it formally came into existence.

Edwards' campaign accidentally went live Wednesday with his election Web site, The Associated Press reported.

The slip-up gave an unintended double meaning to his campaign slogan on the John Edwards '08 Web site: "Tomorrow begins today." Aides quickly shut down the errant Web site.

Several questions remain as Edwards begin his White House quest:

HAS EDWARDS' MOMENT PASSED? Edwards was the new face in 2004, and some voters liked his sunny persona. But some may view Edwards as a bit shopworn. He failed to help carry the Kerry-Edwards ticket anywhere in the South, including his home state of North Carolina.

"A lot of folks are going to view his candidacy and strategy in the context of the Kerry-Edwards campaign," said Dick Hartpootlian, a former South Carolina Democratic chairman. "Many people, including myself, thought it was a strategic disaster. They wrote off huge parts of the country, including South Carolina. ... It's going to be very difficult for Southerners to forget that snub."

The good news for Edwards is that polling suggests that Democrats tend to blame Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, not Edwards, for losing to Bush.

"The most encouraging thing for Edwards is he came out of '04 with a good bit of residual good will, particularly in Iowa, and Kerry had none" said Cook. "He came out of it as well or better than anybody had any right to hope for."

DOES EDWARDS HAVE THE PROPER SEASONING? One of the knocks on Edwards in 2004 was that he lacked the experience to be president. Edwards has served only one six-year term in the Senate and has never held an executive post. But Edwards has been globe-hopping during the past two years, meeting with foreign leaders in an effort to broaden his resume.

CAN EDWARDS WIN THE ANTI-WAR VOTE? Edwards was booed when he appeared before California Democrats during the last election because of his vote for a resolution authorizing the war in Iraq. Edwards has since said his vote was a mistake, and he has courted the anti-war bloggers who backed Howard Dean in 2004.

WILL ORGANIZED LABOR HELP EDWARDS? Edwards had little labor support when he ran in 2004. But since then, Edwards has been heavily courting labor -- walking the picket lines and participating in a campaign to pressure Wal-Mart to treat its workers better. He is expected to name former Michigan congressman David Bonior, a key labor ally, as his campaign manager. Labor could play an important role in the Iowa and Nevada caucuses.

But labor no longer has the clout that it once had.

"The last time labor got their candidate was Walter Mondale," said Todd, the Political Hotline editor, referring to the Democratic nominee in 1984.

Edwards Likely To Try For Democratic Presidential Nomination (CQ)

Congressional Quarterly, December 28, 2006

John Edwards is expected to announce his second try for a Democratic presidential nomination, during a scheduled appearance in New Orleans Thursday. If he does, he will stand out as a national figure in a field of official party contenders currently made up of three much lesser-known figures: retiring Iowa Gov. Tim Vilsack, Ohio Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich and former Alaska Sen. Mike Gravel.

Edwards, a 53-year-old former senator from North Carolina, would enter the race with substantial national name ID from his run as the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee on the ticket with Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, which followed Edwards' emergence as the strongest challenger to Kerry for that year's presidential nomination.

His tour on the ticket that lost narrowly (51 percent to 48 percent) to President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney has not made Edwards the heir apparent for the 2008 Democratic presidential nod; in fact, Kerry has not yet clarified whether he will make a second try himself.

And Edwards' turn as the star of the field may be short-lived. He has received much less buzz among politics watchers than the Democrats' two leading subjects of presidential speculation: New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, wife of former President Bill Clinton, fundraising juggernaut and perceived front-runner in the Democratic nominating contest; and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who has skyrocketed to political celebrity since his moving keynote address at the 2004 Democratic convention and his subsequent election that year as the only current African-American senator.

In choosing the unusual "slow news" period between the Christmas and New Year's holidays, Edwards is attempting to steal a march on Clinton, whose candidacy is regarded as most observers as a near-certainty, and Obama, who is expected to announce a determination early in the new year about whether he'll run or not. Edwards may also be hoping to preempt some of the obsessive media attention given to those other top-tier candidates.

Still, despite the publicity imbalance to date, the handsome and personable Edwards has an opportunity to pursue a sizable niche as an alternative for Democratic voters worried about the electability of Clinton — who carries the baggage of controversies that surrounded her and her husband during their White House years — or Obama, who bears the burden of proof that the nation is prepared to elect a black president, and whose mere two years in the Senate would raise questions about whether he had sufficient experience.

Experience, in fact, was an issue that dogged Edwards in 2004. He ran for national office at the end of his one and only six-year term in the Senate (unlike Obama, who previously was an Illinois state senator, wealthy trial lawyer Edwards never held public office before or after his short U.S. Senate stint).

With the nation at war in Iraq and Afghanistan, four-term Sen. Kerry and other opponents for the nomination questioned whether Edwards had the requisite foreign policy and national security credentials.

Since the 2004 campaign, Edwards has taken steps to address that issue. On the signal foreign policy issue of the day, he has been an outspoken critic of the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq. He also has sought to draw attention to an overseas crisis that is far less visible to the American people: ongoing civil strife in Uganda: He edited the recently released book "Home: The Blueprints of Our Lives," which includes reflections from politicians, actors and others on their childhood residences, with the proceeds dedicated to relief efforts in Uganda.

Yet the core of his political activism, and a central theme of his prospective 2008 campaign, is combating poverty and inequality in American society. It's no coincidence that Edwards reportedly has chosen to hold his Thursday event in New Orleans' Lower Ninth Ward, a mostly African-American and largely lower-income community struggling to recover from the sweeping devastation that followed Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

In 2005, he signed on to head the new Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill (where he earned his law degree), and was visible in post-Katrina reconstruction in Louisiana.

This is not a new cause for Edwards, who often refers to his background as the son of a mill worker and as the first member of his family to go to college. His 2004 bid for president also focused on poverty and his portrayal of "two Americas," one prosperous and the other struggling economically. He projects a vision of "one America" through social equality on issues including health care coverage, increased minimum wages and other efforts to reduce poverty.

Edwards' political action committee, which has been the platform to keep him in the public eye, is called the One America Committee. Since it was formed in 2001, the PAC has raised $2.7 million and spent $2.6 million, according to the committee's filing with the Federal Election Commission.

Edwards' focus on economic issues has attracted interest from some elements of organized labor.

Reflecting on the 2004 campaign, which some analysts said was stymied by Kerry's lack of charisma, Edwards said on MSNBC's Hardball Dec. 12 that he "wasn't crazy about" running for vice president.

"Your job, basically, is to advocate for the presidential candidate," he said, giving him little leeway to speak openly about his own opinions.

But Edwards said that experience campaigning has informed his approach for this cycle. "Running before makes you focus on something different instead of focusing on how crowds respond to you and what everybody seems to love of you," he said .

"That's not the test for being president," he continued. "The test for being president is are you the best person to occupy the Oval Office and be the leader of the free world? Because literally the future of the world is at stake here. This is not about popularity and excitement."

Edwards would not head into the 2008 presidential campaign alone: His wife, Elizabeth, whom he met when they were attending law school, has been an active participant in his political campaigns.

Her own public profile has been raised by a book she authored earlier this year. Titled "Saving Graces: Finding Solace and Strength from Friends and Strangers," it focuses on how she dealt with the death of a teenage son in a 1996 car accident and with her own battle with breast cancer, with which she was diagnosed on Nov. 3, 2004 — the day after the election in which the Kerry-Edwards ticket was defeated.

As a moderate/independent, I will watch the presidential campagin of John Edwards with a keen interest. I believe in the 'one america' theme but he also will have to show me the ability to grasp and develop sound foreign policies - understanding there is a limit our country can force it will on another. In addition, I will watch how he articulate his plans for creating an environment that will induce companies to reduce their reliance for profit by building factories in countries where they pay very low wages; what is his proposed reform for Social Security; the plan for budget deficit; how to deal with terrorism, etc. The United States needs a person that is capable of making sound decisions and providing bipartisan leadership. I will expect no less.

He is rabid about amnesty for illegal aliens. So that hacks off about 79% of the electorate. He is an ex Trial Lawyer who became mega rich that way. That hacks off about 99% of the electorate. I mean who in the dickens do the Bubble Head pundits think will vote for him? Would You? Will You? Other than having a nice head of air, a nice smile and lots of very general feel good platitudes, what is there?

But you can depend on the the 1/2 of the 1% of registered Looney Left Democrats who pick our Candidates in primaries to pick another loser like him. Hello Republicans Time!

Someone who could win...say a Senator Byron Dorgan or a Senator Kent Conrad, serious men who are published discussing serious things..like Social Security, Job Loss, Outsourcing, squandering our wealth and blood in Iraq sort of like Russia did in Afghanistan. Now would the Democrats ever nominate anyone like that who would win in a landslide? Never? That is what I think too. We will get another unelectable candidate. Get ready to take another whooping, Democrats.

Edwards 2008 Bid To Push Plight Of Poor (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein

New York Sun, December 28, 2006

A former senator from North Carolina, John Edwards, is set to enter the race for the Democratic presidential nomination this morning, emphasizing the plight of the underclass by launching his campaign from a blighted New Orleans neighborhood hard hit in Hurricane Katrina.

By focusing on social justice and the poor, Mr. Edwards, 53, hopes to court Democratic Party activists and pose a challenge from the left to other likely presidential contenders, such as Senator Clinton.

"I don't think there's any question that by talking about labor, the minimum wage, and poverty, his strategy has been to run as the progressive alternative," a Democratic operative and lobbyist, Steven Elmendorf, said in an interview.

Mr. Edwards, who sought the Democratic nomination in 2004 and later became the party's vice presidential nominee, scores well in opinion polls, particularly in the early caucus state of Iowa. However, his hopes of becoming the alternative to Mrs. Clinton have been set back by a relatively new entrant on the political scene, Senator Obama of Illinois, who is also mulling a presidential bid.

Mr. Elmendorf said a run by Mr. Obama would "take quite a bit of air out" of Mr. Edwards's campaign. "He has a problem running as the new guy," the strategist said. " Obama takes up a lot of political space."

Democratic strategists said Mr. Edwards has made good use of his time since leaving the Senate in 2004. "He has done some very smart things over the past couple of years to position himself differently from the rest of the field," a Democratic consultant, Christopher Lehane, said.

In addition to staking out the poverty issue and boosting his foreign affairs resume with international travel, Mr. Edwards, who was a trial lawyer before being elected to the Senate, has moved aggressively to win the support of labor unions, particularly those for service workers.

"He's made an effort. He's worked it hard," Mr. Elmendorf said. However, he said, he doubts many unions will be willing to endorse Mr. Edwards in the primary, in part because Mrs. Clinton will be seeking those same endorsements, or a pledge from labor groups to stay neutral.

"When Senator Clinton gets engaged with them, she's very formidable," Mr. Elmendorf said. " President Clinton did a lot for them."

Mr. Elmendorf said union leaders will be wary of repeating the scenario from 2004, when some endorsed the upstart candidate, Dr. Howard Dean, only to see his bid fizzle out.

Mr. Lehane, who served for a time as a spokesman for the Democratic presidential nominee, Senator Kerry of Massachusetts, said one of the biggest challenges facing Mr. Edwards is a financial one, as contenders for the nomination are seen as needing to raise about $20 million by June.

"If you look at Hillary, she's like a blue-chip stock, good fundamentals, sustained growth, big dividends. Obama winds up being either the Google, which goes through the roof and fundamentally changes everything, or he ends up like Petco.com," Mr. Lehane said. " Edwards is one of those candidates you end up betting long on."

One asset Mr. Edwards has is that many of those who worked closely with him on his losing primary bid in 2004 seemed to enjoy the experience, while some who worked for other candidates grew disillusioned. "People working with him really enjoyed working with him and had great respect for him," Mr. Lehane said.

A Des Moines teacher who runs a Web site promoting Mr. Edwards, Joshua Brown, said Mr. Edwards's sincerity and authenticity serve him well in the small-group settings where Iowa caucus-goers meet the candidates. "He connects really well," Mr. Brown said. "In Iowa politics, a lot of it comes down to meeting the person and being able to ask them the question you want to ask."

Mr. Brown said Mrs. Clinton's celebrity could actually make it harder for her to compete. "There's going to be tons of people showing up," he said. "It's just going to be to see Hillary Clinton. "It's not going to be to listen to Hillary Clinton."

Edwards Scooped By His Web Site (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 27 -- Former senator John Edwards of North Carolina scooped himself Wednesday when advisers testing his campaign Web site posted the news that he is running for president in 2008. The posting came a day before Edwards's planned formal declaration of candidacy in this city's devastated Ninth Ward.

There was no secret about Edwards's presidential campaign intentions. The 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee has been running hard for two years, and campaign officials have been at work for more than a week on final arrangements for the official launching.

But the pre-announcement of the candidacy on the Edwards Web site -- which was online only briefly but was nonetheless, officials said, noticed by the Associated Press -- caught everyone in the campaign by surprise.

"What happened was, apparently, they were testing the Web site," said Jennifer Palmieri, Edwards's spokeswoman. "I guess, somehow, when they were testing it, AP happened to catch it."

Officials said they had always intended to post the announcement on the Internet on Wednesday night, in advance of Edwards's scheduled announcement early on Thursday. Edwards had also planned to send an e-mail to his supporters before speaking to the cameras from New Orleans.

The sequence of events highlighted the many ways in which candidates now seek to draw attention to presidential campaign announcements, attempting to maximize their audience through the various media platforms for what are well-scripted events.

Even while doing some volunteer work Wednesday afternoon for Orelia Tyler, a New Orleans resident whose home was devastated by the floods of Hurricane Katrina, Edwards taped a statement that aides planned to post online in time for his formal announcement.

Even though it was accidental, the announcement on the campaign Web site quickly spread across the Internet. By early Wednesday evening, Edwards's entry in Wikipedia, an online encyclopedia, noted: "On Dec. 27, 2006, he announced his entry into the 2008 presidential race."

Edwards chose New Orleans for his announcement to highlight his interest in the issue of poverty, which has been his focus for most of the past two years. He has been to Louisiana numerous times since Katrina hit and recruited 700 college students to join him here in the spring to volunteer their time, helping clean out and rebuild destroyed homes.

He also picked the week between Christmas and New Year's Day to announce his candidacy in large part because he and his advisers thought it would attract more attention during what is traditionally a slow news period. But the death of former president Gerald R. Ford was by far the dominant news on Wednesday and probably will continue to be for several more days.

Edwards issued a statement mourning the death of the 38th president.

"President Ford was a true leader -- he made decisions based on what he believed was right, not what was politically expedient," the statement said. "He called on us to never lose faith that we can change America."

He said Americans could honor Ford's memory by "lifting ourselves above partisan politics and acting with the courage and conviction of our ideals."

Thursday's declaration of candidacy will be relatively low-key, with Edwards planning to make a brief statement outlining his reasons for running and then taking questions from reporters. He plans to leave New Orleans in the early afternoon for an evening rally in Iowa, the site of the first presidential caucuses, and he will hold a town hall meeting in New Hampshire on Friday.

Edwards, 53, was a successful and wealthy trial lawyer. He did not turn to politics until 1998, when he was elected to the Senate. He spent one term in Washington before deciding not to seek reelection. His 2004 presidential campaign started slowly but caught fire just before the Iowa caucuses. He finished second to the eventual Democratic nominee, Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.).

He won only one primary, in his native South Carolina, but his skills as a campaigner and his performance in the primaries prompted Kerry to select him as the Democrats' vice presidential nominee.

He joins two other declared Democratic candidates -- Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich (Ohio) -- while several others, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.), are expected to announce their candidacies in January.

Although Clinton and Obama have attracted the most attention, Edwards begins his campaign well positioned to challenge for the nomination. He has maintained considerable strength in Iowa, building on his success there in 2004, retains a base of support in South Carolina, and has developed relationships with organized labor in Nevada, which is scheduled to hold the second set of presidential caucuses in 2008.

Edwards To Run For President (WSJ)

By James Romoser

Winston-Salem Journal, December 28, 2006

Former U.S. Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., became yesterday the third candidate to enter the 2008 presidential race - but not without a false start.

Edwards' campaign accidentally launched his presidential-campaign Web site a day early, pre-empting an orchestrated announcement planned for today in New Orleans.

The Web site was quickly taken down. But the news of Edwards' candidacy, which his campaign confirmed to the Winston-Salem Journal last night, was out.

Despite the online snafu, Edwards' run is no surprise.

He ran unsuccessfully for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2004 and was chosen by the eventual nominee, Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., as his vice presidential running mate.

Almost from the moment that the Kerry-Edwards campaign conceded the election to President Bush in November 2004, Edwards appeared to be gearing up for another run in 2008.

He has spent the last two years raising money, visiting key states that have early primaries and running his "One America Committee," which supports Democratic candidates and advocates for such causes as raising the minimum wage.

"John is the most prepared he's ever been to be president. He's spent the last two years learning, traveling, meeting people," Ed Turlington, who was the national chairman of Edwards' 2004 campaign, said yesterday. Turlington, a Raleigh attorney, continues to be involved in Edwards' campaign.

Edwards chose the politically symbolic location of the Lower Ninth Ward of New Orleans for the formal announcement of his candidacy, and he decided not to postpone the announcement after the death of former President Gerald Ford. He released a statement saying he was saddened by Ford's death.

Yesterday, Edwards helped do yard work for a woman whose house was destroyed by Hurricane Katrina.

After a new conference today, he is expected to begin a whirlwind, three-day tour in which he will visit Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina - the first four states in the 2008 Democratic primary season.

On Saturday night, Edwards will conclude the tour with a rally in Chapel Hill.

Other than Edwards, only two major candidates - Democratic Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa and U.S. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio - have announced their intentions to run for president in 2008.

But others are widely expected to join the race soon, including Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y.; Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill.; and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

The 2008 election will be an unusual presidential election because there will be no sitting president or vice president running. "It's such a wide open race that starting early is a necessity," Turlington said.

Edwards, 53, was a successful trial lawyer and was elected to the U.S. Senate from North Carolina in 1998. In 2003, he started his first presidential campaign, which focused on a theme of "two Americas." He won one primary - South Carolina - before agreeing to be Kerry's running mate.

Recent national opinion polls have shown Edwards trailing both Clinton and Obama for the Democratic nomination. His numbers are higher in Iowa, where a poll showed Edwards tied for the lead with Obama, followed by Vilsack and then Clinton.

Edwards Frames Comeback With Populist Message: Margaret Carlson (BLOOM)

By Margaret Carlson

Bloomberg, December 28, 2006

Dec. 28 (Bloomberg) -- When the reliable Des Moines Register poll two weeks ago showed former vice presidential candidate John Edwards leading in Iowa with 36 percent, people were surprised.

How did he do that in a year when it has been Hillary and Everyone Else, then Hillary, Obama and Everyone Else? Quietly, very quietly, which is the best way for a Democratic has-been to have any hope of becoming a could-be.

Democrats hate their losers. Unlike Republicans who routinely give theirs a second chance (see Richard Nixon, Ronald Reagan and Bob Dole), Democrats would remove all memory of theirs if they could, like latter-day Kremlinologists. (See George McGovern, Michael Dukakis and John Kerry, though the last doesn't know he is over.)

Al Gore may be the exception. Having taken on many lives -- college professor, itinerant preacher on global warming, Wall Street banker and potential Oscar-winning filmmaker -- there are some Democrats asking him to run. Edwards may have telescoped Gore's six years in exile into two as he emerges from his own Elba to announce his candidacy today.

Having moved out of Georgetown in Washington to his native North Carolina -- where he built a new house, took care of his wife who learned in the final week of the campaign that she had cancer, joined an investment banking firm and tended to the family foundation established in memory of son Wade Edwards killed in a 1966 traffic accident at age 16 -- he has shed his inside-the-Beltway skin for that most desirable of guises, the Washington outsider.

Non-Combative Candidate

Surely 2008 is a better time for a candidate like Edwards -- a non-combative southerner who has won a hundred courtroom trials, has an established fundraising base, is a master of the Internet and finally has a few more lines in his baby face than he did in 2004 when George W. Bush and Dick Cheney carried the day.

Edwards's pitch that there are two Americas is, if anything, truer today than when he first took it out for a spin. There is no better place to take that theme than the hurricane-ravaged Ninth Ward of New Orleans where he will begin his campaign today.

That America is still covered with garbage as far as the eye can see, with little in the way of rebuilding and many of those who stayed stuffed into trailer parks. Imagine if a hurricane had hit the other America, say Greenwich, Connecticut. Construction everywhere else would have come to a dead halt as residents there got the undivided attention of the Bush administration and the building trades.

Donald Trump wouldn't be able to hire an architect.

A Living Wage

For the past year, Edwards has toured the country with the message that those who work deserved a living wage. He favors an expansion of the earned income tax credit, better lending practices, housing vouchers, sprinkling low-income housing amid McMansions and a program to rehabilitate Louisiana after Katrina.

And it isn't only the Ninth Ward that bears Edwards out. Wages are stagnant. There has been no increase in the minimum wage. More people are without health insurance than before.

Yet the Bush administration continues to give the rich every break at the expense of the poor. The gap between the haves and have-nots is now worthy of King Louis XIV. Just last week came the news that the chairman of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. took in $53.4 million last year or roughly $25,000 an hour for a standard work week.

Edwards got right with the Iraq war in an op-ed piece in the Washington Post in November 2005. Without making excuses, he said he regretted his vote in 2002 for a resolution authorizing the U.S. invasion.

With Senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama gobbling headlines, pitching in to clean up New Orleans in this slow news week could be all the attention Edwards gets. Like so many vice presidential candidates before him, Edwards's 2004 run didn't propel him to frontrunner status in this race.

Bungled Opportunity

By eschewing what he called the ``old politics of hate and division," Edwards gave up the usual vice presidential running mate's role of hatchet man. He bungled his best chance to show what he was made of in his debate against Cheney.

The trial lawyer who won multimillion-dollar verdicts against well-armed drug companies looked like a Ken doll who had come to ask Barbie's stern father for her hand in marriage. The only blow he landed was wrapped in velvet: congratulating Cheney on his love for Mary Cheney, his openly gay daughter, to point up the Republicans' otherwise ugly strategy to demonize gays.

Edwards spent weeks explaining himself.

It could be that in 2004, Edwards suffered from first-time jitters, too much message discipline about a divided America and the handicap of playing second banana to a waffling, windsurfing stiff.

There could be a hunger now for a quieter man after eight years of taking our enemies dead or alive.

Edwards is the candidate most reminiscent of the late Gerald Ford. Ford was a fine president in a difficult moment, so decent he couldn't win the presidency on his own.

We are a schizophrenic electorate. We prefer the likeable candidate over the sourpuss, but we also want a tough guy.

Edwards has a chance only if nice guys don't finish last.

Ohio Gov. Taft Reprimanded Over Ethics (AP)

By Andrew Welsh-huggins

AP, December 28, 2006

The state Supreme Court on Wednesday publicly reprimanded Ohio Gov. Bob Taft for his ethics violations in office, a black mark that will stay on his permanent record as an attorney.

Taft, 64, a Republican and great-grandson of President William Howard Taft, pleaded no contest in 2005 to failing to report golf outings and other gifts worth nearly $6,000 during his four-year term. He was fined $4,000. Taft could not seek re-election because of term limits and leaves office in less than two weeks.

The Office of Disciplinary Counsel, an arm of the state Supreme Court, said in April that Taft violated Ohio's code of professional conduct for lawyers, and Taft later signed an agreement admitting the violation.

The justices agreed by a vote of 6-0 with a recommendation from the Board of Commissioners on Grievances and Discipline to issue the public reprimand, which does not prevent Taft from practicing law again but will appear in public law registries. The court could have rejected the recommendation or ordered a stronger punishment.

Taft's law license has been inactive since 2002.

"The governor is pleased that the matter is concluded and that the court recognized his reporting error was nothing more than an oversight," Taft spokesman Mark Rickel said.

Court Reprimands Ohio Governor Over Gifts (NYT)

By Bob Driehaus

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Dec. 27 — The Ohio Supreme Court formally reprimanded Gov. Bob Taft on Wednesday for failing to report nearly $6,000 worth of golf outings and other gifts, a coda to his scandal-plagued final term in office, which ends Jan. 8.

The unanimous ruling followed the penalty recommended by the Board of Commissioners on Grievances and Discipline, which evaluates charges of misconduct among lawyers and judges. Mr. Taft, a Republican, was admitted to practice law in Ohio in 1976 and may return to practicing after his term ends.

Public reprimand was the minimum penalty that could have been imposed by the court, which had the discretion to suspend Mr. Taft's law license in Ohio or to bar him permanently from practicing law in the state.

The court said Mr. Taft deserved the minimum punishment because he had no prior disciplinary record and cooperated fully with the investigation. "Any sanction is an indelible stain on a lawyer's professional record," the ruling said.

Jonathan Marshall, secretary to the board, said, "I guess the significance is that regardless of how high a public office a lawyer enjoys, the same standards apply to all."

Mr. Taft, a great-grandson of President William Howard Taft, pleaded no contest in August 2005 to four criminal misdemeanor counts for failing to disclose $5,682.26 worth of golf outings, meals, hockey tickets and other gifts from 19 benefactors from 1997 until 2004. He was fined $4,000 and ordered to e-mail an apology to all state workers as well as to Ohio news media outlets.

He is the only Ohio governor to have faced criminal charges while in office, and his pleas joined a wave of scandals among state Republicans that culminated in a Democratic sweep on Nov. 7 of all but one statewide office and the defeat of Senator Mike DeWine by Representative Sherrod Brown, a Democrat.

Mark Rickel, Mr. Taft's press secretary, said, "The governor is pleased the matter is concluded and that the court recognized that his recording error was nothing more than an oversight."

Mr. Rickel said Mr. Taft had not decided whether to return to practicing law or to pursue other interests.

As Energy Prices Rise, Houston's Heyday Returns (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

HOUSTON, Texas — Fine wine flows freely at Tony's, the dining room of the rich and powerful in this dynamic Sun Belt city. But it always flows a little faster when the price of crude oil is high — and these days, owner Tony Vallone said, the bottles are emptying at a brisk pace.

On a recent Friday evening, socialites in fur coats stepped past the cascading sheets of water at the glass entrance, into an airy room adorned with vibrant Robert Rauschenberg paintings. Waiters wheeled out enormous souffles and whole red snappers encrusted in salt. The richest man in town, oil pipeline magnate Dan Duncan, was dining there for the third time in four days.

At the center table, Ileana Trevino, the head of a hospital foundation, was celebrating her 51st birthday with about a dozen close friends and her husband Michael, a Marathon Oil executive. She was asked what she wanted to drink.

"Whatever's expensive," Trevino replied, and laughed. The sommelier recommended bottles of a $50 red from Spain's Montsant region, a modest option at a restaurant that offers magnums of 1945 Chateau Petrus Bordeaux for $30,000.

"It's almost palpable, isn't it?" said attorney Michael Solar, one of Trevino's friends, as he waved his glass to indicate the wealth in the packed room. "When the rest of the country is doing well, it seems like Houston is often struggling. But when the rest of the country is struggling, it seems like Houston is often doing well."

High oil, natural gas and electricity prices may bring pain to families and business owners elsewhere, but in America's energy capital, they bring prosperity.

Two out of every five Houstonians owe their jobs to energy — many big oil and gas companies have their world or American headquarters in Houston — and the industry's spectacular profits in recent years have helped the nation's fourth-largest city outdistance the country as a whole in economic growth.

Los Angeles and most big cities are seeing slowdowns in their real estate markets this year, but Houston's is still climbing: For 34 months straight, area home sales have increased compared with the same month a year earlier. Yet Houston's housing remains surprisingly affordable: The median home sales price in November was $147,000, compared with $487,000 for the Los Angeles region.

The city is on pace to add 75,000 jobs this year, an increase of about 3.5%, or more than twice the national average. Though that growth rate falls short of Las Vegas and a few other large American cities, experts say it is remarkable that Houston's economy continued to expand even after one of its largest white-collar employers, Enron Corp., collapsed from a financial scandal and declared bankruptcy in 2001.

"A petroleum engineer coming out of Texas A&M now gets about $87,000 a year and a $30,000 signing bonus, and that's for someone with no experience," said Robert W. Gilmer, a senior economist for the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas. "Houston has heated up to the point where it spreads all the way through the employment sector, to plant operators and truck drivers."

Halliburton Co., the construction and oil field services firm that landed numerous federal contracts to rebuild Iraq, has a checkered reputation in parts of the world. But it has added 11,000 jobs this year, and in Houston, where it is headquartered, it was recently selected as one of the best companies to work at by a leading business journal.

"There is definitely a feeling of excitement working in the energy industry in Houston at this time," said Renee LeBas, who moved here this year to work at Halliburton, where she helps companies find solutions to oil field problems.

LeBas, a petroleum engineering graduate from the University of Texas at Austin, recently bought a small house in a desirable suburban neighborhood, just inside the ring of freeways that circles the city. It's the 28-year-old's second real estate purchase since college.

For all the people doing well in Houston, however, there are still many not benefiting from the improved economy, particularly those without college educations. Houston's unemployment rate continues to be slightly higher than the national average, and the presence of tens of thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees threatens to become a major social problem when government housing assistance to the storm survivors runs out.

"Not everyone in Houston is going like gangbusters," said Stephen L. Klineberg, a Rice University sociologist who has been surveying the attitudes of Houstonians for a quarter-century. "A relatively small number of people are making a lot of money, but there are still plenty of people struggling to get by."

What's more, many of those prospering are greeting the good times with a grizzled skepticism.

Houston's economy is much more diverse than it was two decades ago, when roughly 80% of all jobs were tied to energy; the city now has a thriving port and a rapidly expanding medical district known for some of the best specialized care in the South. Still, veterans of Houston's boom-and-bust energy economy are mindful that fortunes could turn quickly, like they did in the 1980s, when a sudden swoon in crude oil prices sent the city's economy crashing.

"This industry is known for being a roller coaster, and right now, with oil over $60 a barrel, they can't find enough people for all the work they've got," said engineer Glenn Woltman, 55, who recently left a federal job in New Orleans to take a position paying "well into the six figures" here with Superior Energy Services Inc. "This is about as good as I have seen it. I was considering five different offers."

But the 33-year petroleum engineer, who lost his job with Marathon Oil during a downsizing two decades ago, is chastened by experience.

"I'm packing away as much as I can, because I do know that oil runs dry," said Woltman, whose job is to evaluate "missed opportunities" at a Gulf Coast oil field that was already tapped by BP. "I have been through those bad cycles."

Houston's economic boom is tied not only to short-term spikes in energy prices, but to forecasts for global energy demand that are leading many companies to make ambitious long-term bets. Amid expectations that the skyrocketing needs of China and India will only increase, firms are more willing to explore for oil and gas in places previously considered too expensive, or to slog through red tape to build refineries and power plants.

Headhunters in Houston are going after all the engineers with 10 to 15 years' experience they can find. Companies are paying salaries $10,000 to $15,000 higher than just 18 months ago, and are sweetening the pot with retention bonuses, stock options and other perks reminiscent of last decade's dot-com boom.

Some firms are even luring engineers out of retirement by offering them more than they made during their prime earning years. Hagan Joyner, 74, got a call from a headhunter at Collarini Energy Staffing, offering a six-month gig. The veteran reservoir engineer, who worked 39 years before retiring in 1999, turned it down. But his wife, overhearing the conversation, told him he'd be crazy if he didn't call back.

He took a less stressful job minutes from his house, helping oil companies report their reserves to banks and the Securities and Exchange Commission — for $85 an hour.

"I didn't think I'd see something like this again in my lifetime," said Joyner, who is planning to use his windfall to see more of the world with his family. "The pay is certainly more than I used to make when I was working full time. We're getting our house fixed up, and are doing some things for our grandchildren."

Houston, like other Sun Belt cities, remains relatively affordable. Its cost of living is 24% less than other metro regions of 2 million or more people, according to the Council for Community and Economic Research, a national group that compares basic costs such as housing, groceries and utility bills.

So after paying their bills, many still have money to spend.

Those benefiting most from the current energy boom are behaving demurely compared with past generations of Houstonians, who giddily spent small fortunes on jewelry, 12-cylinder Jaguar sedans and lizard-skin cowboy boots when oil prices were high, only to sulk in shame when they bottomed out. A bumper sticker popular in Houston's sober aftermath read, "Please Lord, give me one more oil boom. I promise not to blow it next time."

But after years of modest consumption, the money has begun to flow, especially at the city's more luxurious establishments.

"It's human nature — when people have more discretionary income, they are more willing to spend," said Evelyn Gorman, owner of Mix: Modern Clothes, an industrial-chic boutique that sells Bruno Frisoni shoes, Balenciaga handbags and other high-priced fashions. Mix, which recently moved into a boxy new building that looks like a Gulf Coast oil platform, has enjoyed steadily increasing sales over the last two years.

"Would I want to be in Louisiana or Detroit right now? Absolutely not. In Houston, Texas, energy capital U.S.A., when the price of oil is high, you can certainly tell the difference," Gorman said.

The city's elite spas and social clubs all have waiting lists, said Colleen Kennedy, director of memberships at the Houstonian Club, where the first President Bush goes for his haircuts and former First Lady Barbara Bush takes brisk walks.

"That is the first time in all my years in this business that I have seen that," said Kennedy, who has been with the Houstonian for a quarter-century. "All of these clubs are high-dollar items. Our membership fees are $20,000 and $24,000."

In the Texas Hill Country, the picturesque region of rugged, rolling landscapes at the center of the state, Houstonians buying vacation and retirement homes have helped send real estate prices surging.

"I'm astounded at these prices. I used to think these people must be dope dealers or something, but I know better now," said Pat Boyle, owner of Pat Boyle Realty, who has been selling ranches in Bandera County since 1978. Among the properties was a 31-acre hilltop retreat with an orchard and swimming pool for $1.6 million — a large sum in a state where the median home price is $142,000.

"Oil and gas is still the engine that pulls the train, but it seems like the whole Texas economy's rocking and rolling. All these people in their glass cubicles in Houston want their little piece of the Hill Country," Boyle said.

Like Texans in general, Houstonians love to drive gas-guzzling pickups and sport utility vehicles, which remain a common sight here despite the surge in prices at the pump. In the upscale Galleria shopping district, Texas-sized compact parking spots can fit a tank — and are frequently filled with the urban equivalent, a gleaming new Hummer.

"A lot of people have figured out how to make a lot of money in this town, and God bless them," said Mike Shafer, sales manager for the McGinnis Hummer dealership. He estimated he sells 40 Hummers a month, up from 25 a year ago. The outsized status symbols range from $29,000 to $53,000. "Gas goes up, gas goes down, but that never really affects sales here," Shafer said.

Houstonians also love going out to eat — and they do so more than big-city dwellers anywhere else in the country. The Zagat Survey this year found that Houston residents dined at restaurants 4.2 times a week, compared with 3.4 times for New Yorkers and 3.2 times for Americans overall.

During the peak of the petroleum boom that showered Houston with riches a quarter of a century ago, Tony's would sometimes sell white truffles to a cadre of society queens and oilmen, said Vallone, a gracious man whose pudgy cheeks and thick torso betray years of la dolce vita.

Now, Vallone said, it is not unusual for Tony's to sell three dozen orders of white truffles on a Saturday night. The patrons who pay $125 for the privilege of having the aromatic delicacy shaved onto their plates of pasta and risotto are not all tycoons — many are young professionals with money to burn.

"In the old days, young people would come here for a special occasion, a birthday or an anniversary," said Vallone's wife, Donna. "Now they come here to dine."

Ex-Interior Secretary Norton Is Hired As Counsel For Shell (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Royal Dutch Shell PLC said it hired former U.S. Interior Secretary Gale Norton to serve as a counsel for the Anglo-Dutch oil company.

The move comes amid rising scrutiny in Washington of the department's dealings with the oil industry.

Ms. Norton, who stepped down as interior secretary March 31, will be based primarily out of Colorado and will serve as general counsel for the firm's unconventional-resources division, Shell said. The oil company is developing and testing proprietary technology designed to enhance oil recovery from certain unconventional sources, such as oil shale and extra-heavy oil, Shell said.

Ms. Norton, 52 years old, served as secretary of the Interior from 2001 to 2006 and was the first woman to hold the position. She was succeeded by former Idaho Gov. Dirk Kempthorne.

Before that, Ms. Norton was senior counsel at Brownstein, Hyatt & Farber P.C., a law firm based in Denver. She is a former attorney general for Colorado and associate solicitor of the Department of the Interior. In 1996, she unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination for the Senate in Colorado.

The hiring of Ms. Norton comes at a tough time for her former agency. With the Democratic takeover of Congress, leading lawmakers have signaled they will closely scrutinize the Interior Department's policies for collecting oil-and-gas royalties from public lands.

The Minerals Management Service has come under particular criticism after agency omissions excused the oil industry from paying royalties on Gulf of Mexico leases from 1998 and 1999. A Government Accountability Office report said the omission by the MMS cost taxpayers $10 billion.

Shell, historically one of the biggest industry players in the Gulf of Mexico, was one of five oil companies that reached an agreement with the MMS Dec. 14 to pay royalties on the 1998 and 1999 leases.

Acosta Moving To Qorvis Communications (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Dean Acosta, NASA press secretary and deputy assistant administrator for public affairs, is moving to Qorvis Communications next week to work with the firm's aerospace and technology clients, such as Pratt & Whitney and United Technologies.

Acosta, a former journalist, joined NASA in April 2003, several weeks after the shuttle Columbia accident. He led NASA's communications effort in the return to flight with the launch of the Discovery more than two years later.

"Although NASA has been an incredible work experience . . . it's nice to work for a company that's your core expertise," Acosta said.

Acosta is barred by ethics rules from contacting the space agency for one year, but he can still advise contractors with NASA interests.

DOJ_NMG_0109694

Also at Qorvis, Kara Ross, a Clinton White House Midwest spokeswoman, joined as a senior director. She most recently worked for ACS Government Solutions and earlier for the Transportation Department, the Defense Department and former senator John Glenn (D-Ohio).

Experiment In Caring (WSJ)

By Lucette Lagnado

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Agnes Barrett has lived on West 138th Street in Harlem for more than 42 years, persevering as the area experienced riots, fires, gangs, crack and epidemics of AIDS and homelessness. One night in the 1970s, she recalls how a house near hers caught fire and a baby was tossed out the window. She can still see the father running down the street holding the injured baby in his arms.

These days, Mrs. Barrett, who still works as a nurse's assistant one day a week at the age of 77, faces a new challenge: luxury apartments being built next door to her modest $465-a-month subsidized walk-up. Like many Harlem seniors, she fears what will happen in the rush to develop one of New York's hottest real-estate markets. "I love the beautification," Mrs. Barrett says, "but if you can't afford it, where are you going to go?"

Sheena Wright, the 36-year-old chief executive officer of Abyssinian Development Corp., is working to answer that question and a larger one faced by other cities and towns stretching far beyond the borders of Harlem: How do you keep the elderly -- and particularly the elderly poor -- at home, where they want to be, and out of institutions?

Abyssinian's unusual answer is real estate. ADC, the 17-year-old not-for-profit real-estate arm of the famed nearly 200-year-old Abyssinian Baptist Church, is a community-development and human-services organization that controls $299 million in property assets in booming central Harlem. Last year, ADC had a net gain of $73,593, says an Abyssinian official, citing financial statements. Now, it is using its resources to create a social, psychological and economic sanctuary for the community's elderly and poor residents, pumping proceeds into social-service projects while enabling tenants in Abyssinian-owned housing to pay low rents.

"We take the proceeds from the real-estate activities and they go into supporting our programs and services," Ms. Wright says. "The seniors in our community have been the stalwarts. They have been holding down the fort. It is time for us to take care of them."

Ms. Wright calls the streets around the church the "Abyssinian Neighborhood." The church began buying up real estate there nearly 20 years ago when the city was willing to sell abandoned properties for as little as $1 to anyone willing to manage them. "No one wanted to develop anything in Harlem -- housing or commercial -- and groups like Abyssinian took that risk," says Ms. Wright.

The area has since undergone dramatic change. During the last five years, median gross rents in Harlem have risen by 27%, while the supply of rent-regulated housing declined by nearly 3% from 2002 to 2005, according to Benjamin Dulchin, deputy director of the Association for Neighborhood and Housing Development in New York.

As Harlem has become a hot market, Abyssinian found itself vying for the same properties as private developers. These days, Abyssinian says an empty lot near the church can command nearly $1 million.

Ms. Wright is now running a real-estate empire comprising more than 1,000 rental dwellings, the bulk of them in buildings inhabited by the poor and the elderly. The development corporation also controls several commercial properties, and it is developing condominium apartments in five vacant lots now inhabited by stray cats on Mrs. Barrett's block, a venture aimed at middle-income, first-time homeowners.

In recent years, Abyssinian also renovated a group of brownstones and then sold them for several hundred thousand dollars each. Yet even there, Ms. Wright points out, profit margins turned out to be small and were plowed back into the mission. Abyssinian also needs private funding to carry out its social programs, she says.

Unlike private developers, Abyssinian's goal is to create a healthy and viable community. It has no plans to sell its low-income properties, Ms. Wright says. What it does want to do is attract middle-class and affluent residents as a way to strengthen the neighborhood.

"It's not healthy for our elderly to live in a 100% low-income community," says Ms. Wright. "The mix, raising the level and standard of services and amenities in the neighborhood, benefits everyone."

Abyssinian Baptist's immediate target is an area about four blocks wide, from Adam Clayton Powell Jr. Boulevard to Malcolm X Boulevard, and from West 136th Street to West 139th Street. Abyssinian says it has made a commitment to assist every senior who resides within those boundaries. Abyssinian says residents get visits or calls from staff case workers to find out what they need.

Some of the visitors weren't welcomed at first. Mrs. Barrett, for one, can't stand the idea of being looked after, and deplores even being called a "senior." Mrs. Barrett, whose landlord is Abyssinian, refuses to see a doctor. Yet an Abyssinian case manager has found a way to befriend her by simply checking in regularly to see how she is faring and earning her trust. Membership at Abyssinian Baptist church isn't mandatory: Mrs. Barrett loves her church, the Greater Refuge Temple, several blocks away.

Abyssinian is also trying to teach residents like Mrs. Barrett how to fight back if preyed upon by aggressive landlords. An active civic-engagement division in ADC has been organizing tenants' groups and block associations and teaching the elderly about legal resources. Seniors are trained to organize rallies and protest marches and realize their power as a voting bloc.

Abyssinian is hoping to add more blocks surrounding its commitment area and have the whole area designated as a NORC, for naturally occurring retirement community, which is defined as a residence, building, neighborhood or community not built specially for seniors but with a high concentration of older residents. Often it is a building where people moved in their younger years and aged in place; or it may be a small-town neighborhood where the young people moved away leaving behind the elderly.

Funded by city, state and federal monies, NORC programs are considered a cost-effective alternative to institutional care. In New York, the state has begun to fund NORC programs that encompass a neighborhood. Abyssinian has been seeking official NORC funding from New York state but has so far been unsuccessful. The state's NORC budget is limited, a state official said, making the selection process highly competitive.

What makes the Harlem experiment unusual? "They literally are drawing a ring around their elderly," says Fredda Vladeck, director of the Aging in Place Initiative of the United Hospital Fund, a nonprofit philanthropic research and policy group in New York. "They are creating an aging zone and looking not only at what services to provide but what to do to make that a community."

"I think it is very exciting and very important," Ms. Vladeck says. "It is renewing and redefining a sense of community in an urban setting." Abyssinian's idea of how to connect with seniors who don't live in the same building can be applied to suburban or small-town elderly.

To those who wonder if it's possible to mix social services and real-estate profit, Ms. Wright says there's no conflict between the church's core mission of helping the poor and powerless, and taking advantage of lucrative opportunities toward that end. Abyssinian's initiatives cost money, she says. "Doing God's work, fulfilling the mission -- you have to do it responsibly, you can't set out and promise services to people in need without a plan for sustainability, or have services for a year and then run out of money," she says.

Next on the horizon is an even more ambitious project: building mixed-income co-operative apartments or condominiums, and a cultural center, on the site of the old Renaissance Ballroom on Adam Clayton Powell Jr. Boulevard. There is one possible problem: The city's Landmarks Preservation Commission is weighing whether to declare it a landmark. However, the commission noted that such a designation wouldn't preclude development.

A Police Charity Moves To Exit The Fast Lane (WSJ)

By George Anders

Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

When corporate executives join civic boards, they usually are brought in to raise money, map out a growth strategy or provide cost-cutting discipline.

If only Robert Teal had it so easy.

The 63-year-old Mr. Teal, a longtime Silicon Valley entrepreneur, recently became chairman of the CHP 11-99 Foundation. It is one of the nation's leading police charities, operating independently of the California Highway Patrol but providing officers or their families with everything from college scholarships to funeral expenses. When Mr. Teal looked at the charity's main way of bringing in cash, he saw a problem lurking.

For years, the foundation had been selling "Life Memberships" to motorists for $1,800 apiece. Lots of people with Ferraris, BMWs and other fast cars snapped them up, mounting the foundation's hard-to-miss license-plate holders on their vehicles' rear bumpers. (The holders read: "MEMBER CHP 11-99 FOUNDATION.") Buying a membership was seen by many as protection against speeding tickets, though statistical evidence one way or another doesn't exist.

Foundation officials insisted they weren't trying to arrange highway leniency for anyone. The CHP has been even testier, declaring: "Everyone on the highway gets treated the same." But some motorists were clearly looking for special favors. As many as eight to 10 times a year, the foundation was forced to expel life members who treated patrol officers insolently after being pulled over for speeding.

So Mr. Teal led a push to revamp the way the 8,000-member foundation raises money. "Selling more memberships wasn't the answer to our funding needs," Mr. Teal says. "It had to come to an end." The biggest worry: If the foundation opened its doors too wide, it might end up with erratic drivers -- and high-profile accidents -- that ruined the group's reputation.

Mr. Teal's campaign shows how a take-charge leader must maneuver when redirecting a foundation or other nonprofit. It also speaks to foundations' challenges in seeking donations without creating awkward or unrealistic expectations from people giving money.

The CHP 11-99 Foundation was created in 1981 by Bob Weinberg, a Southern California cattle-feed merchant. He enjoyed chatting with patrol officers over coffee and would hand out $100 bills to help with college or medical expenses.

"We joked back then that the foundation was run out of Bob Weinberg's back pocket," says Dave Helsel, a retired CHP officer. The foundation's full name reflected Mr. Weinberg's belief that patrol officers performed dangerous, necessary work and didn't get much recognition for it. On California police radios, "11-99" is the code for an officer in distress.

Before his death in 1991, Mr. Weinberg broadened the foundation by hosting golfing fund-raisers and charging membership dues. Directors issued license-plate frames as conversation-starters, hoping that passersby in parking lots would ask about the foundation and eventually donate, as well.

In the early 1990s, foundation officials say fewer than 20% of CHP officers knew of the charity. There wasn't much reason to think that fast drivers belonging to the foundation would win sympathetic treatment when pulled over. Jack Campbell, the foundation's president in the mid-1990s, recalls getting three speeding tickets from CHP officers who didn't know -- or care -- what organization he ran.

Starting in the late 1990s, things changed. Foundation officials hit the road, briefing more than 100 CHP field offices about the opportunities for patrol officers' children to win college scholarships. The foundation became much better known among patrol officers; this year, it has provided $1.7 million in scholarships to 809 students. Today, 80% to 85% of CHP officers know about the charity, according to foundation officials.

Growing awareness of the charity on the part of officers has had no impact on the way the CHP does its work, according to CHP officials. "There's no favoritism on the highway just because someone is a member of 11-99," says Fran Clader, a CHP spokeswoman. "We're an equal-opportunity ticketer." But she acknowledges that patrol officers enjoy discretion in deciding whether to ticket a speeder or merely issue a warning. The CHP doesn't monitor treatment of subgroups of drivers, such as 11-99 members.

On Internet chat sites, car enthusiasts have claimed awesome benefits from belonging to the 11-99 Foundation. A poster on a Mercedes-Benz site, benzworld.org, referred to the foundation's license-plate frames as "the ultimate speeding ticket solution"; a car enthusiast on Acura-Legend.com called them a way for drivers to be "almost guaranteed of getting out of a ticket."

Other members are more demure. "I joined because I believed in their cause, and I thought it might help with tickets," says Bill Watkins, the chief executive officer of Seagate Technology Inc. He drives an Aston-Martin and can't always resist the temptation to let it roar. He says that while he was let off with a warning once or twice since joining, in another instance, "the officer wrote me up for everything."

By 2003, the foundation was spending more than $100,000 a year doing background checks on applicants' driving records -- and expelling a few members a year because they were abusive to CHP officers. Some directors felt those were bearable costs. Others thought it was time to change.

Mr. Teal emerged as the boardroom radical. He had joined the foundation board a decade earlier, having established himself as a major donor who had a high regard for the CHP. Affable and sensitive to other people's concerns, he was in line to take command of the board when his predecessor's three-year term expired. He made clear that overhauling the life-member program would be a top priority.

"The only asset we've really got is our image in the eyes of the CHP," he says he told colleagues. "If we lose that, we're dead."

Mr. Teal argued for jacking up membership fees to a new range of $5,000 to $25,000, far exceeding what fast-driving applicants might hope to save on speeding tickets. "You can kill any product if you price it high enough," he says. "I felt that's what we should do." Fast-driving tycoons could still afford that amount, he conceded. But it was a halfway step toward a different business model -- and it amounted to as much change as he thought the board could stomach.

Mr. Teal also believed the foundation could tap into big new sources of money. He urged colleagues to approach some of California's leading corporations and wealthiest people, asking them to donate $100,000 or more to create endowed scholarships in their name, which could run in perpetuity.

Some longtime directors balked at first. Such high dues would make it hard for many ordinary people to join the foundation, said director Frank Clark, a contractor who had been a friend of the late founder, Mr. Weinberg.

Mr. Teal pressed on, anyway. From his Silicon Valley days, helping start companies such as disk-drive maker Maxtor Corp., he says he found that "you can't really control the culture of an organization after it gets past 300 people. Before that, you know everyone. After that, you're dealing with third-hand referrals, and you just don't know who's coming in."

Another relatively new director, former hedge-fund manager Larry Bowman, rallied to Mr. Teal's position. "The more selective you are about your members, the easier it is to make sure they uphold your values," he maintained.

The giant dues increase passed in late 2005 and became official early this year. New-member applications are down sharply, says Edward Trickey, CEO of the foundation. But revenue growth hasn't suffered. That's partly because wealthy donors are giving more and also because a retooled foundation Web site makes it easy for small donors to pitch in $50 or $100. They don't get license-plate holders, but they get to support an admired cause.

Foundation donors also are being told that they shouldn't expect any roadway favors if they join. The foundation's new application form states that membership doesn't entitle anyone to "leniency or preferential treatment in any contact involving a law enforcement authority." Abusing membership privileges or property "shall result in immediate termination."

Going forward, Mr. Teal says it might make sense to get rid of the 11-99 Foundation's license-plate holders altogether. That would end even the appearance that foundation backers amount to a privileged class of drivers on the highways.

The foundation board hasn't yet decided whether to jettison that perk of membership. But Mr. Teal says he already unbolted the 11-99 Foundation holder from his BMW and mailed it back to foundation headquarters. "I told people to put it in a museum," he quips.

The Snooker Strategy (WP)

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

ABABY WHO was born in the year that Virginia last secured a stable new source of revenue for its aging transportation network would be most of the way through college now. If he happened to live in Northern Virginia and commute by car to classes at George Mason University, his life would probably be a nightmare of time wasted and psychic energy squandered on sclerotic roads during rush hours that last up to four hours. If by chance he decided to study public finance, he would doubtless be appalled by the Old Dominion's irresponsibility. Since 1986, the hypothetical year of his birth, Virginia's population and economy have boomed, but the state has not managed to tap one nickel's worth of fresh funding to update its roads, rails and bridges to 21st-century standards. In Northern Virginia alone, the cost of needed improvements to roads and rail is estimated at $17 billion.

On taking office at the start of the year, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) did the sensible thing by proposing a tax package that would yield $1 billion annually for transportation statewide. The Republican-dominated state Senate backed him. But Republicans who control the House of Delegates would have none of it. Instead, after a generation of neglect, they have decided to attack the problem of Virginia's roads with press releases.

The press releases are masterpieces of omission, obfuscation and budgetary shenanigans designed to snooker voters. Rather than proposing a long-term fix for a long-term problem, they proudly announce that they favor spending what amounts to a pittance -- half of the state's current $500 million surplus -- on one-time transportation projects. Never mind that they have no viable plan for sustaining that already inadequate spending next year and the year after, since surpluses never last and cyclical downturns are inevitable. Never mind that once the money they propose spending is divvied up statewide, it would result in barely enough to build a decent interchange and a few precious miles of highway in Northern Virginia. Never mind that soaring highway maintenance costs are already gobbling up state funds meant for road construction to the tune of $450 million a year, which is approximately twice the amount the House Republicans propose spending on transportation from the current surplus. And never mind that skyrocketing costs for road materials and construction compound the cost of foot-dragging on a long-term solution. None of that bothers the House Republicans, because they're really more interested in scoring PR points than in building roads.

Mr. Kaine, stymied in his attempts to fashion a sustainable program of new funding, proposes spending an additional $161 million in surplus funds on transportation improvements during the coming fiscal year. (That, in addition to $339 million in surplus funds left over from last year.) It is, as the governor recognizes, a drop in the bucket and one that must be weighed against competing funding demands for public safety, schools and the poor. It would do nothing for Metro, which is slowly strangling from lack of revenue; for widening Interstate 66 inside the Beltway; or for the staggering improvements needed around Fort Belvoir, where 20,000 defense jobs are to be relocated -- let alone projects elsewhere in the state.

So what is the House Republicans' response to the underfunding and Mr. Kaine's proposal to deal with it? First, a press release, of course! Incredibly, House Speaker William J. Howell (R-Stafford) bashed the governor for "shortchanging" transportation, when his own House caucus is responsible for the absence of any serious program to deal with the state's most urgent priority. And yesterday, House Republicans introduced legislation to shift much of the responsibility to local officials who approve new development. These are just more tactics in Mr. Howell's ongoing snooker strategy. They're not likely to work.

Islamists Seem To Give Up Grip On Somali City (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Dec. 27 — The Islamist forces who have controlled much of Somalia in recent months suddenly vanished from the streets of the capital, Mogadishu, residents said Wednesday night, just as thousands of rival troops massed 15 miles away.

In the past few days, Ethiopian-backed forces, with tacit approval from the United States, have unleashed tanks, helicopter gunships and jet fighters on the Islamists, decimating their military and paving the way for the internationally recognized transitional government of Somalia to assert control.

Even so, the Islamists, who have been regarded as a regional menace by Ethiopia and the United States, had repeatedly vowed to fight to the death for their religion and their land, making their disappearance that much more unexpected.

Fortified checkpoints across the city — in front of the radio station, at the airport, at the main roads leading into Mogadishu and outside police stations — were abruptly abandoned Wednesday night, residents said.

Many of the teenage troops who made up the backbone of the Islamist army had blended back into the civilian population, walking around without guns or their trademark green skullcaps.

The sudden reversal left it unclear whether a war that had threatened to consume the Horn of Africa had quickly ended, or the Islamists had merely gone underground, preparing to wage a guerrilla insurgency, as some leaders had threatened.

“The whole city is just waiting,” said Sheik Ahmed Shiro, a Koranic teacher in Mogadishu.

At 10 p.m. on Wednesday, several Islamist leaders emerged to hold a news conference at their headquarters in Mogadishu. They did not explicitly concede defeat to the transitional government, but seemed to be preparing their forces for such an eventuality. "We need our soldiers to return to their positions for the sake of the people," said Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, one of the leaders. "Even if your positions are transferred to the government, you must stay where you are and make sure Mogadishu is as safe as it was before."

As he spoke, Mogadishu was rapidly descending back into the clan-based anarchy that had been its hallmark for most of the past 15 years, before the Islamists came to power and pacified the city.

Witnesses said bands of armed thugs swept through the markets, smashing and stealing at will. Gunfire rattled from neighborhood to neighborhood as the disparate clan-based militias that had joined forces to form the Islamist movement began to fragment and turn on one another.

With the war going badly for them, clan elders had been rapidly losing faith in the Islamist leaders, residents said. The quick defeat the Islamists suffered earlier on Wednesday at Jowhar, the last major town on the road to Mogadishu, seemed to be the final straw.

The Islamists started out as a grass-roots movement of clan elders and religious leaders who banded together earlier this year to rid Mogadishu of its notorious warlords, earning them a lot of public support.

But much of that good will seems to have been sapped by their decision to go to war against the transitional government and the Ethiopian forces protecting it.

The Islamists attacked Baidoa, the seat of the transitional government, on Dec. 20; a few days later, they announced that Somalia was open to Muslim fighters around the world who wanted to wage a holy war against Christian-led Ethiopia.

That provoked a crushing counter-attack by the Ethiopians, who command the strongest military in East Africa. For the past week, the Islamists have lost one battle after another, their adolescent soldiers no match for a professional army.

By Wednesday, the Islamists were cornered. Thousands of troops from the transitional government were closing in on the seaside capital from two directions.

Mogadishu was coming unhinged. The ports and airports had closed, leading to a shortage of just about everything, sending prices for food, medicine and fuel skyward. A gallon of gas in Mogadishu now costs $8.

The once feared Shebab, the devout young Islamic fighters, began deserting in droves. (Shebab is the Arabic word for youth.) "We can't resist," said Musa Abdullahi, an 18-year-old Shebab who quit his unit after half his comrades were cut down by Ethiopian helicopter gunships. "We thought this fighting would be like the others. It's not."

Ahmed Nur Bilal, a retired Somali general, said the war had been a horrible miscalculation.

One of the first things the Islamists did after the fighting started was to close all schools in Mogadishu in order to send more young people to the front. "They've misled our children to their deaths," Mr. Bilal said.

Residents said that crowds in one slum threw rocks at the Islamists' pickup trucks as they drove by on Wednesday. Some people openly celebrated in the streets by hoisting up pictures of the transitional government's leaders and gleefully chewing khat, a mildly narcotic plant the Islamists had outlawed.

The demonstrations helped prompt the clan elders, who are regarded as the pillars of Somali society, to act. According to residents in Mogadishu, the leaders of several major clans — and some businesspeople who had been financing the Islamists — demanded that the Islamist leaders return the armed pickup trucks that had been lent to the movement.

Faced with the loss of support from their counterparts, other clan leaders saw the coalition begin to crumble and withdrew their trucks as well, leaving little of the organized force that once lent the Islamists their power.

One adviser to Western diplomats who has close contacts with both the Islamists and the transitional government described the unraveling as an "organic process that rose up from the people, in an unorganized way, Somali style."

Disappointment in the Islamists, however, does not necessarily translate into widespread enthusiasm for the transitional government, which until last week had been considered weak and divided by many Somalis. Thousands of people in Mogadishu, a war-weary city of two million, have begun to pack up and leave, residents said, afraid not only of the possibility of heavy urban fighting but also of a return to warlord rule, which kept Mogadishu in anarchy for years.

The transitional government has sent mixed signals about what it plans to do next.

Until now, Mogadishu had been considered too dangerous as a headquarters for the transitional leaders, themselves a mix of clan elders and former warlords. But transitional government leaders have always said they eventually planned to base their government in the capital, and this week they vowed to keep fighting until Mogadishu was theirs.

Several Mogadishu residents said on Wednesday night that they expected the Ethiopian-backed forces to march into the city at dawn. That has been a pattern since the fighting began, with the Islamists retreating from cities across Somalia during the night and the transitional government troops arriving in the morning. But some analysts believe there will be a few days of negotiations before that happens.

Ethiopian officials have said that occupying Mogadishu is not part of their plan. But they have also said that rooting out Islamist extremists is their priority.

Ethiopian Troops Take Key Town In Somalia (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

LONDON, Dec. 27 -- Ethiopian forces backing Somalia's interim government took control of the key Somali town of Jowhar on Wednesday and were on the verge of overrunning Balad, a village just 18 miles from the dusty, battered capital, Mogadishu.

With Ethiopian troops, tanks and helicopters closing in and military planes buzzing overhead, the situation in Mogadishu appeared confused, with witnesses reporting thousands of Somalis -- who have known little besides fighting for the past 15 years -- fleeing the capital, and those who remained unsure who might next control the city.

Militias loyal to Somalia's Islamic Courts movement, having retreated in recent days from most of the towns they had taken earlier this year, were spotted Wednesday shedding uniforms and fleeing the capital they have controlled since the summer, while other witnesses reported young men signing up with Islamic militias at several mosques around the city.

Islamic leaders have said the war is entering a new phase, and on Wednesday, Mohamoud Ibrahim Suley, a movement official in Mogadishu, told the Associated Press that "our snakes of defense were let loose, now they are ready to bite the enemy everywhere in Somalia."

Regional analysts have said the Islamic Courts militias, vastly outgunned by Ethiopian soldiers in conventional military terms, were counting on waging a guerrilla war.

"On one level you could say they've been beaten by the Ethiopians and they're trying to spin it," said Matt Bryden, a consultant in Nairobi with the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based policy research group. "On the other hand, you could say this is what they expected and of course they now go into a guerrilla war, and we get into an intractable, unwinnable conflict."

Abdirahman Dinari, a spokesman for the interim government, which has been holed up in the town of Baidoa, said officials of the U.N.-backed body could enter Mogadishu in the next day or two. The fragile government, cobbled together by regional negotiators two years ago, was initially based in Nairobi.

"Mogadishu is our capital," Dinari said. "So the government wants to consult religious moderates and other civil society activists on how we can make a strategy together that will solve our problems."

It was unclear whether Ethiopian troops would enter Mogadishu or simply surround it in an attempt to isolate the Islamic Courts fighters.

A draft U.N. Security Council statement calling for a cease-fire remained stalled, while African Union officials asked for a meeting of regional leaders in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, and called on Ethiopian forces to withdraw.

On Tuesday, however, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said that his campaign was only halfway completed and that he planned to clear out all the "extremists" from Mogadishu.

Experts have said that any large-scale invasion of Mogadishu by Ethiopian troops could end in a bloodbath.

Somalia has been without a functioning government since 1991, when President Mohamed Siad Barre was overthrown. In the next two years, tens of thousands of foreign troops were unable to subdue the chaotic city controlled by rival clans, and in October 1993, 18 American soldiers were killed in a failed raid to capture a fugitive warlord, an operation that led to the withdrawal of U.S. forces.

Though the United States has for the most part remained in the background as the current situation has deteriorated, Somalia has historically been considered strategically important because of its position adjacent to Red Sea shipping lanes.

More recently, it has drawn attention because of fears that the country could become a base for terrorist groups.

In the past, some Islamic Courts leaders have expressed a desire to create a "greater Somalia" that would include ethnic Somali portions of Ethiopia, Kenya and Djibouti; Ethiopia and Somalia have fought several times over Ethiopia's Ogaden region, including a full-scale war in the 1970s.

The United States and Ethiopia have accused the Islamic Courts movement of harboring terrorists, and the U.S. State Department went further this month, saying the movement was now controlled by an al-Qaeda cell, a claim that regional experts believe is exaggerated and fed in part by questionable intelligence from Ethiopia.

As the fighting continued Wednesday, an already dire humanitarian situation in Somalia appeared to worsen. Somalis who had already suffered severe droughts and floods fled the fighting in huge numbers, U.N. officials said, with thousands leaving Mogadishu and surrounding areas.

Officials with the International Committee of the Red Cross said the number of wounded had surpassed 800; Dinari said Ethiopian and interim government troops had killed more than 1,000 Islamic fighters, although aid groups could not confirm that figure.

Islamic Militias 'On Run' Near Mogadishu (WT/AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia -- Somali and Ethiopian troops drove Islamic fighters out of the last major town before Mogadishu yesterday, and the government predicted that the capital and stronghold of the radical Islamists would fall without a fight.

Government spokesman Abdirahman Dinari said no assault was planned on Mogadishu because the forces of the Council of Islamic Courts were crumbling so fast.

"Islamic Courts militias are already on the run, and we hope that Mogadishu will fall to our hands without firing a shot," he said.

As government forces advanced to within striking distance of this beleaguered city, clan leaders considered abandoning Islamic militias who control the Somali capital and throwing their support to the United Nations-backed regime, based in Baidoa.

In New York, the U.N. Security Council failed yesterday for a second day to agree on a statement calling for a quick end to the war in Somalia after Qatar again insisted that it also urge Ethiopian troops to leave.

The 15-nation council remained split 14-1 against the Qatari position, as it had been Tuesday, so further deliberations were called off with no expectation that they would resume any time soon, diplomats said.

During the two days of closed-door negotiations, Qatar had pushed for a demand that "all foreign forces immediately withdraw from the territories of Somalia and cease their military operations inside Somalia."

Acting U.S. Ambassador Alejandro Wolff said it was too simplistic to think that an Ethiopian withdrawal would solve the problem.

The Islamic Courts movement had grown steadily in power for six months, until the dramatic entry into the war by Ethiopian troops. Since then, fortunes have changed dramatically with the Islamists in full retreat.

Yesterday, residents reported seeing thousands of Ethiopian and Somali government troops in tanks heading toward Balad, about 18 miles away from Mogadishu.

Former warlord Mohammed Dheere, who controlled the town of Jowhar before it was captured by the Islamists in June, led in the Somali government troops.

Sounds of the fighting reached a military camp south of Jowhar and in the village of Lego. An Islamist official said his troops were simply entering a new phase in their battle.

"Our snakes of defense were let loose, now they are ready to bite the enemy everywhere in Somalia," said Sheik Mohamoud Ibrahim Suley. He did not elaborate, but some Islamic leaders have threatened a guerrilla war including suicide bombings in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia's capital.

Analysts fear the conflict in Somalia could engulf the region. Islamic Courts leaders have said repeatedly that they want to incorporate ethnic Somalis living in eastern Ethiopia, northeastern Kenya and Djibouti into a Greater Somalia.

Some analysts also fear the Islamic movement hopes to make Somalia a third front -- after Afghanistan and Iraq -- in militant Islam's war against the West.

The group's often severe interpretation of Islam is reminiscent of Afghanistan's Taliban regime -- ousted by a U.S.-led campaign in late 2001 for harboring Osama bin Laden. The U.S. government says four al Qaeda leaders, thought to be behind the 1998 bombing of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, are leaders in the Islamist militia.

Ethiopia sent fighter jets deep into militia-held areas Sunday to help Somalia's internationally recognized government push back the Islamist militias. Ethiopia bombed the country's two main airports and helped government forces capture several villages.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said Tuesday that Ethiopian forces may soon wrap up their offensive against the Islamic militias. He said he aims to severely damage the Islamic Courts' military capabilities and allow both sides to return to peace talks on an even footing. He has said he would not send troops into Mogadishu.

A State Department spokes- man in Washington signaled support Tuesday for Ethiopian military operations against Somalia, noting that Ethiopia has had "genuine security concerns" stemming from the rise of Islamist forces in its eastern neighbor.

Ethiopia-backed Forces Near Mogadishu (FT)

By Andrew England And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

Somali government forces and allied Ethiopian troops advanced closer to Mogadishu on Wednesday, capturing a key town 90km to the north from the Islamist movement that controls the capital.

Ethiopia's deployment of fighter jets, tanks and artillery to support the weak transitional government, has forced the Islamists, which had controlled much of southern Somalia, to retreat from front line positions. The dawn attack on Jowhar, situated on a main highway to the capital, appeared to take place without major clashes.

Officials from the Islamist movement, which is an alliance of militias, have said they are planning for a "new phase" in the conflict, suggesting they are preparing to mount a guerrilla campaign against the better-equipped Ethiopian forces.

Ethiopia launched its offensive against the Islamists on Sunday after fighting erupted between Islamist militias and Somali government forces around Baidoa, the government's seat in central Somalia.

Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister, says Addis Ababa has "no specific agenda" to target Mogadishu, describing the offensive as a necessary "defensive" measure and analysts warn that if Ethiopian forces did attack the capital they would risk getting sucked into a protracted guerrilla conflict.

There are also concerns that Ethiopia, an important US ally in the region, is helping to put warlords who were defeated by the Islamists earlier this year back into positions of power. The faction leaders, responsible for 15 years of chaos and bloodshed, were generally loathed by a population fed up with endless exploitation and violence.

The Somali government, which was formed two years ago at an UN-supported conference, has been dogged by divisions and has so far had minimal influence outside Baidoa. It received little international attention before the Islamists seized Mogadishu in June from a group of US-backed warlords.

Mohamed Dheere, one of the defeated warlords, was reportedly with government troops when they moved into Jowhar, and observers said at least three other warlords have moved into towns vacated by the Islamist forces.

The result could be a return to the status quo of a country split into a patchwork of fiefdoms, beset by clan divisions, violence and extortion rackets.

The Bush administration has expressed support for the Ethiopian military action on the basis that Addis Ababa has "genuine security concerns" there, and has been asked to provide support by the Somali government.

But Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the White House National Security Council, said the US was also urging the Ethiopian government "to exercise maximum restraint". No Somali party should "use external actors as an excuse to avoid further dialogue", said Mr Johndroe.

Joseph Biden, the incoming Democratic chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, on Tuesday said the Bush administration appeared to have given "tacit approval" to the Ethiopian government involvement in the conflict.

He also criticised the administration for what he called the "fundamental mistake" of supporting various militia and the warlords in Somalia rather than helping to broker a deal between the warring groups.

Although Addis Ababa and Washington accuse the Islamists of including and sheltering terrorists, the alliance had, in some areas, created a semblance of stability.

"Ethiopia seems to be counting on an unreformed transitional government and faction leaders to fill the vacuum, which is a strategy that is unlikely to succeed in bringing stability," said Matt Bryden, a Somalia expert.

Ethiopian Troops Overtaking Islamists' Control (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders And Abukar Albadri

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Troops from Ethiopia and Somalia's transitional government cornered Islamic fighters Wednesday in their stronghold of Mogadishu, setting the stage for a possible showdown over Somalia's seaside capital.

A weeklong assault led by Ethiopia's military, which sent nearly 4,000 troops into Somalia at the request of the transitional government, has resulted in a sudden reversal of fortunes for the Islamists, who have lost nearly all the territory they had seized the past six months.

On Wednesday, Islamists lost two more key areas, including the town of Jowhar and the port city of Kismayo, officials said. Ethiopian troops moved within 18 miles of Mogadishu.

As residents hoarded food, water and gas in anticipation of an attack, the Africa Union chairman called for Ethiopian troops and other foreign elements to withdraw from Somalia. The Arab League called for an immediate ceasefire.

Somalia has not had an effective central government for 15 years. The U.N.-backed transitional government has been trying to establish its authority, but the Islamists have presented a major challenge.

The Islamic Courts Union, an alliance of religious leaders, seized Mogadishu from warlords in June and gradually extended their control over much of the country. Ethiopian and U.S. officials have accused the Islamist alliance of being controlled by international terrorists, including al-Qaida. Critics said the courts union planned to install a Taliban-style government in Somalia and use it as a springboard to spread religious extremism in Africa.

Islamists deny such allegations, saying there are victims of Western and anti-Muslim propaganda.

Ethiopian and transitional government officials insisted the offensive would continue until the Islamists surrendered. "The fighting will not end as long as one of the terrorists remains in Somalia," said Barre Adan Shire, defense minister for the transitional government.

Somali government officials said they had no immediate plans to invade the capital, a campaign they said could inflict heavy civilian deaths on the city of 2 million. Instead, Ethiopians and transitional government troops encircled Mogadishu, shut down the sea port and airport, and are pressuring Islamic leaders to give up.

"We are cutting off the roads and begging them to lay down their weapons," said Abdikarim Farah, the transitional government's ambassador to Ethiopia. He said the U.S. was helping to seal off access along the Indian Ocean coastline. "We will take over Mogadishu peacefully. I assure you that. ... How can they hold?"

U.S. military officials acknowledged they have been conducting operations to interdict terrorists in the seas surrounding the Horn of Africa but noted those missions have been in place for several years. One military official said there is a Navy presence off the coast of Somalia, but it is aimed primarily at anti-piracy efforts and has been in place for some time.

Much of Ethiopia's campaign, including the capture of nearly two dozen Somali cities over the past week, occurred without a fight because Islamist troops retreated in advance of Ethiopian tanks, jets and troops.

But fierce battles over a few key cities are believed to have left hundreds dead on both sides. Exact casualty figures could not be confirmed, but the International Red Cross estimated 800 were wounded over the past week.

Shire said more than 1,000 Islamists have been killed, including 300 foreigners.

After a three-hour battle Wednesday, Jowhar was seized by transitional government troops led by Mohammed Omar Habeb, also known as Mohammed Dhere, a warlord who was driven out of the city by Islamists this summer.

"We attack Mogadishu Thursday," Dhere told the town's residents after retaking the city. "We will catch and behead all the terrorists and militants, just as they behead innocent people."

Transitional government officials, who also have clashed with Dhere in the past, cautioned that he would not resume control of Johwar.

Later in the day, Islamists reportedly abandoned Kismayo as Ethiopians advanced. The World Food Program, a U.N. agency, was forced to suspend airlifts and food distributions to flood victims in the area, a spokesman said.

The spokesman of the Islamic courts, Sheik Mohammed Ibrahim Suley, downplayed Wednesday's setbacks.

"Our forces are coming back for tactical retreat," he said. "We are sure we will defeat the enemy and will seize the places we lost."

Islamist leaders are vowing to use guerrilla tactics, including suicide attacks, to defeat the larger, better-equipped Ethiopian military. "Our forces have mandate to ambush the enemy forces in every place," Suley said.

Analysts said such threats would not easily intimidate Ethiopia's military leaders, most of whom spent years fighting in the bush as rebels against a former dictatorship which they overthrew in 1991.

"This is a force that toppled the previous government through guerrilla warfare," said Amare Aregawi, editor of the pro-government newspaper The Reporter. "They are guerrilla-war specialists."

Ethiopian and transitional government leaders said their troops have been warmly greeted by Somalis, but some people in Mogadishu warned of a backlash if Ethiopian troops entered the capital.

"If they try to occupy the capital, there will be mass suicide attacks and terrorist acts," said Abdusamad Abdulkader, a fabric vendor.

Others said Islamists, who had been praised for restoring peace and order to southern Somalia, were quickly losing support among the people.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi promised Ethiopia would not keep its forces in Somalia or attempt to occupy its neighbor.

Experts say that raises questions about how Somalia's transitional government, with only about 10,000 soldiers, will be able to maintain control after Ethiopian troops go home.

Transitional government officials are scrambling to accelerate security recruitment and training programs and said they will attempt to rehabilitate former Islamist fighters. But United Nations or Africa Union peacekeepers likely will be needed, many believe.

"They will need substantial support from the international community," said Bereket Simon, an adviser to Meles. "The whole world should help Somalia stand on its own two feet."

War In The Horn Of Africa (NYT)

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

It is tempting to wink at Ethiopia's stunningly successful offensive in Somalia. It pushed back a hateful Islamic militia that was defying the United Nations, threatening to impose religious tyranny and, according to Washington, harboring international terrorists. The Bush administration quickly succumbed to temptation, lauding Ethiopia's attacks as a legitimate response to "aggression."

But if there's anything we should have learned over the past few sad years, it is that this kind of unilateral pre-emptive attack seldom solves anything, particularly when the country doing the invading is regarded as a longstanding enemy.

Somalia is a familiar kind of mess, with a weak official transitional government composed of a collection of regional clan leaders and warlords, pitted against radical Islamists who control their own militias, who have spread Taliban-like terror among the populace and who recently surrounded the seat of the transitional government at Baidoa.

To halt their advance, Ethiopia's armed forces crossed an international border and routed the Islamists, who retreated to their stronghold, Mogadishu, and have largely disappeared from public view.

It's hardly surprising that there was little international outcry. But while moderate forces in Somalia have been appalled by the brutal intolerance of Islamist leaders who have threatened to behead people for not praying five times a day, they are unlikely to embrace Ethiopian soldiers as a good alternative. Ethiopia and Somalia have long been rivals, and went to war in the late 1970s over a land dispute. If the transitional government seems propped up by foreign invaders, it would lose whatever popular support it has now.

The United States squandered its influence in Somalia by supporting some particularly horrible warlords to challenge the Islamist radicals. But it still has considerable sway over Ethiopia.

Washington should use that influence to push for a swift cessation of hostilities, lest the conflict pull in neighboring countries and explode over the entire region. The resulting chaos would create a refugee crisis and open a new terrorist recruiting hub. The Islamists have threatened suicide attacks and called for help from foreign fighters in a "holy war" that has already drawn thousands of Muslim fighters from Eritrea, Yemen, Libya and Syria.

The United Nations is unhappy about the Ethiopian incursion, but it needs to demonstrate that it has a good alternative. The Security Council must meet urgently to find ways to replace Ethiopian troops with a neutral international force and keep the violence from spreading to other countries.

Rather than trying to marginalize the Islamic militias and the huge clan they represent, the international community should try to harness this moment to push for unity talks while the Islamists are weak and the transitional government has attained a more equal standing.

The Somali Stakes (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

The armed conflicts that so often roil Africa rarely engage U.S. interests except in a humanitarian sense. But that cannot be said of the war that has now broken out between Ethiopia and the Islamists who seized control of much of Somalia in June. Here America's strategic interests are very much engaged, even if the actors in the fight range, morally speaking, from the unpalatable to the unacceptable.

Among the unpalatables is the increasingly autocratic Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister of 15 years, who has deployed as many as 20,000 troops in neighboring Somalia and may soon control its capital, Mogadishu. Mr. Zenawi claims to be acting on behalf of Somalia's internationally recognized but weak Transitional Federal Government (TFG), which was barely holding on in the regional city of Baidoa until Ethiopia's intervention.

The TFG is led by Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, another strongman-in-waiting whose resumé includes stints as president (first elected, later self-declared) of the breakaway northern Somali province of Puntland. Also in the anti-Islamist mix is the so-called Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism, a coalition of Somali warlords reportedly backed by the CIA with suitcases of cash on the theory they were more likely to keep the Islamists at bay than were the TFG.

On the opposite side are the Islamists, a.k.a. the Islamic Courts Union (ICU). Since wresting control over Mogadishu from the warlords, the ICU has managed to pacify parts of the country, which some might say is a net plus for Somalis. But its methods are reminiscent of the Taliban, which also brought a sort of peace to Afghanistan. The ICU threatens to behead anyone who fails to pray five times a day.

Among the ICU's leaders is one Hassan Dahir Aweys, previously of the Saudi-funded, al Qaeda-connected al-Itihaad al-Islamiya terrorist group. Mr. Aweys was named a terrorist by the U.S. as far back as 2001, and his outfit is thought to be connected to the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. The extent to which the Islamic Courts Union is assisting al Qaeda or its offshoots is a matter of dispute. But there's no doubt it is now recruiting jihadis from around the world to its cause.

Such are the opposing sides in this conflict, and it's clear that U.S. interests would be well-served by the ICU's collapse. Less clear is how to bring that about, how to do so without sparking a wider war, and how to bring some semblance of order to the country.

Eritrea, long at war with Ethiopia, has sent its own contingent of troops to aid the ICU, Saudi Arabia has pledged support, and al Qaeda bigwig Ayman al-Zawahiri has called Somalia "the southern garrison of Islam." While the ICU might easily be routed by Ethiopia in a conventional test of arms, it will be much more difficult to defeat as a guerrilla or terrorist force.

No outside powers are likely to risk a repeat of the disastrous U.N. mission to Somalia of the early 1990s. So probably the best the U.S. can do is give tacit support to Ethiopia's incursion while using its leverage with Mr. Zenawi to demand that he agree to the U.N. demarcated border with Eritrea. The U.S. provides Ethiopia with economic as well as substantial military assistance.

In return, the Eritreans might be persuaded to cease their support for the ICU. The U.S. could also condition material support for a future TFG government in Mogadishu on its recognition of the autonomy of Puntland and neighboring Somaliland, which adjoins U.S.-allied Djibouti and has been relatively free of ICU interference. As with the former Yugoslavia, addressing the problem that is Somalia might ultimately mean breaking up that large country into smaller bits.

There is a material limit to what the U.S. can do for East Africa, and expectations for what the region can and will do it for itself cannot be high. Still, the Ethiopian offensive against Islamic Courts is an act of regional hygiene that we can hope is able to contain radical Islam from spreading to a far larger swath of Africa.

Iran's Strong Ties With Syria Complicate U.S. Overtures (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria — Early next year, Syria's first domestically manufactured cars are scheduled to roll off an assembly line. They will have an Iranian name, be produced in a plant partly financed by a state-controlled Iranian car company and be made of parts from Iran.

Not long after that, Syria hopes to open two new multimillion-dollar wheat silos, add 1,200 new buses in Damascus, open another Iranian car factory in the north and start operating a cement plant — all in partnership with Iran. The two countries are also talking about building an oil refinery, opening a joint bank, constructing housing, developing electric generators and, someday, linking their rail systems through Iraq.

As the White House begins to rethink its strategy for dealing with the Middle East, particularly how to calm the chaos in Iraq, pressure to try to re-engage Syria has grown. Some Western analysts contend that Syria, with a government more pragmatic than ideological, can be pried away from Iran's influence and convinced that its long-term interests lie instead with the West.

But Washington has spent years trying to isolate Syria, while Iran has for decades moved to entwine itself with Syria on many levels — political, military, economic and religious.

Iran is a country of many power centers with different pools of money, from funds controlled by grand ayatollahs of Qum, to those in the hands of the Revolutionary Guards. They may not all be directed by the central government, but they all help promote Iranian influence in Syria.

As a result, some Western diplomats in Iran say that, even if the United States tried, it might be impossible to extricate Syria from Iran's orbit.

"Iranians have been working harder for longer than we realized," said a European diplomat based in Damascus who spoke on condition of anonymity to avoid antagonizing Syrian officials. "They have stronger links going back more years than we were aware of."

Syrian officials are extremely sensitive about the relationship with Iran. Part of the reason is fear of igniting sectarian tensions in Syria, which is about 80 percent Sunni Muslim. The president and his inner circle are from a minority Shiite sect, the Alawites, and Iran is Shiite.

While the Syrian power brokers have decided for practical reasons to align with Iran, political analysts in Syria say the government remains fearful of alienating the Sunni majority, especially amid widespread rumors that Iran is trying to convert Sunni Syrians to Shiism.

Concern among Sunnis is heightened because Syria is a major destination for Iranian religious tourists; as many as 500,000 a year visit Shiite sites in Syria. Iranian organizations have spent millions of dollars restoring, enlarging and maintaining Shiite shrines in Syria, from the center of Damascus, the capital, to the north, near the Turkish border.

Iran's efforts to spread its influence around the Middle East have increased in the last two or three years, regional analysts say. They have been propelled by rising oil prices and American policies in the region, which have neutralized Iran's enemies, Saddam Hussein in Iraq and the Taliban in Afghanistan.

"Iran has used this affluence of oil revenues over the last five or six years to play a beautiful game, from their perspective," said Osama T. Elansari, a director of the Dubai International Financial Exchange who lives in Syria.

Iran's efforts have often been most evident in Lebanon, where it has set up an informal economy in the south. It needs only to provide money to its proxy, Hezbollah, which has a construction arm, called Jihad al Bina, and a vast network of social services that dole out money and build schools and hospitals.

According to some estimates, Iran has spent tens of millions a month over the years in Lebanon. Riad Salameh, the governor of Lebanon's central bank, said he had no idea how much money Iran had sent into Lebanon because it had gone via Syria, not through the central bank.

"Iranians bring in money donations over the border," he said.

In Lebanon, after Israel and Hezbollah fought for 34 days over the summer, Iran quickly delivered generators, and fuel, to villages without power, and was credited with providing the $12,000 that Hezbollah gave to each family whose home had been destroyed.

Iran offered an open checkbook to repair anything not covered by other sources — including roads, mosques, schools and houses. While there is no guarantee Iran will deliver on that pledge, it is already way ahead in the battle for the hearts and minds of many Lebanese.

"The Zionist enemy destroys and the Islamic Republic of Iran rebuilds," read banners in front of restored schools in Lebanon.

In Syria, relations with Iran are more formal and less public, but no less consequential. Diplomats say, for example, that Iran has developed very close ties with Syrian intelligence, providing gear and training, and sharing listening posts to monitor Israel. Iran also has one of the largest embassies in Damascus, political analysts said, and has assigned an ambassador there who served for seven years as chief of staff to Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

The United States, by comparison, maintains economic sanctions on Syria and withdrew its ambassador in 2005 after the assassination of the former prime minister of Lebanon, Rafik Hariri. The highest-ranking American diplomat in Damascus, Michael H. Corbin, the deputy chief of mission, has little access to Syrian officials.

But Iran's economic relationship with Syria is far more complicated than that with Lebanon. The Syrian economy is still struggling to overcome decades of corrupt central control, and to attract foreign investment and create jobs. Iran, meanwhile, has shifted in the other direction.

Iran's investments are relatively modest in value: just $120 million a year, the Syrian government says. But current and planned projects are considered significant.

"Iran is moving in the direction of investing in Syria, and of course Syria won't say no," said Samir Seifan, a Syrian economist in Damascus. "For Iran, it's about business and about cementing political ties."

Iran's ambassador to Syria, Muhammad Hassan Akhtari, acknowledged that Iran had had trouble working in foreign markets. But he said the experience of the past 10 years — especially in Syria — had helped improve Iran's business practices. And he said that he was not worried that Syria would abandon Iran, or even try to alter relations with it.

"Syria remains very steady in their principles of foreign relations," he said. "If the West wants to do something, we think they have to change their attitude."

Iran To 'Revise' Any Relations With Monitors In Nuclear Area (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

DOJ_NMG_0109708

TEHRAN, Dec. 27 — By an overwhelming vote, Parliament passed a bill on Wednesday that could limit Iran's cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations monitor.

The measure was a response to the resolution passed Saturday by the Security Council, which imposed trade sanctions on goods and technology related to Iran's uranium enrichment and ballistic missile programs.

The Council's resolution is aimed at curbing those programs, which the United States and Europe contend are intended to make Iran a nuclear weapons state. Iran has repeatedly asserted that its development activities are for nuclear energy, not weapons.

The final draft of the bill in Parliament, approved after two days of debate, asserts that the government should "revise its cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency based on the interests of Iran and its people." The vote was 161 to 15, with 15 abstentions.

It is unclear what "revise its cooperation" means. But the measure was considered by some moderate members of Parliament to be less severe than earlier versions proposed by conservative members, who had wanted Iran to withdraw from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and ban all inspectors. The United Nations agency polices adherence to the nonproliferation of nuclear weapons.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who denounced the Security Council sanctions as a "superficial action," is expected to sign the bill.

Although Parliament is dominated by conservatives, there has been a debate among lawmakers about the country's nuclear policy under President Ahmadinejad, who has asserted that nuclear development is Iran's inalienable right.

Some minority reformists believe his policy is doing more harm than good by isolating Iran economically.

One reformist lawmaker, Nouredin Pirmoazen, said in a debate on the bill, "The best solution is to establish a bridge with other countries to reduce the tension."

Others said the bill could give the government a free hand to decide how to continue its relationship with the atomic energy agency. Alaedin Boroujerdi, the head of the foreign policy and national security commission, told journalists that the bill's vague language meant "the government can do anything based on what it recognizes is for the country's interests."

In a gesture that suggested that religious authorities are united behind the bill, the Guardian Council of Islamic clerics immediately approved it, a step that is required for any bill to become law. The Guardian Council has rarely approved a bill so swiftly.

Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, appointed a committee on Wednesday to examine how the country should "revise" its relations with the atomic energy agency. In a news conference later, Mr. Larijani said the Security Council resolution was aimed at "humiliating Iran." But he also said Iran wanted to continue its nuclear program based on international regulations.

Persian . . . Or Iranian? (WSJ)

By Roya Hakakian

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Holiday parties always seem to bring out the semi-inebriated men who find their way to my corner. There is, as expected, an opening line, which hardly ever leads to a conversation. But if it ever does, and if that conversation shows signs of vitality, even a dim glimmering of erudition, a rhetorical question is sure to follow. They lean into me and murmur: "Did you say you were Persian or Parisian?" They count on the tie, the long-stemmed wine glass, or the exalted titles on their name tags to make flirtation pass as ethnographical inquiry.

The "compliment" is clearly a profound insult: When an Iranian proves to be sophisticated, she no longer qualifies as Iranian. She is exchanged into a creature whose cultural currency is tangible for the Westerner. If unfamiliarity with Iran is less shallow than "My college classmate's father was the personal pilot for the Shah" (Royal Pilot number 1,654 and counting), or "Our local Eyeraynian serves great tandoori," then the real biases begin to emerge. The unveiled and urbane Iranian jars the Western mind. For the Anglophone, Iran's history begins in 1979, and the model for an authentic Iranian male is bearded, preferably turbaned and robed; and the female is submissive and veiled. Fist-throwing, frenzied behavior is a plus. The rest are simply the have-beens: exiles who are at best irrelevant, if not thoroughly out of touch. Non-Shiites need not apply.

But the Westerner is not entirely to blame. The country's presidential machinery is dedicated to convincing the world of just that. The main task of every ideology is to create identity, which is what Tehran's taskmaster-in-chief is attempting. With the symbolic Palestinian scarf around his neck in the land where public support for the Palestinian cause has been consistently diminishing, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's existential mission is to recast the ethos of being Iranian. In truth, he is peddling a pan-Islamism, by regional extension a pan-Arabism, for which neither Iranians nor Arabs have an appetite. As uranium is enriched, the Iranian identity is plundered. Mr. Ahmadinejad's numerous spectacles, most recently the Holocaust conference, are meant to bring a sense of transcultural and transethnic unity through a common political purpose. On the domestic scene, this is an old act -- a familiar blunder to annihilate Iranian nationalism, or to force it to become subordinate to the Muslim, with Arab undertones.

The effort began by Ayatollah Khomeini. He made no secret of his contempt for the non-Muslim dimensions of Iranian life. He injected Persian with so many Arabic words that it confounded the ordinary listener, something for which he compensated by repetitiveness. He did all but officially ban Nowrooz, the traditional Iranian new year with its roots in the pre-Islamic era, and refrained from delivering a traditional Nowrooz message in March 1979 (weeks after the victory of the revolution). But as popular as he was in those early days, the public's backlash against his stance on Nowrooz was so powerful that he, who rarely relented, eventually caved in. Since then, and especially as a result of the arduous Iran-Iraq war, patriotism has been on the rise. Pre-Islamic holidays are being celebrated with unprecedented fanfare. The Persian lexicon has turned into a bastion of nationalism. Numerous Persian synonyms have been invented to replace the most commonly used foreign words, primarily Arabic ones. To everyone's wonder, the new words have caught on.

Yet even the ayatollah was borrowing a page from history. The battle to define the Iranian identity, Muslim versus Persian, is an old one. Since the Arab conquest of the 7th century, Iranians have struggled to maintain their heritage through language and tradition. Though the nation fully embraced Islam, the religion of the conquerors, they made it uniquely their own by Persianizing it, which, to a great extent, marks the historical beginnings of Shiism. A leading Iranian philosopher argues that failure and loss have branded the Iranian psyche. The loss here refers to the loss of the Sassanian Persian army against the Arab Muslim army in the year 636 at Qadesiyyah -- a battle which Saddam Hussein often invoked as he unleashed his army into the Iranian territory.

The tension is also a tension between simplicity and complexity. The ruling elite wants to summarize Iran in a formula -- that of another outpost of Islamic fundamentalism, whereas Iranians have always been elusive. The best definition that a typical Iranian would most likely offer of herself is as a poem, which can only compound the enigma. But the poem serves, as poems often do, as an invitation to being recognized as complex, a notion that the Westerner allows and can easily grasp about his European counterparts. The Westerner knows not to reduce its own politics to a few eccentric leaders -- the U.S. to Jerry Falwell, the Netherlands to the late Pim Fortuyn, or France to Jean-Marie Le Pen. To reduce Iran to Mr. Ahmadinejad would be just as grave an aberration. In tangible terms, it means to scratch the nuclear surface to let the light of the other Iran shine through. It means to report the Holocaust conference along with the student demonstrations against Mr. Ahmadinejad within the same week, or the new grass-roots initiative by women to ban stoning, or the astonishing statistics released by Tehran's Office of Cultural Affairs showing a dramatic drop in the number of Iranians who pray daily.

Today, the Westerner can no longer afford to be a bystander to this historical tension. Be it policy makers or ordinary citizens, the decision on Iran will be, on some level, a vote in this ancient referendum. To choose one side or the other is a declaration of the Westerner's position on a pressing political issue; but it is also his proof of recovery from the colonial mindset. To have transcended colonial thinking is not to embrace the displays of fanaticism as manifestations of authenticity. It is to recognize all global citizens as equals, and as such as deserving of the indisputable rights enjoyed in the West.

Whatever happens to Iraq and the dream of creating a democracy in the Middle East, Iran is already going through pains of transition. Iranians are turning to the notion of civil society and moderation, not simply as political necessities, but also as ways to define themselves as distinct, and thus to pay contemporary tribute to a past that has, despite the centuries, remained a formative force in their present.

Mr. Hakakian, author of "Journey from the Land of No: A Girlhood Caught in Revolutionary Iran" (Crown, 2004), is writing a book about the assassination of Iranian Kurdish leaders.

Israeli Plan Draws U.S. Criticism (AP)

By Barry Schweid, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

In a rare criticism, the Bush administration said Wednesday if Israel proceeds with construction of a settlement on the West Bank it would violate its peacemaking obligations.

But defending its construction plan, a spokesman for the Israeli embassy said "the settlement is not a new one." It was legally established in 1982, housed an army unit and a school and has had civilians living there for several years, said spokesman David Siegel.

The plan is to build within the confines of the existing settlement, he said.

A State Department spokesman, Gonzalo R. Gallegos, said, "The U.S. calls on Israel to meet its roadmap obligations and avoid taking steps that could be viewed as predetermining the outcome of future negotiations,"

"The establishment of a new settlement or the expansion of any existing settlement would violate Israel's obligations under the roadmap," the U.S. official said.

Israel agreed to the roadmap in 2003. It was devised by the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia in an effort to guide Israel and the Palestinians into an agreement that establishes a Palestinian state.

No new settlement has been established on the West Bank in 10 years. The plan has drawn Palestinian and European expressions of concern.

The Bush administration rarely criticizes Israel's actions and has gained Israel's support for establishment of a Palestinian state.

Opponents of Mahmoud Abbas, the moderate president of the Palestinian Authority, have criticized his cooperation with Israel in trying to get peace talks started. They have accused him of yielding to a U.S.-Israeli approach.

Gallegos said, "We are seeking an explanation from the Israeli government regarding this development."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is expected to go to the Middle East next month to try to spur peacemaking between Israel and the Palestinians.

It was not clear whether she had approved the statement.

"We will continue to work with Israel and the Palestinians to encourage President Bush's vision of two states" living side by side in peace, Gallegos said.

The settlement plan, approved by Israeli defense minister Amir Peretz, calls for construction on the site of an Army base in the Jordan valley.

By contrast, Israel Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has endorsed Palestinian statehood and said he was agreeable to a large-scale Israel pullback on the West Bank to make way for a state.

Gallegos said the roadmap states "progress will require and depend upon the good-faith efforts of the parties."

U.S. Scolds Israel On Plan For West Bank Settlement (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 27 — In a rare public rebuke to Israel, the Bush administration said Wednesday that an Israeli plan to construct a Jewish settlement in the occupied West Bank for the first time in 10 years could violate the terms of an American-backed peace proposal.

“We are aware of reports about the Maskiot settlement,” said Gonzalo Gallegos, a State Department spokesman. “The establishment of a new settlement or the expansion of an existing settlement would violate Israel’s obligations under the road map.”

The road map is the shelved plan that is supposed to lead to peace between Israelis and Palestinians and the establishment of a Palestinian state. Under the plan, Israel is not supposed to build more settlements in the West Bank.

“The U.S. calls on Israel to meet its road map obligations and avoid taking steps that could be viewed as pre-determining the outcome of final-status negotiations,” Mr. Gallegos told reporters.

For the Bush administration, which has shied away from criticizing Israel, the rebuke was so unusual that State Department officials took pains to assure reporters that it represented official policy and had been cleared by senior members of the administration.

The criticism was made as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was expected to go to the Middle East early in 2007 to try to shore up support for Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president.

On Tuesday, Israel's Defense Ministry and settler groups announced plans for the construction of about 30 houses at Maskiot. Israeli officials said the settlement was not new, but a revival of a 1982 settlement, which had become a military training site by the mid-1990s.

"This was set up by the Israeli government nearly 25 years ago," said David Siegel, spokesman for the Israeli Embassy in Washington. "It's not a new settlement."

Israel essentially decided to stop building settlements in 1992 when Yitzhak Rabin became prime minister, although it has allowed settlements to grow, even as it has publicly promised to freeze settlement activity under the road map.

The road map calls for a freeze in settlement building in the first phase and a Palestinian push to dismantle terrorist groups. Israel says that the dismantling should come first and that it has not occurred. But Israel has separately promised the Bush administration that it will build only within existing settlement boundaries to account for natural growth, "thickening" the settlements but not expanding them physically.

The Israeli announcement has particularly confounded American diplomats because it appears to run counter to the prevailing effort by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who offered a series of gestures to the Palestinians several days ago, after meeting with Mr. Abbas.

Israel To Renew Attacks On Gaza Rocket Squads (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

The Israeli government on Wednesday ordered the military to resume targeting militants spotted firing rockets from the Gaza Strip but said its month-long ceasefire with the Palestinians would otherwise remain in force.

The government ended its policy of restraint in the face of ceasefire violations after one of eight rockets fired at Israel on Tuesday wounded two youths in the southern town of Sderot, one of them seriously.

A statement said the military was authorised to make pinpoint strikes against Palestinian rocket squads, apparently ruling out a wide-ranging response that would scupper the truce agreed in late November.

Ehud Olmert, prime minister, had been under pressure from inside and outside his cabinet to end the policy of restraint in the face of continuing rocket attacks, many of them claimed by the Islamic Jihad movement, which has no political role in the Palestinian Authority.

Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for a solitary rocket that landed outside Sderot on Wednesday as harsh weather conditions and low visibility limited the Israeli military's options.

Militant groups have justified continued rocket attacks as retaliation for Israeli operations in the West Bank, where top members of Islamic Jihad and the Fatah-linked Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades were seized in recent days.

Wednesday's government statement said Israel would continue its policy of liaising with Palestinian security officials as part of efforts to stem the rocket fire.

The ceasefire followed a big Israeli incursion into the Gaza Strip, the latest of a series of operations this year in which hundreds of Palestinians, many of them civilians, were killed, but which nevertheless failed to end the rocket attacks.

A month of relative calm opened the way for a recent summit meeting between Mr Olmert and Mahmoud Abbas, the PA president, at which the Israeli leader agreed to unfreeze $100m of Palestinian tax revenues, around one-sixth of the dues it has withheld since the Islamist Hamas movement came to power.

The concessions offered to Mr Abbas failed to stir much excitement in the Palestinian territories, where the summit had given rise to hopes that Israel might be ready to release large numbers of detainees and substantially ease restrictions on Palestinian movement.

Mr Abbas has established a committee to negotiate prisoner releases but its prospects are limited until Palestinian militants free Gilad Shalit, an Israeli soldier abducted in June.

Ahmed Aboul Gheit, visiting foreign minister of Egypt, which is closely involved in co-ordinating security in Gaza, yesterday said Egypt was working for Corporal Shalit's release.

Mr Olmert told Mr Abbas at the weekend that Israel would remove up to 27 of several hundred military checkpoints in the West Bank.

Israel Says It Will Retaliate Against Rockets From Gaza (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 27 — A day after two teenage boys were badly wounded by a rocket fired from Gaza, Israel ordered the military on Wednesday to resume attacks on Palestinians firing such rockets.

The order was issued a month after a cease-fire was declared between Israel and Palestinians in Gaza. The Palestinians promised to stop rocket fire on Nov. 26, and the Israelis promised not to carry out military activities inside Gaza.

But as of Wednesday night, according to the Israeli Army, 66 rockets had been launched toward Israel since then and 52 had landed there. The ruling militant group Hamas said it was respecting the cease-fire but was doing nothing to stop other militant groups, like Islamic Jihad and Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, which is linked to Fatah, Hamas's rival.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel, encouraged by the United States to support the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and to restart talks with the Palestinians, had ordered the military not to respond, but political pressure to do so was growing. Mr. Olmert was being criticized from the left by his own defense minister, Amir Peretz of the Labor Party, and from the right by Benjamin Netanyahu, the leader of Likud.

That pressure heightened overnight, when a Qassam rocket launched by Islamic Jihad hit two 14-year-old boys walking home in Sderot, an Israeli border town. The youths were taken to a hospital in Ashkelon. One, Adir Ghasad, was in critical but stable condition, peppered with shrapnel, the hospital said; the other, Matan Cohen, was in serious condition. Matan had been injured once before by Qassam shrapnel, his friends told Israeli news media.

So on Wednesday morning Mr. Olmert ordered the military, including the air force, to resume action against those firing the rockets. The military will be permitted to strike before, while or after rockets are launched.

The military will not, however, be allowed to fire shells into open areas near the border to deter rocket-launching teams from entering them. Errant Israeli shells, usually from tanks or artillery, have in the past hit houses and other populated areas, killing uninvolved civilians. Nor will the air force be allowed to bomb weapons caches or individuals not involved in rocket firing.

Mr. Olmert said in a statement that otherwise, "Israel will continue to maintain the cease-fire and work with the Palestinian Authority so that immediate steps are taken to halt the Qassam firings."

The cease-fire was intended to break the cycle of violence, but Palestinian rocket fire continued intermittently. Islamic Jihad and Al Aksa — which supposedly is loyal to Mr. Abbas, who has opposed the rocket fire as counterproductive — say they are responding to Israeli military actions in the occupied West Bank, an area not part of the truce.

Mr. Abbas had said that he had the agreement of all Palestinian factions for the cease-fire, but Islamic Jihad, largely directed by Iran, has never respected such an agreement, and on Wednesday threatened to increase the rocket fire.

The Hamas government spokesman, Ghazi Hamad, criticized the Israeli decision as aggression, but he added, "We still believe this agreement is alive, and both sides should respect this agreement because it is in the interest of our people."

A Labor Party minister and former defense minister, Benjamin Eliezer, told Israel Radio: "We cannot restrain ourselves anymore. It's good that we did, because the entire world saw that we did above and beyond, but we cannot turn an entire town into a graveyard."

Mr. Netanyahu called on the government to take over northern Gaza and occupy the areas from which rockets are fired and to take control over the border of Gaza with Egypt to stop arms smuggling.

The Egyptian foreign minister, Ahmed Aboul Gheit, was in a snowy Jerusalem on Wednesday preparing for a summit meeting on Jan. 4 in Sharm el-Sheik, an Egyptian Red Sea resort, between Mr. Olmert and President Hosni Mubarak.

DOJ_NMG_0109713

Egypt has been trying to advance talks with the Palestinians and to secure the release of an Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was captured in June, in return for more than 1,000 Palestinians in Israeli jails.

"We oppose the Qassam attacks on Israel," Mr. Aboul Gheit said. "We hope that Israel will continue to show restraint. We need to continue with the peace process because that is the way to progress."

Mr. Abbas was in Cairo on Wednesday, where he met with Mr. Mubarak.

He said after the meeting that when he met with Mr. Olmert on Saturday night, he proposed what he described as backdoor meetings with Mr. Olmert, The Associated Press reported.

"It is the right time to talk," Mr. Abbas told reporters. "We have the idea of a backdoor channel between us and the Israelis, with the participation of one or all members of the quartet to discuss all the issues of the final status," he said. The quartet members are the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations, which oversee the peace efforts.

Israel Threatens To Renew Attacks (AP)

By Josef Federman, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

After weeks of restraint, Israel said Wednesday that it will renew attacks on rocket-launching militants in the Gaza Strip, threatening to derail an already shaky, month-old truce.

A new round of fighting in Gaza could undermine Israel's efforts to bolster the moderate Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, in his standoff with the Islamic militants of Hamas who control the Palestinian government and legislature.

The Israeli decision, made at a meeting of top officials, came hours after a Palestinian rocket seriously wounded two Israeli teenage boys in the southern town of Sderot, next to Gaza.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office said Israeli retaliation would be limited to "pinpoint" operations meant to foil rocket launches. "At the same time, Israel will continue to abide by the cease-fire," the statement said.

The truce was reached Nov. 26, ending five months of deadly fighting in Gaza. But since the cease-fire declaration, more than 60 rockets have been fired at Israel, the army said.

Israel has so far refrained from responding, but Olmert had warned in recent days his patience was wearing thin. The wounding of the two boys late Tuesday increased pressure on Olmert from political opponents and members of his Cabinet to take action.

Hamas government spokeswoman Ghazi Hamad denounced the Israeli decision to "continue their aggression against our people," but added: "We still believe that this agreement is alive, and both sides should respect this agreement because it is (in) the interest (of) our people."

Hamad's comments were directed not only at Israel, but also at the rival militant group Islamic Jihad, which has been responsible for most of the rocket fire. After the Israeli threat of retaliation, Islamic Jihad fired another rocket. There were no reports of damage or injuries.

The fate of the truce appeared to lie in the hands of Islamic Jihad, a tiny Iranian-backed group that wants to destroy Israel and replace it with an Islamic state. Over the past two years, Islamic Jihad has repeatedly sabotaged efforts to halt violence, firing rockets and carrying out a string of suicide bombings.

Islamic Jihad officials said the rocket fire was meant to avenge Israeli arrest raids in the West Bank, which is not covered by the truce. The group also believes that igniting conflict with Israel will help unite Palestinians after a bitter round of infighting that has killed 17 people this month.

"That's one of the main reasons for resuming attacks," said Abu Ahmad, a spokesman for the group.

The infighting has pitted Hamas, which also rejects Israel's existence, against Abbas' more moderate Fatah. Hamas, which won legislative elections early this year, controls most government functions. Abbas, who was elected in a separate presidential vote, hopes to restart peace talks with Israel.

Israel's threats of retaliation could harm its recent efforts to bolster Abbas in his standoff with Hamas. After meeting the Palestinian leader last weekend, Olmert agreed to release $100 million in frozen Palestinian tax money and to ease travel restrictions on Palestinians in the West Bank as goodwill gestures.

DOJ_NMG_0109714

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said limited military strikes in Gaza should not lead to widespread conflict.

"As long as operations are prudent and pinpointed, there is no reason for things to deteriorate," Livni said at a news conference with visiting Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit.

Aboul Gheit, in Jerusalem to prepare for a Jan. 4 summit between Olmert and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, urged Israel to show restraint. "We need to continue with the peace process because that is the way to progress," he said.

In Egypt, Abbas said he had proposed opening secret "backdoor" peace negotiations with Israel.

"It is the right time to talk about this issue seriously," Abbas told reporters after he talked with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Abbas said he raised the issue with Olmert last weekend, and the Israeli leader promised to consider it.

There was no immediate Israeli reaction.

The endangered truce in Gaza ended five months of fighting that erupted after Hamas-linked gunmen tunneled into Israel, killed two soldiers and captured a third. Egypt, which frequently mediates between Israel and the Palestinians, has been trying to negotiate the release of the soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit.

At Wednesday's news conference, Aboul Gheit said that "we are sure that he is still alive."

Shalit has not been seen or heard from since he was captured, though Israeli officials have said they believe the soldier is alive.

"What he said is nothing new," Noam Shalit, the soldier's father, told The Associated Press. "I hope there is more behind it ... I wish we could know more."

Abbas Proposes Closed Talks With Israel (AP)

By Salah Nasrawi, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas proposed Wednesday that he start closed-door talks with Israel on some of their most difficult disputes including the status of Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees.

"It is the right time to talk," Abbas told reporters after he met with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

Recent weeks have seen a growing momentum toward reviving Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert met Abbas on Saturday, and Olmert is expected to meet Mubarak next week at an Egyptian Red Sea resort. The bipartisan panel on Iraq headed by former U.S. Secretary of State James A. Baker III said progress on the Israeli-Palestinian dispute could help ease tensions in Iraq.

Egypt, the first Arab country to make peace with Israel, has hosted several rounds of talks among rival Palestinian factions over the years. It has been working to broker a deal between the Jewish state and Hamas for the release of an Israeli soldier captured in June by militants affiliated to the group.

Olmert said last week that he would consider releasing some of the thousands of Palestinian prisoners held by Israel before Cpl. Gilad Shalit is freed.

Abbas did not spell out why he was proposing that the negotiations with Israel be "backdoor." But as one of the architects of the 1993 Oslo peace accord between Israel and the Palestinians, he is known to champion quiet, informal diplomacy.

"We have the idea of a backdoor channel between us and the Israelis, with the participation of one or all members of the Quartet to discuss all the issues of the final status," Abbas said, referring to the Western powers — the United States, Russia, European Union and the United Nations — that oversee the peace process.

Abbas said he proposed backdoor negotiations to Olmert at their weekend meeting, and that the Israeli leader promised to consider the suggestion. He also said he planned to discuss the idea with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice when she comes to the Middle East next month.

Abbas made clear he wanted the talks to focus on the issues that have been the hardest to resolve in previous negotiations.

Those issues are the future of Palestinian refugees, the sovereignty of Jerusalem — which both Israelis and Palestinians claim as their capital — and the borders of the future Palestinian state.

DOJ_NMG_0109715

It is not certain that Olmert would agree to tackle the thorniest issues rather than proceed cautiously with step-by-step negotiations and interim agreements. It is also unclear how the Palestinian government would view the results of backdoor talks with Israel by Abbas, who is in the opposition.

Hamas, which refuses to recognize Israel, is believed to favor a limited truce with the Jewish state in exchange for its complete withdrawal from the West Bank and east Jerusalem. Olmert is under pressure from hard-line Israelis opposed to withdrawing from the West Bank.

In a rare criticism, the Bush administration said Wednesday that if Israel proceeds with construction of a new settlement on the West Bank it would violate its peacemaking obligations.

A spokesman David Siegel, a spokesman for the Israeli embassy, said that the planned construction would take place within the confines of an existing, 25-year-old settlement.

Olmert is expected to meet Mubarak in the Red Sea resort of Sharm el-Sheik on Jan. 4, Olmert's office said Wednesday. Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit met Israeli officials in Jerusalem on Wednesday to prepare for the summit.

Egypt has been trying to negotiate the release of an Israeli soldier whose capture by Hezbollah militants touched off the summer war in Lebanon.

A spokesman for President Mubarak, Suleiman Awad, told reporters Wednesday that the Egyptian leader had written to President Bush urging him to take advantage of the current climate to revive Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Tangled Finances: Hezbollah Fund-Raiser's Mission: Money For Bullets And Loans (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

As Israeli Planes Bomb Offices Microcredit Czar Endures;| U.S. Brands Him a Terrorist Mixing Violence and Virtue

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- Hussein al-Shami, custodian of cash for the Islamist militant group Hezbollah, has had a rough few months.

During Hezbollah's 33-day war with Israel this summer, Israeli warplanes obliterated the 10-story Beirut apartment building where Mr. Shami had lived with his family. They also targeted a credit agency he runs for Hezbollah. All but one of its nine branches were destroyed, he says. Then in September, the U.S. Treasury Department named him as a "Specially Designated Global Terrorist."

Now he's back at work in the Lebanese capital, pursuing his intermingled missions. He's shepherding funds for Hezbollah, which the U.S. brands a terrorist group. He's also running an enterprise that the U.S. normally supports: making microloans to nurture a culture of self-help capitalism.

Mr. Shami and U.S. officials agree on little -- not even the year of his birth, which he says is 1952 while the U.S. terrorist-designation notice puts it variously at 1948, 1954 and 1960. His activities confound U.S. efforts to strictly divide players in the Middle East into realms of good and evil, and his success helps explain the resilience of Islamist groups that mix violence and virtue.

America and Israel see Mr. Shami as a grave menace for his role in minding Hezbollah finances. They blame the Islamist group, an armed militia that also provides health care and other services, for terrorist attacks including the 1983 Beirut bombings of the U.S. Embassy and a Marine Corps barracks. Today, Hezbollah, emboldened by what it calls a "divine victory" over Israel this summer, is flexing its political muscle with a campaign to topple Lebanon's U.S.-backed government. One major fund-raising group Mr. Shami has helped run, the Islamic Resistance Support Organization, has mounted past appeals to support Hezbollah's armed combat.

Mr. Shami, speaking near the bombed-out ruins of his credit agency's headquarters, fumes against "Zionist aggression" and ridicules U.S. efforts in the region. He talks proudly of his role in setting up a "martyr's fund" to support the families of dead Hezbollah militants. At his side in a makeshift Hezbollah office is the group's flag, emblazoned with a green Kalashnikov rifle.

But Mr. Shami, holder of a graduate degree in business administration and father of five, also boasts of service to a more peaceable cause. Last year he provided financing to more than 26,000 clients through Hezbollah's credit agency, Al-Qard Al-Hassan Association, Lebanon's largest maker of tiny loans. "We should be encouraged, not cut to pieces," he says.

The loans averaged $865 last year, largely made to Shiite Muslims who support Hezbollah. Customers include people starting businesses, such as car body-repair shops and hairdressing salons, and homemakers buying furniture or paying school fees. The maximum loan was $1,500, but with gold or gold jewelry given as security, the ceiling went up to $3,000.

Washington has long identified economic development as the best cure for political extremism. It has financed its own microcredit agencies in Lebanon to do much the same work as Mr. Shami's. But they charge interest, and have far fewer customers. Mr. Shami's outfit follows the rules of Islamic finance, which proscribes interest and charges service fees instead.

Until war erupted in July, Washington hailed Lebanon as a beacon for its vision of the "new Middle East" -- a region committed to democracy, aligned with the West and eager to root out militant groups. Today, the country is a showcase for the growing clout of forces that America wants eclipsed: Hezbollah, Iran and Syria. Lebanon's government, headed by former banker Fuad Siniora, teeters under pressure from Hezbollah, which has organized a series of peaceful massive demonstrations. Pro-American ministers, fearful of assassination after one of their number was murdered last month, mostly work, eat and sleep in a fortresslike stone building ringed with razor wire and heavily armed troops.

Mr. Shami, meanwhile, moves easily around town in a white Ford Explorer sport-utility vehicle. He says he's "comfortable that America's project for the region will fail." He has set up small temporary offices to replace the destroyed branch network, and his 100-strong staff has contacted clients to assure them that the gold jewelry and other valuables deposited as collateral for their small loans are safe. Account details, stored on computers, all survived, he says.

Squeezing the finances of extremist groups has been a key front in America's "war on terror" since al Qaeda's 2001 attacks on New York and Washington. The U.S. crackdown initially focused on Osama bin Laden's network but has struck hard in recent months at Hezbollah. In addition to branding Mr. Shami a terrorist in September, the Treasury Department has targeted an Iranian state bank it says channeled funds to Hezbollah and a host of organizations and companies, including three Lebanese entities linked to Mr. Shami.

Washington argues that all Hezbollah-related money must be stopped, whether it is used to buy weapons, fund microcredits or run the group's network of clinics, schools and other services. "We don't buy into the frame of mind that you can distinguish between the military and social arms," says Pat O'Brien, assistant Treasury secretary for terrorist financing. "Money is fungible."

The U.S. approach carries a risk: It has strengthened the view of Hezbollah's supporters, many of whom come from Lebanon's most-impoverished areas, that America wants to keep them poor, not fight terrorism. Even Hezbollah's rivals say the U.S. strategy plays into the hands of Islamist propagandists, who blame America and Israel for economic and other woes.

"It's stupid and it doesn't work," says Ahmad Fatfat, one of Hezbollah's fiercest foes in Lebanon's beleaguered pro-American cabinet. A former interior minister, Mr. Fatfat says clamping down on Hezbollah's finances may disrupt its social services but won't limit its military capabilities. Hezbollah, say Mr. Fatfat and others, generally gets its rockets and other weapons free from Iran and Syria. Moreover, he says, Hezbollah's money "comes in suitcases, not through banks."

The crackdown has made little visible impact so far on Hezbollah's ability to find cash. Soon after the war ended in August, the group began handing out wads of dollars to people whose homes had been bombed. Estimates based on Hezbollah statements put the value of the handouts at roughly $180 million. Lebanese officials say the money was probably carried by hand from Iran via Syria. Mr. Shami says the cash came from the Imam Reza Foundation, a wealthy Iranian organization that controls a revered Shiite shrine and has vast business holdings.

The sole surviving original branch of Mr. Shami's credit agency is located in a mixed Sunni and Shiite area of west Beirut. Business is brisk, with a stream of customers, mostly women, arriving to make payments on their loans. A picture of Iran's late Ayatollah Khomeini hangs on the wall. On a marble counter are two boxes for donations for other organizations. One is for the Imam Khomeini Relief Committee, originally an Iranian charity now with huge welfare operations in Lebanon.

The second is for the Islamic Resistance Support Organization, the main Hezbollah fund-raising arm that Mr. Shami has helped run. It was blacklisted by the Treasury Department in August, after the war, for aiding terrorism. Its Web site and some of its leaflets have appealed for funds for ammunition. The Treasury Department also says they've solicited for money for weapons, including rockets.

Amal Dbouk, a 35-year-old housewife, said she came to the credit agency to pay off part of $1,000 she had borrowed to cover school fees for two of her three children. Abir Mansara, 27, a self-employed hairdresser, said she needed money to buy hair dye and cover other costs. She's taken out two loans, depositing three gold bracelets, a necklace and a gold ring as collateral.

Lebanon's mainstream banks, the two women say, would never give them loans. Both support Hezbollah and both took part in the recent street demonstrations against Lebanon's American-backed government. Ms. Mansara says she adores Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah, comparing him to a "rock star." "He fights for his country and fights for us," she says. Ms. Dbouk complains that America helps only Israel. "Hezbollah," she says, "helps us."

Hezbollah has all along mingled charity with violence. When Israel invaded Lebanon in 1982 at the start of what became an 18-year occupation, previously weak Islamist forces merged to form Hezbollah, or the Party of God, mobilizing both military resistance and welfare work. The Israeli assault uprooted the secular Palestine Liberation Organization, which had used Lebanon to launch attacks against Israel. Hezbollah, fired by Shiite zeal, filled the void.

A turning point came in 1983 in Mr. Shami's hometown of Nabatiyeh. A riot broke out when an Israeli military convoy drove into a crowd commemorating Shiite Islam's most sacred festival. The incident inflamed religious passions -- and helped set in motion a Shiite resurgence that is now shaking Lebanon, Iraq and the whole Middle East. That same year, more than 300 people were killed in the Beirut bombings of the U.S. Embassy and Marine Corps barracks, America's biggest loss of life to terrorism until 2001. Hezbollah denies carrying out the attacks but nonetheless hailed the slaughter.

Working at the time as a manager in a refrigerator company, Mr. Shami joined Hezbollah. He got to know Mr. Nasrallah, who then was a newcomer to the group, and took charge of its social services, which grew in tandem with its military wing. An early concern, he says, was to ensure that Lebanon's large Shiite population avoided becoming "hostages to aid" like Palestinian refugees, who lived off humanitarian handouts in camps around Lebanon.

Calculating that loans would "force people to be productive, to work," he set up a tiny credit agency in his Beirut apartment. "People in the West don't think people in the East have a vision, or are capable of looking ahead," he says. "But people in Lebanon make plans."

The microlender gave 150 loans its first year, says Mr. Shami, who at the time sat on Hezbollah's governing council. In 1985 the credit agency moved to a rented office in Harat Hreik, a squalid Beirut suburb flooded with Shiite refugees from the south. The agency, he says, was initially called Bayt al-Mal, an Arabic term that means "House of Money." It was registered with Lebanon's Interior Ministry in 1987 as Al-Qard Al-Hassan Association, or "The Good Loan Association" -- in other words, conforming to Islamic rules.

Microfinance has since become celebrated as a tool for poverty relief in developing countries. An early pioneer in Bangladesh, Muhammad Yunus, recently was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

In the 1980s, Mr. Shami also set up associations to aid the war effort against Israel and to cement loyalties to Hezbollah. Among these was the Martyr's Foundation, which provided money to the widows and children of suicide bombers and others killed fighting Israel's occupation. It mimicked an Iranian organization set up during Iran's 1980-88 war with Iraq.

U.S. and Israeli officials today describe the Martyr's Foundation as one of the conduits used by Iran to send money to Hezbollah. Some of it, they say, has been funneled through Iran's state-owned Bank Saderat. In September the Treasury Department ordered the bank cut off from all access to the U.S. financial system, saying Saderat had made $50 million in payments to Hezbollah since 2001. Iranian officials say Bank Saderat hasn't transferred money to Hezbollah.

Mr. Shami says Hezbollah gets most of its donations directly from its own fund-raising efforts. Public anger at Israel is so strong that even Mr. Fatfat, the politician opposed to Hezbollah, says he's donated to "resistance" social causes in the past. A Hezbollah activist and others familiar with the organization say Mr. Shami still runs the main fund-raising arm, the Islamic Resistance Support Organization. Mr. Shami says he is just a financial consultant to Hezbollah.

The support organization's methods can often elude U.S.-led efforts to stem the flow of cash. By cart, bicycle or car, volunteers transport a fleet of mobile donation boxes, each fitted with a yellow Hezbollah flag. The group also raises money through Hezbollah's television station, al-Manar. During the July-August war with Israel, al-Manar solicited funds by directing donors to specific bank accounts and cellphone contact numbers.

The general manager of one bank to which the broadcast directed donations, Mounir Karam of MEAB SAL, placed advertisements in Lebanese newspapers to deny any link to Hezbollah, but an American bank that gave MEAB access to U.S. dollars severed its ties. "What can I do, sue Hezbollah?" asks Mr. Karam. Hezbollah activists answering several of the phone numbers this month said the group is no longer taking direct bank deposits, and instead asked for checks to be made out to a courier who would pick them up, rather than to the organization.

Before the Israeli airstrikes this summer, Mr. Shami worked from a huge office in the headquarters of Al-Qard Al-Hassan Association, which occupied three stories in a building opposite his apartment block in Harat Hreik, Hezbollah's principal stronghold in southern Beirut. Unlike leaders of Hezbollah's military wing, who shun outsiders, Mr. Shami has for years received visitors from outside the Islamist orbit.

The operations manager of his biggest U.S.-funded rival, Ameen, met with Mr. Shami to try to satisfy his curiosity about his business. Judith Palmer Harik, an American academic who has lived in Lebanon since the late 1970s and has written a book about Hezbollah, says she first met Mr. Shami in the early 1990s, when he was running the group's social services. "I expected another mullah-type with a big beard" and found a "businessman up to his ears in projects," she says. She recalls pushing through a throng of people seeking Mr. Shami's help with "clogged drains, rain damage, medical prescriptions.... All the stuff that a government is supposed to handle, he was doing."

In 2000, Mr. Shami got a visit from Imad Hamzé, a Lebanese-Canadian expert in microfinance who had been commissioned to write a report for the United Nations on credit and poverty reduction. Mr. Shami, he says, outlined ambitious expansion plans, which included a proposed branch in a mostly Christian area.

Mr. Hamzé's report described Mr. Shami's operation as "a very creditable organization" comprising then two groups: the Al-Qard Al-Hassan Association credit agency, and a sister outfit called Yousser for Finance and Investment, which the report says was established in 1990 to "serve entrepreneurs with microenterprises or investment ideas." These two entities, together with an accounting center and research branch, were collectively known as Bayt al-Mal, the report said.

In its September terrorist designation of Mr. Shami, the Treasury Department named both Yousser and Bayt al-Mal as terrorist fronts. They were functioning as Hezbollah's "unofficial treasury, holding and investing its assets and serving as intermediaries between the terrorist group and mainstream banks," said Stuart Levey, undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, in a statement at the time. Treasury didn't designate Al-Qard Al-Hassan Association as terrorist, but a list of seven locations it gave for Bayt al-Mal matches six of the eight credit-agency branches destroyed by Israel.

Mr. Shami said Yousser closed amid problems with partners, but declined to give details. A senior Lebanese central bank official said he believed Yousser wound down after 2001 because partner banks feared retribution from the U.S. for working with a Hezbollah outfit. Several people who have worked with Yousser say it did handle investments and work with mainstream banks in the 1990s before it shut down.

The owner of a children's-clothing store in the southern port city of Tyre, for example, says he set up his business in 1999 with a loan from Yousser, which he said worked with local banks to provide credit. The Tyre businessman, who identified himself as Abu Ali Hassan, 39, said Yousser also provided him with a checkbook issued by a licensed Lebanese bank but bearing Yousser's name.

When Israeli ground troops attacked Bint Jbeil and other parts of southern Lebanon this summer, they seized documents related to Yousser and Hezbollah's financing. A document written in Arabic bearing Yousser's name in English and seen by The Wall Street Journal was described by an Israeli security expert as a recent receipt for a donation to Hezbollah. Israeli officials say Mr. Shami's branches were targeted in an effort to cripple Hezbollah's finances.

Mr. Shami jokes that he's "flattered" by all the attention but derides what he says is faulty intelligence about his activities. The Treasury declined to detail evidence against Bayt al-Mal and Yousser, saying the information is classified.

13 Acquitted In Attack On U.S. Troops (AP)

AP, December 28, 2006

Thirteen villagers were acquitted Wednesday of attacking U.S. troops with stones and eggs after an errant U.S. Tomahawk missile fell near their village three years ago.

The Turkish court ruled the villagers' actions did not constitute a crime. Defense lawyer Seyhmus Ulek said the incident was "a democratic reaction against American soldiers."

Some 75 villagers from the southeastern town of Sanliurfa hurled eggs and stones at a group of about a dozen U.S. soldiers going to retrieve pieces of Navy-fired missile, which was intended for Iraq but crashed into an empty Turkish field in March 2003.

The villagers broke the windows of four Humvees and injured one soldier, a spokesman for U.S. forces in Turkey said at the time.

The Tomahawk missile was the third U.S.-fired missile to crash into Turkey that week.

Tomahawk missiles are fired from warships and submarines and have a range of nearly 1,000 miles. The soldiers who went to retrieve the missile came from Incirlik Air Force Base, a major base in southern Turkey that had been used by the U.S. to launch operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The United States and Turkey are traditionally close allies and field the two largest armies in the NATO military alliance.

Al Qaeda Threat Chases Tourists From India Sites (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Israeli backpackers in India are heeding a government warning of an al Qaeda terrorist attack over the New Year's holiday on beach resorts and rave parties in the state of Goa.

The two-week-old warning from Israel's Headquarters for the War on Terror has raised concern that al Qaeda wants to repeat the 2002 bombing in the Indonesian resort island of Bali that killed 202 persons, most of them Australian tourists.

It also marked the first time Israel's counterterrorism authorities warned of a "concrete threat" of an al Qaeda attack in India.

"Travelers in Goa are under a severe terror threat of al Qaeda attacks," the agency warned, and recommended staying away from popular sites in Goa frequented by Western tourists.

Every New Year's Day, Goa is flooded with thousands of Israeli tourists attracted by the stunning beaches and electronic-music dance parties. The warning sent hundreds of 20-something Israeli travelers headed south or inland from the villages where they usually can be found.

"Many people in this area have picked up and gone southward," said Manoach Shmeltz, who operates a government-supported backpacker center in Goa. "They are already planning to come back on January 2."

As many as 30,000 Israelis a year obtain entry visas for India, making the country one of the most heavily visited locations for Israeli tourists. With a reputation dating to the 1960s for attracting bohemian travelers, Goa's New Year's Eve raves are a big draw for Israeli backpackers.

Indian defense and police officials rejected the warning.

"We have not received any specific threat or intelligence on such a threat either from New Delhi or any international agency," Goa state police Chief B.S. Brar told Agence France-Presse in the state capital, Panaji. "Goa is one of the safest places in the world."

An official at the Indian Embassy in Tel Aviv declined to comment.

It's not the first time Israel's counterterrorism authority has warned travelers abroad about the locations frequented by large numbers of Israelis. In the past, Israeli tourists have been warned not to go to Egypt's Sinai Peninsula or to tourist spots in Turkey. Both locations are known for attracting droves of Israelis.

In April, the warning proved correct and bombers thought to be linked to al Qaeda detonated explosives at the Sinai town of Dahab, which is popular with Israelis, killing 23 persons, most of them Egyptians.

In November 2002, al Qaeda tried to shoot down an Israeli plane taking off from Nairobi, Kenya.

Sudan Raises Doubts On U.N. Peace Effort (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0109720

Sudan raised new questions Wednesday about its commitment to a U.N. peace effort in the violence-wracked Darfur region as its ambassador ruled out any U.N. peacekeeping troops — an element of the world body's proposal.

The surprise statement came just minutes after the U.N. Security Council announced that it welcomed the Sudanese president's acceptance of the U.N. plan to help end the escalating conflict — a plan that includes deployment of a "hybrid" African Union-United Nations force.

Secretary-General Kofi Annan had told Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir in a letter earlier this month that every effort would be made to find African troops for a hybrid force of 17,300 military personnel and 5,300 police, but if that proved impossible the U.N. would use "a broader pool of troop contributing countries."

But Sudan Ambassador Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem told reporters on Wednesday evening that the hybrid force must be smaller and have no U.N. peacekeepers, only U.N. technical and logistical experts supporting African troops.

"The force is African, the leader is an African," he said. "There is support and logistical support staff by the U.N., wearing their own helmets, but they are not going to engage in peacekeeping activities."

The U.N. is seeking its own force for Darfur because African Union peacekeepers currently in the region have been unable to quell nearly four years of fighting which has killed more than 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million in the region.

Fighting began in February 2003 when rebels from black African tribes took up arms, complaining of discrimination and oppression by Sudan's Arab-dominated government. The government is accused of unleashing Arab tribal militia known as the Janjaweed against civilians in a campaign of murder, rape and arson — a charge the government denies.

The envoy's comments came as a surprise because al-Bashir said in a letter to Annan released Tuesday and discussed by the council on Wednesday that Sudan is ready "to start immediately" to implement two recent agreements that endorsed the three-step U.N. plan to beef up the beleaguered 7,000-strong African Union force in Darfur.

Annan emerged from Wednesday's council meeting telling reporters that "the president has accepted the three-phased approach as a package," and that council members "are encouraged by the positive tone" of al-Bashir's letter.

In a press statement later, the council welcomed al-Bashir's letter in which he reconfirmed his commitment to peace efforts approved in recent international meetings in Ethiopia and Nigeria.

Annan told reporters the first phase of the U.N. package was already being implemented "and we're going to accelerate that — and, of course, that's a way of testing the government's willingness to cooperate."

It would add 105 military officers, 33 U.N. police, 48 international staffers, 36 armored personnel carriers to the African Union force, according to a U.N. report last month.

A second, larger support package would include the deployment of several hundred U.N. military, police and civilian personnel to the African Union mission. The third phase is the deployment of the hybrid force.

Abdalhaleem said that under the Darfur Peace Agreement the government and one rebel group signed in May, a 20,000-strong force from the government and former rebels will be created. That force plus 7,000 troops from the AU will provide "an overwhelming number" that can ensure security, he said.

In Khartoum, the Sudanese government confirmed it was permitting the first U.N. experts to head to Darfur. But the numbers it gave were lower than those mentioned by the U.N.

Sadeq Al-Magli, a Foreign Ministry spokesman, said 18 military experts and 20 policemen would soon head to Al Fasher, capital of North Darfur.

Annan Says Sudan's Overture Could Pave Way For Peacekeepers (NYT)

By Elissa Gootman

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 27 — Secretary General Kofi Annan said Wednesday that the Security Council was "encouraged" that a recent message from the Sudanese government could pave the way for a large-scale peacekeeping operation in the country's war-ravaged Darfur region.

DOJ_NMG_0109721

But Mr. Annan noted that some diplomats remained skeptical of Sudan's overtures, and he urged the Security Council to press ahead quickly with its plans to test the government's intentions.

"Obviously, when there have been so many disappointments, it's only natural that there will be some doubts and hesitations, and this is a challenge for the Sudanese government to prove to the international community that it means business," Mr. Annan said. "We are going to press ahead, and I hope this time there will not be disappointments."

Mr. Annan's remarks followed a Security Council briefing at which a top United Nations envoy, Ahmedou Ould-Abdallah, discussed a letter Saturday to Mr. Annan from Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir.

The significance of the letter remains a matter of debate. While it seems to welcome a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force for Darfur, it also suggests that Sudan should have veto power over how the effort is carried out.

Even on Wednesday evening, Sudan's representative at the United Nations, Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem Mohamad, played down the significance of Mr. Bashir's letter, saying that Sudan had agreed not to a "joint force" of peacekeepers but to a "hybrid operation," in which the United Nations would simply provide technical support.

"It is backstopping, logistical, technical support," he said. "It is not a joint force, let there be no confusion of that."

This is not the first time that United Nations officials and diplomats have expressed hope for a peacekeeping effort in Darfur. More than 200,000 people have died in Darfur, many of them from hunger and disease, since the government moved to crush a rebellion there in 2003. More than 2.5 million have been forced from their homes. The Bush administration and others have called the events there genocide.

In November, the Sudanese government agreed in principle to allow a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force into Darfur. Since then, there has been disagreement on a range of issues, from the size of the force to who would command it to what kind of uniforms its troops would wear.

Mr. Annan said he believed that some of those issues had been resolved and that most Council members interpreted Mr. Bashir's letter "as a positive indication that we should build on."

"We need to be persistent, we need to be determined, we need to test it and press ahead," Mr. Annan said.

After the meeting, the Council issued a statement describing Mr. Ould-Abdallah's report as "encouraging" and saying it "remains convinced that the continued cooperation between Sudan, the Security Council and the African Union" would "ensure lasting peace and stability in Darfur."

Alejandro D. Wolff, the acting American ambassador to the United Nations, was more circumspect. While Mr. Bashir's letter may turn out to be a "welcome development," he said, "The proof of this will be action on the ground, and whether or not we will actually see a force that can take its place in Darfur to address the humanitarian crisis there and help deal with the fighting."

Atomic Alliance: U.K. Village Is Home To Secretive Agency (WSJ)

By Cassell Bryan-Low And Carrick Mollenkamp

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Aldermaston Adopts Policy Of Peaceful Coexistence With Weapons Facility

ALDERMASTON, England -- A few years ago, Margaret Dadswell, a 78-year-old retired nurse, had to sign Britain's Official Secrets Act -- a measure that makes it illegal to disclose sensitive national-security information.

The reason: Like several people in this small village, Ms. Dadswell is indirectly linked to the Atomic Weapons Establishment -- Britain's nuclear-weapons agency that, for the most part, peacefully coexists with residents here. Due to the hypersensitivity of its work -- designing and making nuclear weapons -- all AWE employees must sign the official secrets act. And some nonemployees who visit the site, like Ms. Dadswell, who helps AWE coordinate local activities, are asked to do so as well.

In recent weeks, though, the super-secretive agency has given the public a glimpse of what its labs do. AWE's specialists identified polonium 210 as the radioactive poison that killed former Russian intelligence agent Alexander Litvinenko on Nov. 23. Now, AWE's scientists are playing a vital role in Scotland Yard's investigation into the suspected murder by testing for radiation in places that Mr. Litvinenko or his associates went in the weeks before.

On the day of Mr. Litvinenko's death, for instance, officials from AWE and Scotland Yard set out for the Millennium Hotel in Mayfair where he had met two associates on Nov. 1 -- the date he fell ill. There, AWE discovered extensive evidence of polonium, a naturally occurring element that can be deadly when man-made.

An AWE spokesman confirmed that AWE discovered the polonium, but declined to comment further on the investigation.

Locals here, some of whom blithely refer to the AWE as "The Atomic," have become used to its secretive ways. It is the largest employer in this part of West Berkshire, a district with gently rolling hills about 40 miles southwest of London. According to AWE, the agency contributes about $313 million a year to the local economy. With roughly 4,000 employees and hundreds of contractors, it dwarfs Aldermaston village, which has a population of about 500 and is built around a main street, lined with red-brick cottages, that runs from the Hinds Head pub to the village green.

Some villagers say they are concerned about potential health risks and that it can be disturbing to see convoys of highly guarded vehicles marked with warnings about radioactive materials leave the site. But many locals shrug off concerns with jokes about glowing in the dark. Generally, they claim confidence in the AWE's efforts to monitor the local environment.

Jean Chapman, a retired caterer who lives with her husband near the heavily guarded entrance to AWE, says she frequently sees men in white suits with face masks taking samples of an underground waterway across the street from her house.

John Surridge, a local maker of cricket bats, says water in the stream outside his workshop is tested weekly. And Rob O'Brien, a member of the parish council, which runs village affairs, says that every five years AWE employees bring Geiger counters around town to monitor for radiation.

"They came around and they sort of said, 'Do you mind if we leave this in your garden?' " said Mr. O'Brien. "I said, 'Yeah, no problem.' "

In a 2005 review of defense sites, the U.K. Environmental Agency and other government safety groups found minimal environmental impact from AWE after testing of waterways and food in the area.

For decades after it opened, AWE did almost nothing to ingratiate itself with the local community, keeping to itself behind a metal 10-foot fence topped with barbed wire. "Everybody was aware it was to do with atomic weapons" but not much more than that, says Alan Caiger-Smith, a local potter, who has lived in Aldermaston since 1941.

Locals say the agency has made a greater effort to interact with them over the past five or so years. That was about the same time that a contract to manage the facility on behalf of the Ministry of Defence was awarded in 1999 to a coalition of private and public entities: BNFL Group, Lockheed Martin Corp., the U.S. defense company, and Serco Group PLC. The contract was valued at $3.7 billion.

Over the past few years, the Cedars primary school in Aldermaston has won almost $6,000 in prize money from science competitions sponsored by AWE. It spent it on books, software and a microscope that plugs into a computer, says head teacher Jane O'Halloran.

She adds that a parent who works at AWE acts as a liaison if the school wants to borrow equipment such as light boxes and models of human skeletons. "For a small school like us that's an excellent offer," says Ms. O'Halloran.

Despite the increased involvement, many villagers say they know not to ask too much about what AWE employees -- even their own friends -- do. "It's not a business that people chat about over coffee," says villager Sally-Anne Martin. But AWE's managing director, Don Cook, an American nuclear scientist transferred from Lockheed Martin, is becoming a familiar face around the village.

Ms. Martin hosted a recent meet-and-greet drinks party for Mr. Cook and his wife, Peggy, with about 20 or so villagers. Mr. Cook expressed curiosity about the history of the village and community events, says Ms. Martin. Locals, meanwhile, were keen to ask about the nonresident demonstrators who often appear outside the facility's gates to protest the building of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Cook also attended the village's two largest annual events: the summer vegetable competition and the Nativity play, which is put on by local parishioners in medieval costumes and in medieval English.

Mr. Cook's office referred requests for comment to the AWE press office. A spokeswoman said AWE strives to build a good relationship with the community.

DOJ_NMG_0109723

And yet there remain some points of friction as the village and the AWE continue to co-exist. Locals fear that an AWE plan to expand and upgrade buildings on its site will add to traffic. They are lobbying the local council for a relief road that would bypass the village. Residents acknowledge the chances of success, at least in the near term, are slim but want the village to at least win some concessions, such as traffic warning signs outside schools and a cycle path. David Shirt, a villager and chairman of the parish council, is hopeful about the latter request: the AWE also would like to see a bike path so that its employees can cycle to the nearby train station.

Malnutrition Is Cheating Its Survivors, And Africa's Future (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

SHIMIDER, Ethiopia — In this corrugated land of mahogany mountains and tan, parched valleys, it is hard to tell which is the greater scandal: the thousands of children malnutrition kills, or the thousands more it allows to survive.

Malnutrition still kills here, though Ethiopia's infamous famines are in abeyance. In Wag Hamra alone, the northern area that includes Shimider, at least 10,000 children under age 5 died last year, thousands of them from malnutrition-related causes.

Yet almost half of Ethiopia's children are malnourished, and most do not die. Some suffer a different fate. Robbed of vital nutrients as children, they grow up stunted and sickly, weaklings in a land that still runs on manual labor. Some become intellectually stunted adults, shorn of as many as 15 I.Q. points, unable to learn or even to concentrate, inclined to drop out of school early.

There are many children like this in the villages around Shimider. Nearly 6 in 10 are stunted; 10-year-olds can fail to top an adult's belt buckle. They are frequently sick: diarrhea, chronic coughs and worse are standard for toddlers here. Most disquieting, teachers say, many of the 775 children at Shimider Primary are below-average pupils — often well below.

"They fall asleep," said Eteafraw Baro, a third-grade teacher at the school. "Their minds are slow, and they don't grasp what you teach them, and they're always behind in class."

Their hunger is neither a temporary inconvenience nor a quick death sentence. Rather, it is a chronic, lifelong, irreversible handicap that scuttles their futures and cripples Ethiopia's hopes to join the developed world.

"It is a barrier to improving our way of life," said Dr. Girma Akalu, perhaps the nation's leading nutrition expert. Ethiopia's problem is sub-Saharan Africa's curse. Five million African children under age 5 died last year — 40 percent of deaths worldwide — and malnutrition was a major contributor to half of those deaths. Sub-Saharan children under 5 died not only at 22 times the rate of children in wealthy nations, but also at twice the rate for the entire developing world.

But below the Sahara, 33 million more children under 5 are living with malnutrition. In United Nations surveys from 1995 to 2003, nearly half of sub-Saharan children under 5 were stunted or wasted, markers of malnutrition and harbingers of physical and mental problems.

The world mostly mourns the dead, not the survivors. Intellectual stunting is seldom obvious until it is too late.

Bleak as that may sound, the outlook for malnourished children in sub-Saharan Africa is better than in decades, thanks to an awakening to the issue — by selected governments, anyway.

South Africa provides nutrient-fortified flour to 30 million of its 46 million citizens. Nigeria adds vitamin A to flour, cooking oil and sugar. Ethiopia's government hopes to iodize all salt by year's end. United Nations programs now cover three in four sub-Saharan children with twice-a-year doses of vitamin A supplements.

Ethiopia may, in fact, have the most comprehensive program in all Africa — a joint venture with United Nations agencies that regularly screens nearly half of its 14 million children under 5 for health and nutrition problems. Since 2004, the program has delivered vitamin A doses and deworming medicine to 9 in 10 youngsters, vaccinated millions against childhood diseases and delivered fortified food and nutrition education.

Unicef's Ethiopia representative, Bjorn Ljungqvist, said the effort sprang from a disastrous 2003 drought in which global aid agencies fed 13.2 million Ethiopians — the most costly aid undertaking ever in Ethiopia. When the aid effort ended, he said, international donors and government officials decided that "we have to ensure that we don't get into this situation again."

The program may be a model for Africa: similar ones try to improve youngsters' health, but none, Dr. Ljungqvist said, addresses the nutritional deficiencies that leave children with lifelong disabilities. The effort saves 100,000 lives a year, by Unicef estimates. And because it focuses not just on handouts, but on preventive care and nutrition education, the effects could be lasting.

Beyond that, as African nations develop Western-style mass markets, with brand names and national distribution networks, sales of vitamin-fortified foods are slowly becoming common in urban areas, just as in the West decades ago.

But much of the continent has far to go.

Well over half of sub-Saharan children under 5 lack iron, vital to developing nervous systems, the Micronutrient Initiative, a Canadian research organization, reported in 2004. They often have trouble concentrating and coordinating brain signals with movements, like holding a pencil, that are crucial to education.

Another 3.5 million children lack sufficient iodine, which can lower a child's I.Q. by 10 or more points. More than a half million suffer vitamin A deficiency, which cripples young immune systems; merely ensuring adequate vitamin A can lower child mortality by more than one- fifth. Children lacking vitamin B12, regularly measured nowhere in Africa, have impaired cognitive skills and do poorly on tests.

In most foods, these vital nutrients exist in traces — vitamins A and B12, iron, iodine, folic acid. Denied them in the womb and in infancy, children suffer irreversible brain and nervous-system damage, even if they appear well fed.

"Even trained people can't always see them," said Mark Fryars, the director of program services for the Micronutrient Initiative. "You may see a kid whose skin is very pale. You may go into a classroom where a child wanders off, or falls asleep, or doesn't go out to play because he's too tired. Multiply that into whole villages, and that translates into an impact on the society."

In richer parts of the world, nutritional deficiencies are a nonissue. Three percent of American children are malnourished. American flour and cereals have been fortified with vitamins and iron — by law — since the 1930s.

In sub-Saharan Africa, however, lost productivity from vitamin and mineral deficiencies costs nations $2.3 billion a year, Unicef reports, and losses of productivity in Mozambique, Zambia and Malawi exceeded 1 percent of gross domestic product.

Many African children sometimes receive nutrient supplements, courtesy of the World Food Program, Unicef and charities. Still, donors cannot meet the need. In Ethiopia, for example, a venture between the government and United Nations agencies is caring for 20,000 acutely malnourished children at 100 sites.

"But we can count 70,000," said Iqbal Kabir, the chief nutrition expert at Unicef offices in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia's capital. "We can't treat them all."

Shimider is but a hundred or so stone and reed homes, one room each, in a mountain valley in the Amhara region, 250 miles north of Addis Ababa. The slopes here have been intensively farmed for thousands of years, and their soils are exhausted.

Twenty-two years ago, a famine here killed more than one million people. Today, hunger is measured in squandered lives.

Thirty percent of Amhara's children under 5 are stunted, with another 26 percent severely stunted, evidence of lifelong, acute hunger. One in 15 pregnant women experiences night blindness, indicating vitamin A deficiency and a diet devoid of protein and red or yellow fruits and vegetables.

Among both malnourished children and their mothers, the impact of such privation is achingly evident.

One recent Sunday, Tewres Beram, a woman in her early 20s, carried her daughter Mekdes to a free immunization clinic. Mekdes, severely malnourished, sat suckling fruitlessly at her mother's breast. "We don't have enough food," her mother said, "so there's not enough milk to feed her." A year old, Mekdes does not crawl. Her sister, 2, has barely begun to crawl. "Both of them are like little dead bodies," their mother said.

Sirkalem Birhanu, 40, clasps Endalew, age 2 and unable even to hold up his head. "He's always sick," she said. Endalew has company, she said; his 13-year-old brother "is very tiny, and he loses weight."

"And he's always been sick," she added.

And there is Berhane Gebeyew, 36, whose malnourished 18-month-old daughter, Genet, is a lump in her lap, despite receiving six months' worth of fortified food last May from the governments.

Mrs. Gebeyew split the food among Genet and her four siblings, ages 6 to 15. "The other children, when they stare at my eyes, I give it to them," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0109725

She and her husband feed their children two daily meals of injera, a spongy flatbread of fermented barley, occasionally with four ounces of bean sauce. When the children attend Shimider Primary, each gets 10 ounces of vitamin-fortified meal mixed with cooking oil. But attendance is spotty, especially when they help harvest crops in November and December.

And by the time children reach school age, much of malnutrition's damage has already been wrought.

Wondewosen Fekadu is the headmaster at Shimider Primary. Mr. Fekadu worked last year in Tseta, a lowland village where families eat better and drink milk. The difference in their students, he said, is striking. "Children there are relatively smarter and more active," he said. "There are students here who are up to fourth grade and they cannot even read and write, even attentively following the classes."

Three of Mrs. Gebeyew's children attend Shimider Primary. Mogus, a 10-year-old third grader, is three and one-half feet tall — wide-eyed, sweet and flummoxed by academics.

"He's on the poor level — very slow," his teacher said. "He doesn't give attention when I'm teaching. He doesn't concentrate." In a classroom of 60 children, Mogus ranks 46th.

Mulu, 13, her ribs prominent through rips in her green school dress, races from home to get to her beloved third-grade class. But Mulu is 47th in a class of 60.

Fifteen-year-old Yirgalem, about two inches taller than Mulu, has a teenager's diffidence toward school. "It's not that tough," he said. His second-grade teachers differ. "When he comes to school, I don't even think his mind is normal," one of his teachers, Amelework Ejigu, said.

There is great promise that this region's future youngsters will not be hobbled by mental disabilities. Virtually all nutritional deficiencies can be easily and cheaply prevented, sometimes for pennies per child, through programs like universal salt iodization, fortification of flour and semiannual doses of vitamins.

Such efforts already are under way in some nations, and they are a foundation of most United Nations children's programs. But in just as many places, they remain a promise.

At Tefera Hailu Memorial Hospital in Sekota, across a mountain from Shimider, the nutrition ward's 10 beds are filled with worried mothers and shrunken babies. Among them are Adna Berhanu and her 5-month-old son, Agnecheu.

Mrs. Berhanu's huge goiter is decorated with blue tribal tattoos. Her skeletal baby is severely iodine deficient, surely impaired for life should he survive.

Although iodine deficiency is endemic in Amhara Province, "I've been here a year, and we have no iodine in this ward," the nurse on duty said. Beyond a blood test to estimate iron content, the attending physician said, no one even analyzes children's nutritional status. Such tests, he said, are luxuries.

"We focus on saving lives; that's our long-term focus," he said. "We can't focus on what happens to them afterward."

Moscow Links Poisoning Inquiry To Yukos Case (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 27 — Russia's Prosecutor General's Office on Wednesday produced a startling new twist in the investigation of the killing of Alexander V. Litvinenko, the former K.G.B. officer who died in London in November of radiation poisoning. It announced that it was investigating the possible involvement of former executives of Yukos Oil, the company dismantled by a prosecutorial assault last year.

In a statement released Wednesday evening, the prosecutor's office said its investigation indicated a link between the poisoning of Mr. Litvinenko and criminal cases under way against Yukos executives. It singled out Leonid B. Nevzlin, a major shareholder and partner of the company's jailed chief executive, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky.

The statement did not elaborate on any evidence that might link Mr. Nevzlin and others to Mr. Litvinenko's death, which was caused by a high dose of a radioactive material, polonium 210.

The accusation nevertheless was an effort on the part of the Russian government to tie Mr. Litvinenko's death to accusations of a convoluted web of economic and other crimes that destroyed Yukos, once Russia's richest company.

DOJ_NMG_0109726

The prosecution of Yukos and Mr. Khodorkovsky was widely seen as a Kremlin-led campaign against a company seen as defiant of President Vladimir V. Putin and against a man seen as a potential political threat.

A spokesman for Mr. Nevzlin, a close associate of Mr. Khodorkovsky who is wanted on charges in Russia and lives in self-imposed exile in Israel, dismissed the new accusations as a continuation of that campaign.

"We all know the methods of the K.G.B.," the spokesman, Amir Dan, said in a telephone interview, referring to the defunct Soviet security agency. "The statement is ridiculous. It is not worth any comment."

When Mr. Litvinenko fell ill on Nov. 1, officials in Russia ridiculed the accusations of Russian involvement. But when he died on Nov. 23 from the effects of radioactive poisoning, investigators here agreed to assist British detectives, who visited for several days this month.

The statement from the Prosecutor General's Office said the investigations of Yukos had now been combined with that of Mr. Litvinenko's killing.

"A version is being verified according to which the contractors of these crimes may be one and the same group of people whose names are on the international wanted list" for committing grave crimes, the prosecutors' statement said. It specified Mr. Nevzlin as one of them but did not identify any others.

Mr. Nevzlin has long evaded Russian requests for extradition — a source of diplomatic irritation between Russia and Israel. On Sunday he arrived in the United States on vacation, Mr. Dan said, prompting new demands by the Russians that the Americans arrest him.

A United States government official who has been briefed on the case and spoke on condition of anonymity because of privacy regulations said Mr. Nevzlin arrived at Newark Liberty International Airport in New Jersey on Sunday and was questioned by Customs and Border Protection officers. He had a valid visa and was allowed into the country, the official said. A Justice Department spokesman said the department had no information about Mr. Nevzlin.

The prosecutors' statement said Russia would prepare new requests for extradition, though it did not identify the countries to which the requests would be made.

Mr. Nevzlin's name has surfaced in connection with the Litvinenko case before. He met with Mr. Litvinenko in the weeks before his poisoning, evidently in October. After Mr. Litvinenko's death, Mr. Nevzlin said that Mr. Litvinenko had provided him with a dossier that "shed light on most significant aspects of the Yukos affair."

The dossier's contents remain unclear, but Mr. Nevzlin said he had provided them to British investigators. It was also unclear how Mr. Litvinenko, who fled Russia in 2000, could have come to possess incriminating information about a case that unfolded after his departure.

In another aspect of the Litvinenko case, investigators in Germany discovered traces of polonium at places visited by Dmitry V. Kovtun, another businessman and former security officer who was one of two Russian businessmen who met Mr. Litvinenko in London on Nov. 1, the day he was evidently poisoned.

The traces found in Germany appeared to have been left in the days before Mr. Kovtun flew from Hamburg to London on that morning.

Prosecutors here say they are investigating Mr. Kovtun's poisoning as an attempted murder committed in conjunction with Mr. Litvinenko's killing. That would suggest that Mr. Kovtun was a victim, not a suspect.

Mr. Kovtun is said to be in a Moscow hospital being monitored for symptoms of radiation poisoning, though his condition and whereabouts are shrouded in mystery. He and the other businessman, Andrei K. Lugovoi, were questioned by Russian and British investigators. Nothing is known of the nature of their responses.

The man at the center of the Yukos affair, Mr. Khodorkovsky, the company's former chairman, has also come under new prosecutorial scrutiny. Convicted last year on charges of fraud and tax evasion that his supporters described as politically motivated, Mr. Khodorkovsky was transferred over the weekend from the remote Siberian prison where he was serving an eight-year sentence to a regional detention center in Chita.

On Wednesday prosecutors preparing new criminal charges against him questioned him and his jailed business partner, Platon A. Lebedev, Mr. Khodorkovsky's lawyer said in a statement. The lawyer, Yuri M. Schmidt, said investigators accused his client of laundering money by making contributions to Open Russia, a social and educational charity Mr. Khodorkovsky founded. The authorities have since closed the charity.

Mr. Schmidt said the timing of the new questioning amounted to “moral and physical pressure” on his client, whose current sentence does not end until 2012.

Moscow Trying To Kill Investigation By Targeting Nevzlin: Litvinenko Friend (AFP)

AFP, December 28, 2006

Russian allegations against the main shareholder in oil giant Yukos that he is connected to the poisoning of ex-spy Alexander Litvinenko are an attempt to deflect responsibility from the true perpetrators, a friend of the dead spy told AFP.

"It's total nonsense... accusing (Leonid) Nevzlin, The Kremlin is just trying to cover up," said Alex Goldfarb, who was also Litvinenko's former spokesman, speaking by telephone from New York.

The Russian public prosecutor's office said on Wednesday that it had information which might help clear up Litvinenko's murder involving Nevzlin, a former close associate of jailed Yukos chief Mikhail Khodorkovsky.

"All evidence seems to show that the two Russians (Andrei Lugovoi and Dmitri Kovtun, who met with Litvinenko on the day he fell ill) are responsible" for the former spy's poisoning, Goldfarb said.

The accusation "just raises the suspicion that the government is trying to hide its responsibility," he added.

Nevzlin and billionaire Russian businessman Boris Berezovsky, the former exiled in Israel, the latter in London, "are the two person that can stand up to Russia, they have the money," Goldfarb said.

Nevzlin was one of the closest associates of Khodorkovsky, who is serving an eight-year prison sentence for tax evasion, a conviction largely suspected to have been politically engineered by the Kremlin.

Goldfarb said he was not close to Nevzlin.

Litvinenko, a former member of the Russian secret services and a fierce critic of the Russian government from his exiled home in London, died on November 23, three weeks after he felt the first symptoms of poisoning by the radioactive substance polonium-210.

Russia Probes Ex-Yukos Owner In Spy Case (AP)

By Henry Meyer, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

Russian prosecutors said Wednesday they are investigating the possible role of a former owner of the Yukos oil company in the radiation poisoning death of one-time Russian intelligence agent Alexander Litvinenko.

They did not explain the basis for the allegations against Leonid Nevzlin, who now lives in exile in Israel.

Russia has unsuccessfully pressed for the extradition of a number of Kremlin critics in recent years, including Nevzlin and tycoon Boris Berezovsky, who lives in Britain.

Amir Dan, a spokesman for Nevzlin, dismissed the prosecutors' allegations.

"We all know the ways of the KGB and the Russian government, and these claims are ridiculous and are not worthy of comment," he told The Associated Press.

Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Litvinenko's active in London's community of Russian expatriates and Kremlin critics, called the charges against Nevzlin a "clumsy effort" by Moscow to shift blame from itself.

"This is sheer nonsense," he told the AP. "Everybody knows that all evidence points to Russia. The way the Russian government, the Russian prosecutors are handling it is only adding to that suspicion that it is the Russian government behind this."

Litvinenko died in London on Nov. 23 after he was exposed to a rare radioactive element, polonium-210. In a deathbed statement, he accused President Vladimir Putin of ordering his murder, allegations which the Kremlin has dismissed.

Nevzlin fled Russia after authorities launched a criminal investigation against Yukos, once Russia's top oil producer, in 2003.

Nevzlin told the AP last month that Litvinenko had given him a document related to Yukos. He said he believed the poisoning death was tied to Litvinenko's investigations of the Russian government's dismantling of the company.

DOJ_NMG_0109728

On Wednesday, the Prosecutor General's office said Nevzlin and other Yukos figures wanted by Russia could have ordered Litvinenko's killing as well as the poisoning of another former agent, Dmitry Kovtun.

"We are checking the possibility that these crimes could have been ordered and organized by the same group of people who are wanted internationally, one of whom is Leonid Nevzlin," prosecutor's spokeswoman Marina Gridneva said on state television.

The statement said prosecutors had formed a special investigative unit and were preparing to file international requests for assistance in the case and possible extradition demands.

Britain sent Scotland Yard detectives to Moscow this month to interview witnesses but they were allowed only to sit in on questioning by Russian prosecutors.

Russia also launched its own investigation, seen as a bid to keep control of the politically explosive case, which has threatened to drive relations between Britain and Russia to post-Cold War lows.

Meanwhile, Russian authorities on Wednesday questioned the imprisoned Mikhail Khodorkovsky, the former chief executive of Yukos oil, as a suspect in a new criminal inquiry, his lawyer said.

Yuri Schmidt said Khodorkovsky was questioned on suspicion of involvement in money-laundering — allegations the lawyer dismissed as politically motivated.

Khodorkovsky, once Russia's richest man, is currently serving an eight-year sentence on fraud and tax evasion charges in a prison in eastern Siberia.

"The new case is a continuation of selective justice aimed at applying moral and physical pressure on Mikhail Khodorkovsky, further destruction of Yukos and the confiscation of assets," said Yuri Schmidt, Khodorkovsky's lawyer, in a statement posted on a Web site for the tycoon's supporters.

Nevzlin, who according to Forbes magazine had a net worth of about $2 billion before Yukos' collapse, has been charged by Russia with ordering the 2002 murder of a married couple.

A former Yukos security officer has been jailed since mid-2003 in the case, which was allegedly business-related.

Litvinenko fell ill after meeting with Russian businessman Kovtun, Andrei Lugovoi, also an ex-Soviet agent, and Vyacheslav Sokolenko, head of a private Russian security firm, at a bar at the Millennium Hotel in London.

All three men have denied involvement in the former spy's death. Kovtun himself has been contaminated with radiation and is undergoing treatment at a Moscow hospital.

The unexplained murder has inspired widespread speculation about who may have been behind it.

Many Western analysts suspect the Kremlin, though there is no evidence that the Russian government was involved.

Pro-Kremlin lawmakers have suggested — also without offering evidence — that Berezovsky was responsible, as part of a plan to blacken the reputation of Putin and the Kremlin.

Mario Scaramella, an Italian who also met with Litvinenko the day he fell ill, is seeking release from prison, his lawyer said Wednesday. His arrest is not believed to be directly connected to Litvinenko's murder.

Scaramella was questioned for about six hours by Italian prosecutors in a Rome jail, where he is being detained.

His lawyer, Sergio Rastrelli, said his client is accused of slander. Scaramella's father and Italian news reports say the suspect was accused of international arms trafficking.

"We intend to seek his immediate release from prison," Rastrelli told reporters. "My client will respond to all questions and will clarify any ... misunderstanding."

Russians Open New Probe Of Oil Baron (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 27 -- Imprisoned Russian oil tycoon Mikhail Khodorkovsky is a suspect in a new money-laundering investigation, raising the possibility that the Kremlin foe, already serving an eight-year sentence for tax evasion and fraud, could spend many more years in prison, his attorney said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0109729

Khodorkovsky, his imprisoned partner Platon Lebedev, also a suspect, and their attorneys were summoned to a detention facility in the remote Siberian city of Chita to undergo questioning Wednesday. Both Khodorkovsky, founder of Yukos Oil Co., and Lebedev refused to answer questions, their attorneys said, rejecting the case as the continuation of a government vendetta that landed them in prison in the first place.

"A new case is the logical continuation of the selective justice aimed at putting moral and physical pressure on Mikhail Khodorkovsky, further destruction of Yukos and seizing its property," Khodorkovsky attorney Yuri Schmidt said in a statement.

"Because of the lack of any independent investigation and the direct link of investigators and the head of the group to the Kremlin administration, Mikhail Khodorkovsky demanded that the entire investigation group be removed." He is serving his sentence in an isolated Siberian camp 3,000 miles from Moscow.

Prosecutors provided no details about the probe. But Russian press reports said the case relates to the alleged sale of oil at below-market prices between subsidiaries of Yukos between 2000 and 2003. Prosecutors apparently allege that billions of dollars in undeclared profits were shifted to offshore accounts before being redistributed to other parties.

Among the suspected recipients of some of the money is Khodorkovsky's now-defunct foundation, Open Russia, which spent millions of dollars on programs aimed at strengthening democracy and education in Russia. Critics of Khodorkovsky's prosecution say he was targeted because his political activity, particularly his ability to fund opposition activity, was seen as a threat to the rule of President Vladimir Putin.

The Kremlin and prosecutors here say they reined in a rogue oligarch who defrauded the state.

Russian authorities have driven Yukos into bankruptcy, stripping it of its prime assets, pursuing remaining assets held abroad and launching investigations against company officers, including foreign executives.

In Moscow on Wednesday, prosecutors said they were investigating former Yukos shareholder and Khodorkovsky partner Leonid Nevzlin for possible involvement in the Nov. 23 poisoning death in London of former Russian intelligence agent Alexander Litvinenko, the Associated Press reported. A spokesman for Nevzlin, who lives in exile in Israel, called the probe "ridiculous."

Two years ago, the state oil company Rosneft, which is chaired by a senior Kremlin official, acquired 76.79 percent of Yukos's largest production unit for $9.3 billion after a murky government-run auction in which the unit was initially purchased by a front company.

The Yuganskneftegaz unit was pumping 1 million barrels of oil a day at the time of the sale and now accounts for 60 to 70 percent of Rosneft's oil production. Rosneft was valued at more than $70 billion when it sold a 14.8 percent stake in the company in an initial public offering in July in London. Yukos continues to fight the sale of Yuganskneftegaz in Russian courts.

Yukos's Russian assets are under the control of a Moscow court, and its foreign assets are held by a Dutch foundation, which is planning to sell them to pay off creditors, including Group Menatep, the largest. In the Dutch courts, the Russian authorities unsuccessfully fought the planned sale of Yukos assets, including a refinery in Lithuania.

If Menatep is paid an estimated $800 million in debts, Khodorkovsky and other shareholders would be left with a significant nest egg, something Russian officials appear determined to prevent.

Gazprom Warns Of Wider Cutoffs If Belarus Interferes With Gas (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 27 — Gazprom, the Russian energy monopoly, reacted fiercely on Wednesday to a suggestion from Belarus that it would pull natural gas out of export pipelines rather than pay a higher price for the fuel.

Reversing course from its assurances of Tuesday, Gazprom warned Poland, Lithuania and Germany of possible supply disruptions. About 8 percent of the European Union's gas imports pass through Belarus.

The country, whose alliance with Russia has turned rocky, both imports natural gas for domestic consumption and transships fuel to markets farther to the West. Its president, Aleksandr G. Lukashenko, is often referred to as Europe's last dictator.

"We are interdependent," the deputy prime minister of Belarus, Vladimir I. Semashko, said of the two countries' energy ties in remarks Wednesday on Russian state television. "If I don't have a domestic gas supply contract, Gazprom won't have a transit deal."

Mr. Semashko brushed aside Gazprom's threat to halt supplies for the domestic market in Belarus. "Gazprom will not reduce the amount of supplies," he predicted. "With Ukraine there was an attempt like this. After two days, everything fell back into place."

He was referring to the showdown at the beginning of the year when a price dispute between Ukraine and Russia and a two-day embargo caused jitters across Europe, which relies on Russian gas, especially in the winter.

Gazprom's chief executive, Aleksei B. Miller, responded by issuing a deadline to shut off the gas. "If a contract for supply next year is not concluded, Gazprom will have no basis to supply gas after 10 a.m. on Jan. 1, 2007," he said in televised remarks. He also suggested that Russia should impose export duties on sales to Belarus, raising the price to $260 per 1,000 cubic meters.

Earlier, Gazprom had offered Belarus gas for $105 for the same volume, a combination of cash and equity in a key export pipeline.

"You shouldn't expect New Year's presents from Gazprom," the company's spokesman, Sergei V. Kupriyanov, said after the Belarussian implied threat of disrupting Gazprom's exports to Europe, the source of most of the corporation's income. "Gazprom is not Santa Claus."

As in the dispute with Ukraine, the bargaining has become a test of Belarus's leverage as a transit country for Russian energy and its willingness to risk the energy supplies of its neighbors farther down the pipelines.

"Each of the former republics has a different set of circumstances in terms of what leverage the Russians have, and what relations these countries have with their neighbors," Jérôme Guillet, a Paris-based banker and an authority on Gazprom's business practices, said in a telephone interview.

Ukraine, for example, will pay $135 per 1,000 cubic meters next year. By contrast, Georgia, led by a pro-Western government, will pay $235. Belarus currently pays $46.68 per 1,000 cubic meters, the lowest price in the former Soviet Union outside of Russia itself.

About 20 percent of Gazprom's exports to Europe pass through Belarus, and 80 percent via Ukraine. The 25 countries in the European Union, taken together, import 40 percent of their gas from Russia. Gazprom said its average price in Western Europe in the first half of 2006 was $265.

Mr. Kupriyanov of Gazprom said Wednesday that Belarus wanted to pay just $75 per 1,000 cubic meters and asked that Gazprom front the entire $2.5 billion for a 50 percent share in the pipeline company, Beltransgaz. That proposal is "very unlikely" to satisfy Gazprom, he said.

Gazprom Readies To Halt Delivery Of Gas To Belarus (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

MOSCOW -- Russian state gas monopoly OAO Gazprom will halt supplies to Belarus on Jan. 1 if no new contract is signed and has warned European countries of potential problems with deliveries via Belarus, the Interfax news agency quoted the company's chief as saying Wednesday.

Gazprom, which is demanding Belarus pay more than twice the current price for gas next year and hand over a 50% stake in its gas distribution system, refused to back down after Minsk threatened to siphon off Russian natural gas bound for Europe in the event of a suspension of supplies to Belarus.

"If a gas supply contract for next year is not reached, Gazprom will have no grounds for deliveries of gas to Belarus as of 10 a.m. Moscow time on Jan. 1, 2007," Gazprom Chief Executive Alexei Miller said in televised comments.

Mr. Miller said that Gazprom would supply gas for European consumers to the Russia-Belarus border "in full volume and in full compliance with its contracts," but a Belarusian official hinted earlier that Belarus could hinder supplies to Europe across its territory if Gazprom suspends deliveries meant for Belarus.

Mr. Miller said Gazprom has sent letters to Germany, Poland and Lithuania informing them "of possible problems in the transit of gas through Belarus," according to the ITAR-Tass news agency. About 30% of Russian gas supplies to Europe go through Belarus.

Gazprom will also ask the government to introduce export duty on its supplies of gas to Belarus, the news agency Prime-Tass reported Mr. Miller as saying Wednesday. He said the Russian government was losing $1.3 billion a year by not levying export duty on supplies to Belarus.

If adopted, the measure would mimic one taken two weeks ago by the Russian government to start applying export duties on deliveries of crude oil to Belarus.

The two sides remain at variance over the price of Gazprom's deliveries. Gazprom wants $200 per 1,000 cubic meters, or an equivalent deal that would combine a smaller cash payment and up to 50% of pipeline operator Beltransgaz. That would represent a quadrupling of the price Belarus paid this year.

The Belarusian government says it can't afford the increase, which would bring its gas price into line with other Gazprom customers in central Europe. Belarus will buy around 20 billion cubic meters of gas this year from Gazprom.

Belarusian Deputy Prime Minister Vladimir Semashko was reported by local media Wednesday as saying that, in the absence of a new deal, Belarus would assume that the old contractual terms for 2006 remain in place. A Gazprom spokesman said this was tantamount to a declaration of intent to steal transit gas, Prime-Tass reported.

Gazprom Price Row Threat To European Gas (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

Gazprom, Russia's state-controlled gas giant, on Wednesday warned that its spiralling price dispute with Belarus could disrupt supplies to Poland, Germany and Lithuania following an implicit threat by Belarus to stop the transit of Russian gas.

Gazprom and Belarus exchanged strongly-worded threats on Wednesday which echoed Russia's stand-off with Ukraine a year ago when Moscow turned off gas supplies to Kiev, interrupting transit to Europe.

Gazprom said that unless a new deal is signed in the next four days it will turn off gas supplies to Belarus from January 1, while Belarus said it would stop the transit of Russian gas to Europe. Analysts said Gazprom's reputation could suffer further from the dispute.

"We are inter-dependent. If I don't have a domestic gas supply contract, Gazprom won't have a transit deal," said Vladimir Semashko, deputy prime-minister of Belarus.

Gazprom admitted it would not be able to fully compensate its European customers if Belarus started siphoning off gas from the pipeline, which transports 20 per cent of its gas to Europe.

Alexei Miller, Gazprom's chief executive, told Russia's state television channel: "Gazprom has today sent letters to its partners in Lithuania, Poland and Germany about the gas supply situation occurring with Belarus."

Belarus currently pays Russia just $46 per thousand cubic meters of its gas – the same as Russian domestic customers and five times lower than European levels.

Gazprom initially threatened to raise prices for Belarus to $200, wiping out a multi-billion subsidy that helps sustain Alexander Lukashenko, its authoritarian leader, in power.

However, Gazprom subsequently agreed to drop its price to $105 per thousand cubic meters, with a caveat that Belarus pays $75 in cash and the rest in shares of Beltransgaz, the country's gas pipeline and distribution network.

Belarus accepted the price of $75 per thousand cubic meters and reluctantly agreed to sell 50 per cent of Beltransgaz to Gazprom. But it wants Gazprom to pay up front $2.5bn for its stake in Beltransgaz.

Gazprom says it is "no Santa Clause" and would not make any more concessions. But the Russian company is in a difficult position, partly induced by its own policies towards Ukraine and other former Soviet republics over the past year.

If Gazprom turns off gas supplies to Belarus, disrupting supplies to Europe, its reputation for unreliability would suffer further. If it caves in to Belarus's demands, however, it would lose face at home, while also displaying a selective approach to different political regimes in the former Soviet Union.

Russia has been blamed for using gas pipelines as a weapon against west-leaning Ukraine and Georgia. In contrast to both those countries, Belarus has no ambition to join NATO or the European Union. But while Mr Lukashenko has been labelled

“Europe’s last dictator” by the US and is widely considered a pariah in Europe, he ahs adopted a tough line in gas negotiations with Russia, giving Gazprom a taste of its own medicine.

While Mr Lukashenko has little to lose in terms of his reputation, “the damage caused to Gazprom's status as a reliable gas supplier may theoretically be greater than last time round [with Ukraine],” Deutsche UFG, a Russian arm of Deutsche Bank, said on Wednesday.

Gazprom said it would deliver all contracted gas to the Russian border with Belarus, which could allow it to shift any blame for disruption onto Belarus. But “this would unlikely be of comfort to European consumers, who may miss 1/5 of their Russian gas imports,” Deutsche UFG said.

U.S. Ups Port-security Exchanges (WT)

By Richard Halloran

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

HONOLULU -- The U.S. Coast Guard is quietly expanding exchanges with Chinese maritime-security agencies in a move that reflects the boom in seaborne trade between the two countries.

Chinese law-enforcement officers ride Coast Guard cutters patrolling North Pacific fishing areas. Chinese and American officers scrutinize port security on each other's coasts. Chinese take part in joint training drills.

Chinese, along with Canadians, Japanese, South Koreans, Russians and Americans, attend an annual North Pacific Coast Guard Forum in Alaska.

And the Coast Guard has posted a Chinese-speaking officer, Capt. Barney Moreland, to the U.S. Embassy in Beijing to liaise with Chinese officials, including those dealing with port security.

Coast Guard officials think the cooperation is justified by growing trade links in spite of often uneasy political relations between the United States and China. Most of the $207 billion worth of Chinese exports to the United States in the first nine months of 2006 moved by ship.

"We put politics aside to focus on the mission," said Rear Adm. Sally Brice-O'Hara, who commands Coast Guard ships and sailors from Hawaii west to the shores of Asia.

The exchanges also are part of a broader U.S. effort to rebuild military exchanges with China, which lapsed after Chinese authorities crushed a pro-democracy movement at Tiananmen Square in 1989 and a Chinese fighter plane collided with a U.S. reconnaissance plane off Hainan Island in 2001.

Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates indicated to the Senate Armed Services Committee ahead of his confirmation that he would continue those exchanges. "I believe that expanded military exchanges with China can be valuable, but should be based on China's willingness to reciprocate."

The reasons for the exchanges are several. At the workaday level, the two sides exchange information on "best practices," on how well things are done, said Adm. Brice-O'Hara.

Strategically, the Pacific Command seeks to reassure the Chinese, who are suspicious of foreign powers, that the United States is not planning to attack. Conversely, the United States seeks to deter the Chinese from miscalculating and planning a war with the United States.

Down at deck level, the Coast Guard Cutter Rush called at the Chinese port of Qingdao recently to pick up an official of the Fisheries Law Enforcement Commission, Tan Lizhou.

He came aboard to work with the crew as they checked on whether fishing boats in the North Pacific were operating in accord with international agreements intended to conserve dwindling stocks of fish there.

"We made him part of the crew," said Capt. Dana Ware, then the skipper of the ship. He assigned Mr. Tan the rank of lieutenant commander, which made him relatively senior among the ship's 20 officers.

Mr. Tan mustered to quarters, ate with the officers in the wardroom where he didn't much care for American food, and had computer connections with his home base in China.

Mr. Tan's main duty, however, was to communicate by radio with Chinese fishing vessels that Capt. Ware thought should be inspected, then to go with the boarding party to verify the vessel's registration, equipment records and catch log.

"We let him do most of the talking," Capt. Ware said, noting that Mr. Tan's English got better as time passed so that he could explain more to his American hosts.

An e-mail to Mr. Tan asking whether his voyage on the Rush had been worthwhile and served the purposes of his government went unanswered.

Ashore, port security has taken high priority since the September 11 attacks in New York and Washington. The possibility that a terrorist could hide a bomb in a shipment of Chinese exports to the U.S. causes anxiety -- as does a shipment of imports into China from anywhere.

Thus, says Adm. Brice-O'Hara, "We want to see their port-security standards. And the Chinese come look at our ports so that we can share best practices."

For Eco-Entrepreneurs In China, No Simple Way To Grow A Business (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

SHANGHAI -- Except for its paint job, green to symbolize environmental friendliness, the bus looked ordinary enough as it bumped along a suburban Shanghai street late one recent morning. But it was strangely quiet. Only a distant hum accompanied the rattles and passengers' conversations.

The hum came from a hydrogen fuel cell providing clean, renewable energy to the demonstration vehicle, manufactured by Shen-Li High Tech Co. Ltd., a private Shanghai company that set out to make its fortune from hydrogen power for buses, taxis and generators in the giant Chinese market.

Shen-Li, launched here by a Clemson University-trained engineer, Hu Liqing, found encouragement in a campaign by the Chinese Communist Party to promote bold departures such as hydrogen power.

Party leaders have decided that the Chinese people, steeped in tradition and educated to obey party directives, must learn to initiate and innovate, because the future of the Chinese economy depends on it.

Most of China's current economic boom has come from young men and women working for low wages in factories that use technology and product designs from abroad. As the economy matures, China's government has warned, it must rely increasingly on new technology invented by the Chinese themselves, who are being urged to turn assembly plants into laboratories blooming with a hundred flowers of new ideas.

"We must speed up the construction of an innovative nation," the Communist Party's Central Committee declared after a Dec. 5-7 meeting.

But the experiences of Shen-Li and other companies with ambitions to market hydrogen power suggest that China's one-party system and pervasive controls hamper innovation in many fields, from arts to sciences. In a nation where the party retains a monopoly on power -- economic and otherwise -- bursting from the official mold with a new idea and bringing it to market is never easy.

Although the need for pollution-free vehicles and renewable energy is clear in China's increasingly choked cities, the future of hydrogen power has remained in the grasp of a powerful officialdom that decides on budget allocations. The government's senior levels repeatedly have endorsed alternative forms of energy but have yet to take decisive steps toward getting hydrogen-powered vehicles onto the streets.

The Shanghai municipal government and party apparatus, proud of a can-do attitude that helped make their city China's most prosperous, promised big-time investment in a hydrogen-powered bus and taxi fleet. But the local leadership went down in a corruption scandal in September, raising doubts about their plans.

"In China, it all depends on the government," said Mao Zongqiang, one of the country's leading experts on hydrogen and other alternative fuels at Tsinghua University's Nuclear and New Energy Institute.

Hu Liqing, 43, made hydrogen power his mission years ago, even before the Communist Party struck up its innovation theme. After postdoctoral studies at Clemson and two years working in Vancouver, B.C., he returned and founded Shen-Li in 1998 with the idea of attacking the pollution in his native China and making money as well.

"We are trying to do something good for human beings," he said in an interview at his factory in Shanghai's suburban Longyang Industrial Garden. "Even in Canada, we are losing paradise. Of course, Chinese people face an even more serious situation, and so that's why I came back and tried to get people to focus on the future."

Hydrogen cell power is under development at major automobile companies around the world. Shen-Li has put together its version by drawing on foreign parts and know-how and its own research. It hopes to make its mark by finding a way to economically mass-produce the propulsion systems.

The beauty of hydrogen power, Hu said, is that a simple chemical reaction in the fuel cell combines hydrogen and oxygen to make water, producing electric current to power a vehicle, with water the only emission. Moreover, he noted, there are potentially boundless supplies of hydrogen and oxygen, unlike petroleum.

The problem is that producing, storing and distributing the hydrogen costs money and requires an infrastructure of filling stations that does not exist, he acknowledged. In addition, the price of manufacturing a hydrogen-powered vehicle exceeds that of producing a traditional gasoline-powered one.

Until recently, that problem looked like it was on the way to being addressed. The activist Communist Party secretary for Shanghai, Chen Liangyu, and the Shanghai mayor, Han Zhen, visited Shen-Li in July and told Hu they were serious about his technology.

The city government had put up about $200 million for hydrogen cell research and development, some of which kept Shen-Li and its 150 employees going. Shanghai officials announced a plan to put 1,000 hydrogen-powered vehicles on the streets here by 2010 and 10,000 by 2015. After that, mass production would be on the horizon, they suggested, and Shanghai would be at the forefront of the world's search for affordable, environment-friendly transportation.

Under the plan, the state-owned Shanghai Automotive Industry Corp. would produce a good share of the cars, and a company in nearby Suzhou would produce the buses. Some officials suggested General Motors Corp. would get a part of the deal as well. But that would still leave a lot of business for Shen-Li.

"In Shanghai, I am very lucky," he said then. "The politicians want to make an investment in the future."

But party secretary Chen was implicated in a pension fund scandal and removed from power three months later. Shanghai officials and business leaders waited for Chen's replacement, wondering whether he would be as enthusiastic about hydrogen-powered vehicles.

Eminent Chinese scientists with connections to the government then warned Beijing that hydrogen fuel-cell technology may not be advanced enough to warrant large-scale investment. As a result, official enthusiasm cooled.

Lower-level Shanghai officials say they remain interested, but in the meantime they've shrunk their ambitions. A new plan recently announced called for only 100 environmentally friendly vehicles of all kinds on the streets by 2008, 1,000 by approximately 2012 and the capability to mass-produce them -- but no commitment to do so -- by 2015. No money has been allocated.

"It's not a very good sign for us," said Shi Tao, who manages administration and outside relations at Shen-Li. "We are a little frustrated."

A subsidiary of Fosun Pharmaceutical Corp., meanwhile, purchased a 36 percent share of Shen-Li late last summer. Since then, Shi said, the company has focused on electricity generators, which offer hope for more immediate sales in China and abroad. Private venture capital for an iffy project like hydrogen vehicles is hard to come by in China, he explained.

From the headquarters of his Fuyuan Century Fuel Cell Power Co. Ltd. in suburban Beijing, Zhong Jialun has watched the ups and downs of hydrogen power plans in China with a practiced eye. Zhong, 63, has seen many things come and go in his time, and now he has put his money on hydrogen power.

"I've always been an optimistic guy," he said. "Everybody says China is the world's factory. But it's just a factory. We haven't mastered the key technologies. But we aren't going to allow things to stay that way. I agree with the government. We must have our own innovative technology. We can't just sell cheap labor."

Born into a prominent family of Red Army officers, Zhong commanded a submarine in the early days of the Chinese navy. During the Cultural Revolution of 1966 to 1976, he said, he ran into trouble with the authorities by pointing out that the upheavals of the times were a poor mix with the exacting standards of submarine technology. He was sentenced to death. His sentence was reduced to life in prison, then to 25 years. He served five years until the military brought an end to the Cultural Revolution.

After prison, Zhong found his way into business, following the advice of China's leader of the time, Deng Xiaoping. He went into metals, then restaurants and clothing. Another death sentence, for alleged corruption, was repealed. By the end of the 1980s, he was in the innovation business.

At Fuyuan Century Fuel Cell, he hired a research staff to find a way to make membranes, which are the key and most expensive element in hydrogen fuel cells. The U.S. company DuPont dominates the market for these components.

A Canadian-based Chinese scientist joined the team in 1999 and, in 2000, the company succeeded in making its own membrane, Zhong said, using a manufacturing process that is different from DuPont's. "The next step was to turn it into a product we could sell, to make money," he added.

The Beijing city government's plans for the 2008 Summer Olympics seemed to offer promise. Municipal authorities acquired three hydrogen-powered demonstration buses, assigning them to run a 12-mile route from the Summer Palace to the Wudaokou university district. Eager to show environmental credentials, it also has encouraged the building of two hydrogen filling stations, one of which produces its own hydrogen.

But the buses were bought from DaimlerChrysler. Zhong and his 60 workers have yet to get the orders they need to move their technology into production. While the government reevaluates, officials said, there are no plans for large-scale fuel-cell production in the capital.

Annan And The U.N.'s Limits (WP)

By William Shawcross

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Kofi Annan deserves a good sendoff. For 10 years he has persevered with unfailing grace in what really is "a job from hell."

I am biased -- I've admired Annan since the early 1990s, some years before he became secretary general of the United Nations. Like the U.S. government, I welcomed his replacing Boutros Boutros-Ghali in 1996. Annan had been the one U.N. official brave enough to give Washington the green light to bomb the Serbs to the negotiating table in the summer of 1995. His intervention then was crucial.

It is easy to forget now that Annan's first five-year term was widely seen as a great success. He presented a wise, compassionate approach and a breath of fresh air. He also showed unprecedented honesty -- commissioning independent inquiries into the disasters of Rwanda and Srebrenica and accepting all criticism from them, including criticism of himself.

Kofi Annan was (and is) pro-American, and he mended the United Nations' relations with Congress. He persuaded international businesses to help promote development. He concentrated much attention on the ravages of HIV-AIDS.

Not surprisingly, he was reelected by acclamation in the middle of 2001. But then Sept. 11 changed everything. As Annan himself said, the world entered the 21st century through a gate of fire. That fire still rages, especially in Iraq and other countries in the Middle East.

Unlike Annan, I was and remain in favor of the decision to remove Saddam Hussein from power in Iraq. But the Security Council was and remains divided on the whole Iraq issue. The United Nations being what it is, no secretary general could have ignored that division.

Tragically for Annan and the United Nations, more than 20 of his best people were brutally murdered in Baghdad by al-Qaeda in August 2003. This assault, together with the political divisions, have crippled the United Nations in Iraq ever since. But Annan insisted that the United Nations help stage the successful January 2005 election in which so many millions of Iraqis voted freely for the first time in their lives.

The U.N. role in Iraq has been further complicated, if not diminished, by the oil-for-food scandal. This was indeed a disaster; the secretariat was incompetent, a few officials behaved corruptly and the perversion of the program by Saddam Hussein (as Charles Duelfer showed in his magisterial Iraq Survey Group report) enabled the dictator to prop up the Iraqi economy in the last years of his misrule.

But it is wrong to blame all this on Annan -- members of the Security Council, particularly France, Russia and China, were all busily corrupting the program for their own ends. Even the United States and Britain turned a blind eye to sanctions-busting when it helped their ally Jordan.

Annan tried hard to reform the U.N. system. He has had less success than he'd hoped. In the spring he devised a complicated reform plan that, though supported by John Bolton, then the U.S. ambassador, and agreed on by the Security Council, was scuttled at the last minute by the "Group of 77" developing states. To put it crudely, too many ambassadors and their presidents were frightened of losing too many jobs for their "nieces" in the cozy U.N. system. Annan was deeply disappointed. Blame the members, not him.

Annan has worked endlessly on myriad, often unseen problems. Traveling with him to countries around the world, I was astonished at the number of international calls he had to take daily from leaders begging for help in settling disputes. He dealt with such requests in a calm and conscientious manner that inspired confidence and conciliation.

Darfur has been an agony for Annan the past two years. I was with him in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, in November; at a meeting of the Security Council's "permanent five," he was desperate to get agreement to send a U.N. peacekeeping force into Darfur to stem the mass murders and ethnic cleansing promoted by the Sudanese government.

After a long day of negotiations, hopes rose that Sudan had finally agreed to Annan's plan, but it was a trick: Soon after the meeting, Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, announced that he would allow no such thing.

The bottom line is that, like Slobodan Milosevic, Saddam Hussein and all too many other leaders of member states, Bashir is a gangster and a murderer. It is not Annan's fault that the world has failed to confront Bashir effectively -- the truth is that he has far too much support, tacit if not overt, among African, Arab and other governments. It's the same with Robert Mugabe in Zimbabwe and other despots.

Millions of people around the world place hope in the United Nations. It all too often disappoints. It does do vital things, but there is much it cannot do, and it is stuffed with cronyism and hypocrisy. It reflects the horrors of the world, as well as trying to keep those horrors at bay. Annan has dealt with such problems with more skill, patience and decency than any recent secretary general. If he was unable to create the decent, reformed, efficient and humane organization he sought, that is because far too few of its members want any such thing.

TERRORISM NEWS:

AP: Ex-Guantanamo Detainee Held Again (AP)

By Sadaqat Jan

AP, December 28, 2006

In his chronicle of life as an inmate at Guantanamo Bay, Afghan writer Abdul Rahim Muslim Dost describes his three years of humiliating detention for alleged ties to al-Qaida.

Now, he has lost his liberty again — this time believed jailed by the Pakistani intelligence service for the book's fierce criticism of the agency's role in the U.S.-led war on terrorist groups.

Just weeks after the Sept. 3 release of "The Broken Shackles of Guantanamo," co-written with his brother and fellow Guantanamo detainee Badruz Zaman Badar, Dost was taken away as he left a mosque after prayers in the northwest Pakistan city of Peshawar, where the family has lived for nearly 30 years.

Badar, 36, hasn't seen Dost since and thinks he was detained by Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence. In the book, the brothers condemn the agency as a "black institution" and accuse it of selling them into American custody.

There is no official word on Dost's whereabouts, although the rights group Amnesty International also thinks he is held by the government. Pakistan's military and ISI officials did not respond to requests for comment on Dost's case or the brothers' comments on the agency's conduct.

The brothers are both journalists and run a gemstone business. Dost has written more than 30 books, including poetry, and has edited magazines sympathetic to militant Islam, dating back to support for the Muslim guerrillas who fought Soviet troops occupying Afghanistan in the 1980s.

The brothers were both arrested in Peshawar in November 2001 and transferred to the U.S. military in Afghanistan before being taken to Guantanamo.

According to the book and details from "enemy combatant" review hearings at Guantanamo, the brothers were suspected of having links with Islamic extremists. Dost was accused of running a liaison office for al-Qaida in Herat, Afghanistan. He denied that, and the brothers were eventually freed a few months apart in 2005.

During detention, they were repeatedly questioned about Osama bin Laden and Taliban chief Mullah Omar but insist they never met the two leaders.

"We are not fighters. We are men of letters," Badar told The Associated Press in an interview. "We have criticized the American government for their overseas policies but we do not hate the American public, for they are innocent like us."

The 450-page book alleges guards at Guantanamo committed sexual improprieties, physical abuse and mistreatment of the Quran — reiterating charges made by other freed detainees and denied by the U.S. military.

But with a poetic flourish, the book also offers a look at daily life inside the prison at the U.S. Navy base, where hundreds of suspected Taliban and al-Qaida members have been held since the Sept. 11 terror attacks on America.

Dost grumbles about the prison food and says inmates were not fed chicken joints with big bones in case they could be used as weapons against guards.

He recounts giving lessons on Islam to other inmates using a secret communication system, passing words from cell to cell. He writes that captivity deepened prisoners' Muslim faith and some learned the Quran by heart, which he says helped them endure the indignity of detention.

"Life in Guantanamo jail is close to life in a grave," the book says. "That is because the prisoners in Cuba are neither dead nor alive. They are not dead because they have souls ... (but) they have been deprived of all the rights of living people."

Yet the brothers' bitterest criticism is reserved for the Inter-Services Intelligence agency.

Dost and Badar call its agents "criminals," accusing the ISI of selling the brothers into American custody and of confiscating tens of thousands of dollars worth of jewelry, cash and other goods from their business.

"We have such a strong views against ISI because they are our neighbors, they speak our languages and they claim to share the same religion as we do," Badar told AP.

Pakistani intelligence has been instrumental in arresting hundreds of al-Qaida suspects since 2001, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attack, but human rights campaigners often accuse it of acting above the law.

Dost says ISI agents twice visited the brothers' home in Peshawar trying to prevent them from publishing "The Broken Shackles of Guantanamo." The brothers refused, and it was published on Sept. 3 in Pakistan in their native Pashto language.

On Sept. 29, unidentified men took Dost away from the mosque, bundling him into a jeep and driving off as one of Dost's sons looked on. Dost, who has nine children, hasn't been heard from, and his family fear for his safety.

In a recent report, Amnesty International said Pakistani authorities have violated "custodial safeguards" by not producing Dost in court or allowing him access to a lawyer or his family.

Badar, who has three children, now keeps a low profile running the family business. But he is keen the book is more widely read. He wants to issue translations in English, Arabic, Persian, French and Urdu.

"We want the world to know the facts and so that others don't suffer like us," he said.

Military: Abu Sayyaf Chief Remains Found (AP)

By Paul Alexander, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

Remains believed to be from the chief of the al-Qaida-linked Abu Sayyaf group, who was the target of a monthslong U.S.-backed manhunt, have been found in the southern Philippines, the military said Wednesday.

Khaddafy Janjalani is on a U.S. list of wanted terrorists with a $5 million bounty on his head for a series of beheadings, bombings and mass abductions. He has proven elusive in the dense jungles of the southern Philippines, and earlier reports of his demise have proven to be premature.

Lt. Col. Ariel Caculitan, the Philippine marines spokesman, said the decomposing remains were found buried in a remote part of Jolo island. Janjalani was believed to have been killed in a Sept. 4 clash with marines, Caculitan said, but DNA tests would be needed for confirmation.

"We are not yet officially confirming that it's him. We are still waiting for the results of the DNA examination," Caculitan said. He added the U.S. was providing help in forensic tests.

Caculitan said former Abu Sayyaf members who had surrendered helped troops find the site and claimed Janjalani had been shot in the neck. They said he had been carried dying from the area where he was shot to the burial location more than a mile away.

"If you look at the terrain ... it would not be easy to locate the site without reliable information," Caculitan said.

U.S.-backed Philippine troops launched an offensive on southern Jolo island in August, searching for Janjalani and two cohorts, top Indonesian terror suspects Dulmatin and Umar Patek.

Dulmatin, who goes by one name, and Patek are suspects in the 2002 Bali nightclub bombings that killed 202 people. They are also suspected of providing bomb-making training to Indonesian and Filipino guerrillas.

Janjalani and his key commanders have been charged with several deadly attacks in the Philippines, including a 2004 bombing that gutted a ferry and killed 116 people.

They also abducted three Americans and 17 Filipinos from a resort in May 2001, sparking a yearlong kidnapping spree that eventually involved 102 hostages. Eighteen, including one American, were beheaded or hacked to death.

U.S. military counterterrorism experts were dispatched to the Philippines in response to the abductions, and they are credited with helping decimate the terror group. The military currently estimates the Abu Sayyaf to have only 400 armed men left in Jolo and outlying provinces.

Still, Abu Sayyaf has shown itself to be resilient. Guerrillas were suspected of carrying out three recent bombings in the southern Philippines, including one that killed six people on Oct. 10.

Abu Sayyaf says it is fighting to create a Muslim state in the southern Philippines, which has a large Muslim population. The government calls them bandits who survive on the ransom money they are able to extract from abductions.

Abu Sayyaf's founder is Janjalani's brother, Abdurajak Abubakar Janjalani, who fought in Afghanistan before he was killed in a clash with Filipino police in late 1998. A third brother, Hector, was sentenced to life in prison two years ago for abducting American Jeffrey Schilling in August 2000. Schilling managed to escape eight months later.

US, Philippine Military Check On Death Of Abu Sayyaf Leader (AFP)

AFP, December 28, 2006

The United States is helping the Philippine government identify the remains of a man said to be the elusive leader of the Al Qaeda-linked Abu Sayyaf terror group, the Philippine military chief has said.

General Hermogenes Esperon said US and Filipino forensics experts were now working on DNA samples to establish whether the body was that of Khadaffy Janjalani.

DOJ_NMG_0109742

He told reporters in Manila the DNA would be checked against that of Khadaffy's older brother Hector Janjalani, now in jail in Manila.

The decomposing body was recovered from a shallow grave outside Patikul town on the southern island of Jolo Wednesday, Marine spokesman Lieutenant Colonel Ariel Caculitan said.

"Our counterparts, the American forces that are there have also taken a sample (tissue) so that they could make their own DNA tests," Esperon told reporters in Manila.

Janjalani's death would be a severe blow to the Abu Sayyaf, a small gang of self-styled Islamic militants that once received funding from Osama bin Laden, he said.

Janjalani has been reported killed several times in the past, only to embarrass the government by launching deadly terror attacks.

Caculitan said reports that Janjalani had been killed surfaced in September as troops launched a massive manhunt on Jolo involving more than 5,000 soldiers.

He would not say why the body was only recovered Wednesday.

Troops meanwhile are continuing to hunt down Jemaah Islamiyah (JI) militants Umar Patek and Dulmatin, whom Abu Sayyaf militants are believed to be protecting on the island.

Both men are wanted for the October 2002 night club bombings in Bali, Indonesia, in which 202 mostly foreign tourists were killed.

JI and Abu Sayyaf are both on the US government's list of foreign terrorist organizations. Under Janjalani, the Abu Sayyaf launched kidnapping raids targetting American, European and Asian tourists earlier in the decade.

Two of three American hostages kidnapped in 2001 were killed in captivity.

The US government has offered a five million dollar reward for any information leading to the killing or arrest of Janjalani.

Khadaffy Janjalani took over command of the Abu Sayyaf when his brother, Afghan-trained Islamic firebrand Abubakar Abdurajak Janjalani, who founded the group, was killed in a gunfight with police in 1998.

Austin Lawyer's Afghani Client Released (AAS)

By Chuck Lindell, AMERICAN-STATESMAN STAFF

Austin American-Statesman, December 28, 2006

Once called an enemy combatant, man freed from Guantánamo after 3 1/2 years

The news arrived in cloak-and-dagger fashion, but for Austin lawyer Dicky Grigg, it was welcome nonetheless.

Mohammad Akhtiar, his Afghani client who was held as an enemy combatant for 3 1/2 years at the U.S. Naval Station at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, was back in his homeland and traveling toward a reunion with his wife and nine children.

"One, I'm very pleased and excited that he's released and back to his family," Grigg said. "But then, you have to consider that 3 1/2 years were taken out of his life. I'm glad he's home, but it makes you frustrated."

Grigg was among a loose-knit group of lawyers who represented, at no charge, many of the imprisoned enemy combatants in the belief that detention without review by a civilian court violated a basic principle of the U.S. system of justice.

The "Guantánamo Bar Association" clashed with the Bush administration over where to draw the line between combating terrorism and safeguarding constitutional rights — producing a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in June that allowed detainees to petition for writs of habeas corpus, which challenge the legality of detentions, in federal court.

The Republican-led Congress, saying classified information could be placed at risk in federal court proceedings, followed with legislation stripping federal courts of authority to hear cases from Guantánamo. Detainee cases instead will be heard by military commissions, where an officer acts as judge and at least three officers serve as jurors.

Grigg's first inkling that he and his client were no longer part of the ongoing legal battle came in a cryptic Nov. 15 e-mail from a U.S. Justice Department lawyer.

Protected information on Akhtiar's case had been filed with a federal court in Washington, D.C., Grigg was told. After returning a signed verification that he wouldn't disclose its contents, Grigg was provided with a notice saying Akhtiar would be returned to Afghanistan in about 30 days for whatever action that country deemed appropriate. No further explanation was given for his release.

Grigg also received permission to discuss the notice with Akhtiar — accused of launching a rocket attack against a U.S. base in Afghanistan in 2003 — to see if he would fight the transfer.

The Dec. 13 telephone call was monitored by a government lawyer to make sure no classified information was discussed in the three-way conversation among Grigg, Akhtiar and a Virginia translator who spoke the Pashto language.

Grigg, who did some checking and learned that every transferred detainee had been released by the Afghan government, got the answer he was expecting.

"He definitely wanted to go home," Grigg said. "But since it was protected information, I could not tell anyone, even his family, until the government made it public."

Grigg heard no more until Dec. 16 media reports from Kabul indicated that seven men had been transferred from Guantánamo and released by the Afghan government. He asked the Justice Department if Akhtiar was among the seven. In response, he received permission to discuss Akhtiar's release.

A quick e-mail to Akhtiar's relatives revealed that the Afghan government had already informed them of Akhtiar's arrival and freedom.

"They were en route to get him. Then they were taking him to Pakistan," where his wife and children are living in a refugee camp, Grigg said.

Akhtiar was among 17 Guantánamo detainees transferred Dec. 16 to five nations based on recommendations from U.S. military review boards, the Defense Department said. This year, 114 detainees have been returned to their home nations, leaving 395 still in custody at Guantánamo.

Another 85 detainees are eligible for transfer, Pentagon records show.

Grigg, a personal injury lawyer who typically sues insurance companies, has yet to hear from Akhtiar, whom he met only once during an intense visit to Guantánamo in March.

Akhtiar, 56 at the time, was seated in a folding chair and chained to the floor. Grigg had to remove all staples and paper clips from his papers before the meeting, and his notes were sealed and sent to a secure court facility in Virginia, where Grigg had to travel to review the classified information compiled about his client. Details of his conversation with Akhtiar remain classified.

Grigg, who said working for Akhtiar was the most moving experience of his 33-year career, is ready for more.

He already has a security clearance obtained after an FBI investigation. And he has been schooled in habeas law by the Center for Constitutional Rights, a New York nonprofit group that is coordinating representation for the detainees.

"I notified the Center for Constitutional Rights that if they got another one, I will take it. I think the more pressure you get, the more you get done," he said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Airport Tries To Get Handle On Bag Theft (HC)

By Rad Sallee, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 28, 2006

A team of thieves or inside job at Bush could be to blame for dumped luggage

The 68 pieces of baggage that turned up in a trash bin Tuesday near George Bush Intercontinental Airport were probably stolen by a team of thieves in a single day's work while airline staffers were stretched thin by the demands of holiday travel, a Texas travel adviser theorized Wednesday.

"It sounds like a hit-or-miss holiday grab bag," said Tom Parsons, of Arlington, who operates Bestfares.com. "They probably grabbed enough to fill up a little van, then went off somewhere and rifled through it."

Another possibility — an inside job, with somebody taking the luggage on its way from the airplanes to the baggage-claim area — was not something investigators would talk about.

Meanwhile, it looked like business as usual at Bush on Wednesday. In Terminal C, the airport's busiest, hurried travelers whisked their bags off the carousel and headed for exits without anyone in authority checking whether the numbers on the ticket matched those on the bags.

Parsons said it is costly for the airlines to pay tag-checkers. It is a job that neither the Houston Airport System, which oversees operations at Bush and Hobby, nor the federal Transportation Security Administration performs.

Continental Airlines spokeswoman Mary Clark said many travelers would object to the delay that checking would cause. The airline does not check tags against bags, she said.

Not checking is standard practice at most U.S. airports, Parsons said, but checks are more frequent elsewhere. He said his bags were checked recently when he picked them up in San Juan, Puerto Rico.

Although 68 bags may seem "an amazing number" to steal from carousels, it's not that hard to do for a gang, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0109744

"We had something like that in Dallas. A group of guys would go from one terminal to another and pick up a couple of bags each place and throw them into their car," he said. The group would later hold garage sales to sell their loot, including the luggage, he said.

At Bush, Parsons speculated, "Those guys were working at different terminals, they took their time and then moved on.

"When you look at the number of terminals and the number of places where you can pick up your bags, it doesn't take that many stops before you've got 70."

"Some bags will sit there on the carousel and go around for three or four laps, and that's a good sign of a missed connection. It doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out that maybe nobody is going to claim this bag," he said.

Airlines have personnel to remove those bags to prevent theft, but sometimes they're busy elsewhere, Parsons said.

Houston Police Department spokesman Gabe Ortiz said investigators have returned all the bags to Continental after gathering what evidence they could. "We were trying to fingerprint, but not all surfaces will hold prints," he said.

Clark said Continental will distribute the bags to the airlines involved and will deliver them free of charge to Continental passengers as soon as they can be identified and located. Those who are missing luggage should file a complaint with their airline, she said.

9 airlines involvedInvestigators and Continental released few details about the investigation and did not disclose the airlines, flight origins and destinations involved.

An HPD news release said the luggage, found at 230 Bammel Westfield in north Harris County, came from "as many as nine different airlines."

The statement said police are working with customs officials and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, but an FBI spokesman said the agency is no longer on the case.

Although the Houston Airport System has security cameras throughout the airport, investigators declined to say whether they are checking the videotapes.

Some of the bags reportedly came through Terminal D, which handles most international flights. There, arriving passengers pick up their baggage in a customs area closed to the public. It was not clear how thieves obtained access there, if they did.

FBI spokesman Orlando Muñoz said there is no evidence that the incident exposed any national security or terrorism vulnerabilities.

Federal officials and Parsons agreed that so few bags are stolen across the country that it is difficult to compare baggage security among airports and airlines.

In October, the last month for which U.S. Department of Transportation statistics are available, Continental reported 6.09 "mishandled" bags per 1,000 passengers, or one bag per 164 passengers.

But almost all of those complaints involve late-arriving baggage, often caused by missed connecting flights, Clark said.

"Of all the baggage that we carry, less than 1 percent doesn't arrive with the customer, and of that, 98 percent is returned to the customer within 24 hours," she said.

Baggage theft is rare, said Clark, who has worked with Continental for 15 years.

To make sure that your recovered baggage gets back to you, Clark advised, "have your name, address and phone on the inside as well as the outside, in case the (identification) tag is removed."

Parsons added that it's also a good idea to put your destination hotel address in the bag.

Clark said she doesn't know how long the Bush passengers will have to wait to retrieve their bags.

Corzine's Chemical Security Stance Draws Scrutiny A Year Into His New Job (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

As a United States senator, Jon S. Corzine was relentless in warning that the nation's chemical plants, and the railways that carry their potentially dangerous cargo, are vulnerable to a devastating terror attack.

He traveled the country promoting legislation to force many manufacturers to use fewer toxic chemicals. In 2004, he even stood outside a chlorine plant in northern New Jersey, pointing out its flimsy security to a camera crew from "60 Minutes."

But in the 11 months since he was sworn in as New Jersey's governor, Mr. Corzine has taken a far more measured approach to the issue, disappointing some of the chemical security experts who helped him form his proposals in the Senate. These advocates say that the Corzine administration has made little tangible progress on increasing security at the 15 New Jersey chemical plants, and that each plant poses a threat to 100,000 people or more. They accuse the governor of being too intent on appeasing the chemical industry, which provides more than 80,000 jobs in the state.

"We have no indication that he's changed his mind on this issue, so it's a matter of him not being very effective," said Rick Hind, legislative director of the Greenpeace Toxics Campaign. "At this rate it will take, literally, 40 years to get the problem solved, and you just hope that that's not too late."

Governor Corzine and his staff say that they have quietly pressured companies and railroads to beef up plant security and switch to safer technology.

The administration says two dozen utility plants and three chemical plants have switched to technology that reduces or eliminates the use of the most dangerous chemicals.

These are results that Mr. Corzine calls encouraging, especially given the state's limited ability to regulate railways. He has also proposed more training programs and background checks for chemical employees, as well as terror preparation drills. And he said that he might double the number of companies subject to the strictest regulations, which now includes 45 plants.

"We've taken a whole series of steps," Mr. Corzine said in a recent interview, "from simplistic things like walls and perimeter security in the places of highest concentration of chemicals, to a greater understanding of what's in parked rail cars and greater cooperation in storing and moving of the rail cars. What we're doing is very close to what we wanted to do right from the beginning."

Mr. Corzine's approach to domestic security illustrates a basic reality of government: sweeping changes are sometimes easier to propose as a legislator in the minority party than to carry out as an executive in power.

As the nation scrambled to fend off possible terrorist attacks in the wake of the 9/11 attacks, Mr. Corzine quickly emerged as a leading advocate on chemical security. Coming from a state with so many chemical plants — the F.B.I. called one stretch in New Jersey "the most dangerous two miles in America" — Mr. Corzine argued that voluntary efforts by industry and stronger perimeter security at plants were not enough. He wanted government to push manufacturers to switch to "inherently safer technology" and to eliminate the use of toxic chemicals wherever feasible.

That aggressive stance won him praise in Washington, even though legislation championed by Mr. Corzine, a Democrat, stood little chance of becoming law at a time when Republicans controlled Congress and the White House. In his state, the chemical lobby posted billboards along the New Jersey Turnpike reminding residents of the jobs in the industry, conservative editorials called Mr. Corzine a radical environmentalist, and some business groups questioned his patriotism.

Hal Bozarth, executive director of the Chemical Industry Council of New Jersey, said that when Mr. Corzine was sworn in as governor last January, industry officials greeted him with a reminder that companies across the state had already spent more than $100 million on security — and with a promise of cooperation.

During much of Mr. Corzine's first year in office, that cooperation has centered on following up on an initiative started by his predecessor, Acting Gov. Richard J. Codey, who mandated that all chemical companies identify what safer processes might be available in their industry.

Elaine Makatura, a spokeswoman for the State Department of Environmental Protection, said inspectors have found that virtually every company has completed its safety plan. She said the state expected to issue its report on the issue early next year, several months after initially promised.

But those rules do not require the companies to adopt the safer processes if they deem them too expensive. And chemical safety advocates, like Rick Engler of the Work Environment Council, say it is often hard to know how much progress has been made because the state has been unwilling to release much information.

State environmental officials have acknowledged that many of the state's most dangerous plants continue to use and store stockpiles of toxic chemicals near major population centers. That would include the chlorine plant in Kearny, in Hudson County, only about 10 miles from Midtown Manhattan, which Mr. Corzine toured with the "60 Minutes" crew.

Richard Cañas, director of the New Jersey Office of Homeland Security and Preparedness, said the Corzine administration has had difficulty convincing businesses that switching to safer technology is worth the price, which can run into tens of millions of dollars at a single plant. "To the extent that replacing technology is going to break the bank, they're not willing to go that far," Mr. Cañas said. "It's always money that impedes what you'd like to do."

Dealing with the railroads has been an even trickier challenge for the administration because the railways are regulated by the federal government. Mr. Corzine said state regulators have had discussions with railroad executives, who have agreed to use more decoy cars, store fewer toxic chemicals on unguarded railway sidings and keep closer track of chemicals throughout the shipping process.

The state is also considering building a 10-foot fence along a 2.6-mile stretch of the turnpike to shield the railway siding from autos and potential terrorists on the roadway. But Mr. Cañas said that the $6 million fence might not be necessary if the railroads follow through on their pledge not to store the tanker cars full of potentially dangerous gases near the highway.

Though Governor Corzine is now entrenched in Trenton, he once again finds himself lobbying Congress for stricter regulations on the rail shipment of toxic chemicals. He has also urged the federal government not to override New Jersey's tougher chemical security measures if Congress enacts a new law on the issue.

But the governor said that he did not believe it was necessary to further strengthen state laws by mandating a switch to safer technology.

"I think people in the industry are worried that if we don't get results we may use the super hammer," he said, referring to such a mandate. "So we've gotten much better response because we've done this in a sensible, realistic manner."

Privileges Found Not To Apply In Sept. 11-Related Insurance Case (LAW)

By Beth Bar, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, December 28, 2006

The insurance broker representing Century 21 Department Stores in its efforts to regain compensation for millions in damages it sustained to its lower Manhattan store following the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks has won a partial attempt to force the insurer overseeing the claim to produce documents it said were privileged.

Southern District of New York Judge Robert W. Sweet, in OneBeacon Insurance Co. v. Forman International, 04 Civ. 2271, held that OneBeacon Insurance Co. and its attorneys at Cozen O'Connor failed to prove that the attorney-client or work product privileges should be applied in connection with the documents in dispute.

Sweet also held that, because neither OneBeacon nor its counsel selectively withheld documents based on content, the fairness doctrine could not be applied to this case.

OneBeacon reached a settlement with Century 21 in March 2003 to pay the store $143 million to fully release claims. The insurer later asserted it overpaid the retailer by $52.4 million because Century 21's broker, Forman International, improperly agreed on the retailer's behalf to delete a standard business interruption provision in favor of the business interruption provision proposed by Century 21.

Katrina Evacuees On The Clock To Appeal (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees whose federal housing funding was cut off this summer may be eligible for renewed payments, but face a tight deadline to seek them.

Under a court order, the Federal Emergency Management Agency sent letters to about 4,000 storm victims in Texas last week, explaining why they were deemed no longer eligible for aid. A federal judge ruled the original letters unconstitutional because they contained only hard-to-decipher computer codes and agency jargon.

With the new letters, storm victims can appeal the decision to FEMA and may be eligible for renewed housing payments of about $750 a month.

But the program is set to expire at the end of February and the appeal process can take up to three months. U.S. District Judge Richard Leon, who has called the agency's housing program a "legal disaster" said Wednesday that he wanted to speed up the appeals.

"This is not going to be a run-out-the-clock operation," Leon said. "I have no reason to believe FEMA wants that, but if this court gets the impression for one second that FEMA is trying to run the clock out, this court is not going to tolerate that."

First, the agency must locate the victims. After the housing aid was cut off, many families moved or were evicted. So far, only 32 letters were confirmed received and 174 were returned as undeliverable.

Leon gave FEMA until Thursday morning to come up with a way for local governments and social services groups to use the federal aid database to notify victims that they might be eligible for housing assistance.

"It's not enough to have FEMA doing this. We need others helping," Leon said.

Leon originally ordered FEMA to immediately restore the housing program and provide back pay to people who were denied it but a federal appeals court put that ruling on hold last week.

Michael Kirkpatrick, an attorney for the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now said families should appeal as quickly as possible because, if FEMA extends the housing assistance past the end of February, only those families already in the program will receive money.

FEMA has said it appropriately denied aid to ineligible families, such as those whose houses are livable or those who have other homes to live in.

WAR NEWS:

Bush And Security Advisers To Meet Today On Iraq Strategy (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Josh White

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

CRAWFORD, Tex., Dec. 27 -- President Bush's top national security advisers arrived here to hone a new Iraq strategy that administration officials said seems increasingly likely to include a surge of additional troops to try to help stabilize the country.

Although officials have said no decisions will be made in the Crawford meeting, Bush seems to be laying the groundwork for one more sustained effort to defeat the Iraq insurgency and stabilize the country politically. Two defense officials said Wednesday that some sort of troop increase appears likely in an effort to contain the violence but that the specific size and nature of such a surge still has to be worked out.

White House spokesman Scott Stanzel took a swipe at Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, for his comment Tuesday that ordering more troops to Iraq would do little to address the underlying political problems fostering violence.

"I would hope that Senator Biden would wait to hear what the president has to say before announcing what he's opposed to," Stanzel told reporters here.

The president arrived in Crawford this week for a working holiday that includes a meeting Thursday morning with his top national security advisers, including Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates. Rice and Gates conferred informally with Bush at his Texas ranch Wednesday afternoon, a White House official said.

Top military officials have said that they are open to sending more U.S. troops to Iraq if there is a specific strategic mission for them, though there are doubts whether a small increase, or one that is short in duration, can accomplish much. Another reason for a surge would be to accelerate the buildup of U.S. trainers helping Iraqi forces.

The Pentagon announced Wednesday that Gates has approved the deployment of an Army brigade to Kuwait to stand by as the U.S. Central Command's theater reserve force, which means that more than 3,000 U.S. troops will probably move to the region early next month. Although those forces could be used to effect a surge, they are replacing a smaller Marine unit that moved into Iraq this fall and is usually ready for use anywhere in the region.

Officials said Gates is bringing to Crawford suggestions for a comprehensive approach to the problem, emphasizing the need for economic and diplomatic components alongside any military action. One idea that has been picking up steam in recent weeks is a new jobs plan as officials push to open as many as 10 state-owned factories around Iraq by the end of January. Commanders believe putting young Iraqi men to work could make a serious dent in sectarian violence, and an official familiar with the program said Gates plans to brief the president on it.

The idea that Bush would increase troop levels in Iraq after elections in which Republicans lost control of both chambers of Congress, partly because of his Iraq policy, appears to be creating some restiveness among Democrats.

Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), the new chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said that other than the removal of Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary, there's "very little sign that the president got the message the voters were sending when it comes to Iraq," adding: "Any decision to escalate in Iraq would suggest that the president is either politically tone deaf or deliberately ignoring the will of the vast majority of the American people."

But Gary Schmitt of the conservative American Enterprise Institute, which has close ties to the administration, said he believes Bush is unhappy with the advice he has been getting, especially from the Iraq Study Group, which has proposed trying to remove combat troops by early 2008. "All he was getting was various options for getting out," Schmitt said.

"No president wants to be remembered as the guy who lost a war," he said. "Who knows whether this is a day late and a dollar short, but it is a striking example of presidential will trying to bend the system to what he wants."

The White House has said that Bush will formally unveil his plans for Iraq sometime after the first of the year.

Bush Staff Bristles At Troop Level Criticism (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

CRAWFORD, Texas — The White House responded sharply today to a senior Democratic senator's criticism of possible increases in the U.S. military deployment in Iraq, ahead of President Bush's meeting on Thursday with senior national security advisors at his ranch.

The session was called to review one more time the options available to Bush as he nears the launching of a new strategy in Iraq, a course that is widely believed to include the possibility of sending additional troops there.

Deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel took issue with Sen. Joseph R. Biden, Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who said on Tuesday that any troop increase would be "the absolute wrong strategy."

Bush has not said whether he will announce an increase in the approximately 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, when he presents his plans in a speech to the nation as early as next week.

But officials have said he is considering such a course, and leading U.S. military officials in Iraq have backed away from their earlier skepticism that sending more troops would stem the sectarian and insurgent violence that continues to take a heavy toll on Iraqi citizens and the U.S. military.

"I hope that Sen. Biden would wait to hear what the president has to say before announcing what he's opposed to," Stanzel said.

Bush plans to meet with most of the members of the National Security Council this morning. Stanzel said that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates were headed here today. They would be joined on Thursday at Bush's ranch by Vice President Dick Cheney, Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Stephen Hadley, the president's national security advisor, and J.D. Crouch, the deputy national security advisor.

The spokesman said they would be considering "all the potential options, making sure that due consideration is given to the next steps, making sure that we're thinking through the new way forward in Iraq, to take into account all of the differing views."

He reiterated earlier White House declarations that the meeting would not produce specific decisions on Iraq war policy.

The White House has said Bush was likely to deliver a speech on his new plans in early January, a timetable that remains in effect, Stanzel said.

But the timing of the president's announcement, the spokesman said, "largely depends on how comfortable he is with the information he's receiving, making sure that we've thought through all the parameters of any options."

On a related matter, Stanzel played down the potential impact that the execution of Saddam Hussein could have on security in Iraq. An appeals court there said Tuesday his death sentence must be carried out within 30 days.

"That is a matter for the Iraqi people and we are observers to that process," the spokesman said on the execution's timing. Asked whether the execution would have an impact on the preparation of a new policy, if it leads to increased violence, he said:

"The enemy has always used just about any excuse they could find to foment violence, and that is not new."

Latest Blue-Ribbon Panel Awaits Its Own Fate (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

For every impossible problem that official Washington faces, there is a blue-ribbon panel, and for every panel there is a predictable life cycle, which the Iraq Study Group has so far followed to a fault.

First, the unrealistic expectations, fueled by feverish news coverage, including speculation and leaks about just what might be proposed. Next, the report's grand unveiling, complete with White House photo op, this time featuring President Bush with the co-chairmen, James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton.

And then, inevitably, the letdown.

Remember, for example, the Social Security commission of 2001? Neither do most Americans. The question now is whether a similar demise awaits the report of the Iraq Study Group — impeccably researched, comprehensive, bipartisan and having no legal authority beyond that of friendly advice.

One of its main proposals, the idea of talking to Iran and Syria, was swiftly brushed off by Mr. Bush. Now the administration seems to be leaning toward a temporary increase in American troops, an option the group said it "could support" if requested by commanders but did not endorse.

But whether this group, too, ends up as a footnote to history, or becomes the framework for a new war policy, is unlikely to be settled until well into the new year.

"I don't think it's dead at all," said Warren B. Rudman, the former Republican senator from New Hampshire and a veteran of such panels himself. "Whether its recommendations will ultimately be followed is another question. But with the Democrats in charge of Congress, its findings will certainly get a hearing."

National commissions have been a staple of Washington tradecraft since at least 1908, when the National Monetary Commission began setting out proposals that led to the Federal Reserve System. Others, too, have had substantive results. The National Screw Thread Commission of 1925 helped solve a problem that now seems obscure but once was quite critical — the mismatch of nonstandard hardware, including hoses with fire hydrants and nuts with bolts.

In more recent years, commissions have investigated presidential assassinations, space shuttle disasters and intelligence failures. Robert A. Dallek, the presidential historian, has studied how President Lyndon B. Johnson ignored the recommendations of his own commission on the urban riots of the 1960s. In the current debate over Iraq, Mr. Dallek sees that history repeating itself.

"The impression I have is the Iraq Study Group's report is slowly being eclipsed, fading to the margins, because there's no indication that President Bush will accept its recommendations," he said.

Unlike many such panels, the Iraq Study Group was appointed not by the president but by Congress; the White House only later lent its support, offering additional government financing for the group's visit to Iraq in August.

Mr. Baker's status as a top adviser to Mr. Bush's father has led to speculation that the current president may not want to appear too eager to accept the group's recommendations, particularly on Iran and Syria, which have been roundly criticized on the Republican right.

On Tuesday, Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. , the Delaware Democrat who will become chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee next month, repeatedly cited the Iraq Study Group as a touchstone for Iraq hearings he plans beginning Jan. 9. But the study group rejected Mr. Biden's central idea for the Iraqi future, a division of the country into separately administered Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish regions. Still, it is too early to write an obituary for the panel.

Mr. Bush, who will preside over a National Security Council meeting on Iraq at his Texas ranch on Thursday, has promised to announce a new war strategy next month. Even if he rejects the most prominent of the group's 79 proposals, they may remain relevant options for the future.

Mr. Rudman keenly understands that possibility. He served as co-chairman with former Senator Gary Hart of Colorado of a commission on national security whose 1999 report predicted terrorist attacks, saying "Americans will die on American soil, possibly in large numbers." Its recommendations were duly ignored — until the 2001 attacks, when many were put into effect.

Daniel P. Serwer, the former diplomat who served as the Iraq Study Group's executive director, argues that whatever Mr. Bush decides, the panel has already had a profound effect on the policy debate, particularly by declaring its candid judgment that the situation in Iraq is "grave and deteriorating."

"The government went from saying, 'We've got this under control,' to ordering new assessments left, right and center," said Mr. Serwer, vice president for peace and stability operations at the United States Institute of Peace.

He said the administration was likely to accept dozens of the 79 recommendations, including "milestones" it sets for the Iraqi government over the next year.

"I'm quite convinced that when you get the administration's new assessments, along with Congress's hearings and evaluations, what you come up with may be very much like the Iraq Study Group's recommendations," Mr. Serwer said.

The national 9/11 commission had perhaps the greatest impact of any such inquiry in recent years, producing a best-selling book and recommendations that have reshaped the government. Emulating the 9/11 report, the Iraq Study Group issued a commercial paperback of its report that has topped nonfiction best-seller lists this month.

Between the book, with 250,000 copies in print, and more than 1.5 million downloads of the report from the group's main Web site and many thousands elsewhere, staff members estimate that at least three million Americans have seen the report. But there are no plans to campaign for the proposals as the 9/11 commission did, said Ian Larsen, a spokesman for the study group.

"No sales job, no road show," Mr. Larsen said.

Still, the group's work has been far more public than that of the so-called Wise Men who advised President Johnson at a similar crisis in the conduct of the Vietnam War. A dozen distinguished elder statesmen and military commanders who were gathered by Clark M. Clifford in March 1968, just after he was named secretary of defense, they gave their advice largely in private.

In a parallel move, Mr. Bush has also switched defense secretaries at a critical moment in a war that many Americans believe has gone wrong. His choice was a member of the Iraq Study Group, Robert M. Gates, who, Mr. Serwer recalled, "did a whole lot of reading" on Iraq in the months he served on the panel.

To Win In Iraq (WT)

By Fred Gedrich And Paul E. Vallely

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

Most Americans desire an effective change in current Iraq war strategy and the wider global war against Islamic extremists and nations supporting them. President Bush and the new U.S. defense secretary, Robert Gates, could deliver it by placing experienced unconventional warfare leaders in charge of the war effort.

Since forcibly removing Saddam Hussein from power in 2003, the U.S.-led coalition has been unable to quell insurgent-, terrorist- and sectarian-generated violence concentrated mostly in four of 18 provinces and Greater Baghdad which are dominated by majority-Sunni populations. About 150,000 Iraqis and nearly 3,000 Americans have died during continuing hostilities.

While many Americans recognize that the conflict in Iraq is not going well and changes need to be made, there is substantial disagreement at the national level on a military strategy. The United States is seriously considering adding several combat brigades from outside Iraq to "purge" Baghdad and several provinces infested with local and foreign troublemakers. Sending an additional 20,000 U.S. troops to Iraq under current military strategies and rules of engagement will be unlikely to make much difference.

Unlike U.S.-led coalition troops, the adversaries in this war do not carry arms openly, wear uniforms or insignias and abide by other laws and customs of wars specified in Geneva Conventions and protocols. They instill fear in military opponents and local populations through use of suicide bombings, improvised explosive devices, kidnappings and beheadings. And they disguise themselves as civilians and hide among civilian populations with weapons stored and discharged from mosques, schools, hospitals, marketplaces, private residences and public roads.

To prevail, the United States has to transition from a conventional to an unconventional war footing and make the enemy pay a heavy price for its despicable tactics. In Iraq and elsewhere, traditional troops, weapons and tactics are less useful than tools of influence, covert operations and intelligence brought to the battlefield by special operators working harmoniously with indigenous forces and local populations. The prime objective is to create a climate of fear within enemy ranks that breaks its will to continue the armed insurrection against the freely elected Iraqi government.

Special Operations Forces (Rangers, Seals, Delta Force and other special units) leaders and troops are uniquely qualified for this mission. Special operators played prominent and successful roles in removing Afghanistan's Taliban regime from power and disrupting al Qaeda's terror base. In Iraq, they have spent most of their time searching for the infamous "deck of cards," the elusive WMD arsenal, and high-value insurgents and terrorists.

Joint special operators (from all military branches) are also trained in local cultures and languages, making it easier for them to embed in local populations and Iraqi security forces and collect information which in turn may be used to "hunt and kill" hostile forces. In addition, they can win "hearts and minds" of local populations through civil affairs work and performance of psychological operations against enemies of the freely elected Iraqi Government.

In January 2003, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld designated the U.S. Special Operations Command (USSOCOM) as the lead military organization to prosecute the global war on terror but unfortunately that has not materialized. Although stellar Army commanding Gens. John Abizaid (retiring early next year) and George Casey continue to lead Middle East war operations and troops in Iraq respectively, they are products of the traditional warfare school. Moreover, nearly all of the 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq are, too.

It's time to alter U.S. strategy by putting USSOCOM generals and admirals truly in command of the global war. And in Iraq, conventional forces could best serve by providing ground, air and sea support to USSOCOM and Iraqi security forces and sealing Iraq's porous borders with hostile and/or dubious neighbors in Iran, Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia to prevent foreign jihadists, arms and sophisticated munitions from entering the country.

The action will surely meet resistance throughout DoD's conventional warfare ranks, their industry partners and congressional allies. The U.S. active-duty military force consists of 1.4 million troops, of which only about 50,000 are elite special operators, with only several thousand deployed to Iraq. Many military professionals prefer to have special operators continue in a supporting, not leading, role.

Immediately after recently assuming his new post, Mr. Gates correctly stated that the United States must win in Iraq or face a "calamity" that would "endanger Americans for decades to come." Since the fall of Baghdad, the United States has had the will to win but not the right strategy. It's imperative that the United States transition quickly to an unconventional war strategy with USSOCOM generals and/or admirals in charge, or the war will be lost.

Army Brigade Headed To Kuwait (WP)

By Josh White And Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

A brigade of U.S. Army troops is scheduled to deploy to Kuwait early next month to take over as the U.S. Central Command's theater reserve force, which means more than 3,000 additional U.S. troops will move into the region and could be used to support combat in Iraq, Pentagon officials announced yesterday.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates approved sending the 2nd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division overseas after Gen. John P. Abizaid, who leads Central Command, requested the forces to replace the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, which was sent into the western province of Anbar this fall. Abizaid requested a brigade -- which is significantly larger than the Marine unit -- to allow for greater flexibility in the region.

While defense officials have said the move is not part of an orchestrated "surge" of forces into Iraq, should such a surge become part of U.S. strategy for the war, the Army brigade could be used as the leading edge of a troop increase.

Also yesterday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of three more U.S. service members.

A Marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team 5 died yesterday during fighting in Anbar. A soldier died in a vehicle rollover during a combat reconnaissance mission south of the capital Tuesday. And a soldier with the 13th Sustainment Command died as a result of noncombat injuries on a U.S. military base about 50 miles north of Baghdad on Saturday.

Meanwhile, two Iranians remained in custody after being detained during a raid by U.S.-led forces on Dec. 21. Ten people were captured in that raid, which occurred in Baghdad, according to Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq.

Caldwell said troops found documents, maps, photographs and videos indicating that some of the detainees were involved in illegal activities. He did not specify what those activities were. Three other Iranians were detained on Dec. 20 but were released to the Iraqi government. The incident had sparked a flurry of diplomatic activity by Iraqi officials to secure the Iranians' release.

Close Adviser To Sadr Dies In U.S.-Iraqi Raid (WP)

By Nancy Trejos And Sudarsan Raghavan, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 27 -- A top deputy of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr was killed Wednesday during a raid by U.S. and Iraqi troops in the southern holy city of Najaf, sparking protests from Sadr's followers and complicating an already tense relationship with the powerful anti-American leader.

Hurling rocks and shouting expletives, thousands of angry Sadr loyalists marched through the streets of Najaf after Sahib al-Amiri was shot and killed by a U.S. soldier during an early morning raid. "Agents and stooges!" protesters shouted at Iraqi soldiers and local authorities.

U.S. military officials declined to confirm that Amiri was a Sadr aide, saying only that he had provided explosives for use against Iraqi and American forces. Sadr officials said Amiri was an aide and a lawyer who ran an educational organization that helped orphans and impoverished children. They said he had no connections to illegal activity.

In a statement, the U.S. military said Iraqi and American forces were trying to detain Amiri and shot him only when he pointed an assault rifle at an Iraqi soldier.

The incident comes at a delicate time for the Iraqi political process. Sadr, who runs one of the country's most feared militias, is also a potent political force; his allies control 30 seats in parliament and four key ministries. Last month, influential politicians linked with Sadr suspended their participation in the government to protest a meeting between Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and President Bush in Jordan. Unable to pass legislation without Sadr's support, and fearing Iraq's government could collapse, other Shiite leaders have been appealing for an end to the boycott.

Bahaa al-Araji, a senior legislator with Sadr's Shiite Muslim party, said discussions about a return to government had been scheduled for Wednesday but were delayed by Amiri's death. "Because of this problem, we'll leave everything for a few days," he said.

The raid also complicates matters for Maliki, a Shiite who is politically beholden to Sadr and has been criticized by U.S. officials for not doing enough to rein in Sadr's Mahdi Army militia. Two Maliki advisers said that in recent weeks the prime minister has been trying to persuade Sadr to rejoin the political process and disarm his militia, which launched two major uprisings against U.S. forces in Najaf in 2004. The killing of Amiri, they worried, could hinder those efforts.

"We need calm. We don't need more troubles," said Sami al-Askari, a member of parliament and a close Maliki adviser.

On Wednesday, Maliki asked senior U.S. commanders to explain the motive for Wednesday's raid, advisers to the prime minister said. One adviser, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Maliki has set up a committee to investigate the incident, underscoring his concern that the raid could trigger further violence and dissuade Sadr from political engagement.

Within Maliki's circle, some advisers questioned whether Amiri was deliberately killed, said a senior Maliki adviser who spoke on condition of anonymity.

A raid involving American forces in Najaf is particularly embarrassing for Maliki. Last week, in an elaborate ceremony, the U.S.-led coalition handed over control of Najaf to Iraqi forces.

"The agreement between the two sides when the security profile was transferred to the Iraqi side is that the Iraqi side should know about any operations or actions done by the multinational forces," said Sadiq al-Rikabi, a political adviser to Maliki.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S military spokesman in Iraq, told reporters in Baghdad that the raid was led by 35 soldiers from the 8th Iraqi Army Division Forces, with eight U.S. troops serving as advisers.

"It was an Iraqi-led, planned operation consistent with the fact that Najaf now has been passed to provincial Iraqi control and that the U.S. forces don't operate there independently," he said.

Caldwell, who declined to confirm Amiri's link to Sadr, said U.S.-led coalition forces had been gathering intelligence on him for a long time. He said Amiri was implicated in a roadside bomb attack on a police chief in Najaf this year.

"The purpose for going after him is because of the illegal activities that he was conducting, not because he was associated with any particular organization," Caldwell said.

Amiri's friends and associates called him an honorable man. "He never participated in any kind of violence in all his life for as long as I've known him," said Nasar al-Rubaie, head of Sadr's parliamentary bloc.

More than 6,000 mourners followed Amiri's coffin as it was carried to a cemetery in Najaf, about 90 miles south of Baghdad.

Sadr asked his followers to "calm down, observe self-restraint and not do anything that could inflict harm or damage on the country and the people, especially since maintaining calm and security is the responsibility of all sides."

U.S. officials and Sadr loyalists gave conflicting versions of the events that led to Amiri's death.

Amiri's 19-year-old son, Karrar Sahib al-Amiri, said Iraqi and U.S. troops knocked on the family's door at 6 a.m. When he answered it, he asked the soldiers what they wanted, he recalled. They pushed him aside and stormed into the house, he said. His mother shouted at them while his father ran to the roof. Amiri said his father tried jumping to the roof of the next house but could not.

The soldiers followed him upstairs, the son said. He said his mother asked an Iraqi soldier why they were there. "We want to question him," Amiri recalled the soldier saying.

A few minutes later, the son heard four gunshots. He found his father on the roof with a bullet in his head and three bullets in his chest, he said.

The U.S. military said the elder Amiri ran upstairs when the troops arrived to detain him, ignoring repeated warnings to stop. An Iraqi soldier and an American adviser followed him to the roof, where Amiri confronted one of them with a rifle, the military said in a statement.

Sectarian Ties Weaken Duty's Call For Iraq Forces (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 27 — The car parked outside was almost certainly a tool of the Sunni insurgency. It was pocked with bullet holes and bore fake license plates. The trunk had cases of unused sniper bullets and a notice to a Shiite family telling them to abandon their home.

"Otherwise, your rotten heads will be cut off," the note read.

The soldiers who came upon the car in a Sunni neighborhood in Baghdad were part of a joint American and Iraqi patrol, and the Americans were ready to take action. The Iraqi commander, however, taking orders by cellphone from the office of a top Sunni politician, said to back off: the car's owner was known and protected at a high level.

For Maj. William Voorhies, the American commander of the military training unit at the scene, the moment encapsulated his increasingly frustrating task — trying to build up Iraqi security forces who themselves are being used as proxies in a spreading sectarian war. This time, it was a Sunni politician — Vice Prime Minister Salam al-Zubaie — but the more powerful Shiites interfered even more often.

"I have come to the conclusion that this is no longer America's war in Iraq, but the Iraqi civil war where America is fighting," Major Voorhies said.

A two-day reporting trip accompanying Major Voorhies's unit and combat troops seemed to back his statement, as did other commanding officers expressing similar frustration.

"I have personally witnessed about a half-dozen of these incidents of what I would call political pressure, where a minister or someone from a minister's office contacts one of these Iraqi commanders," said Lt. Col. Steven Miska, the deputy commander for the Dagger Brigade Combat Team, First Infantry Division, who oversees combat operations in a wide swath of western Baghdad.

"These politicians are connected with either the militias or Sunni insurgents."

Whatever plan the Bush administration unveils — a large force increase, a withdrawal or something in between — this country's security is going to be left in the hands of Iraqi forces. Those forces, already struggling with corruption and infiltration, have shown little willingness to stand up to political pressure, especially when the Americans are not there to support them. That suggests, the commanders say, that if the Americans leave soon, violence will redouble. And that makes their mission, Major Voorhies and Colonel Miska say, more important than ever.

They added that while political pressure on the Iraqi Army is great, the influence exerted on the police force, which is much more heavily infiltrated by Shiite militia groups, is even greater.

Shiites, led by militia forces and often aided by the local police, are clearly ascendant, Colonel Miska said.

"It seems very controlled and deliberate and concentrated on expanding the area they control," he said.

The Sunni forces are being bolstered by support from insurgent strongholds in the West. The Shiite militias are using neighborhoods in the north, specifically Shuala and Sadr City, as bases of operation. There is also increasing evidence that militia members from southern cities like Basra are coming to Baghdad to join the fight.

"I believe everyone, to some extent, is influenced by the militias," Colonel Miska said. "While some Iraqi security forces may be complicit with the militias, others fear for their families when confronting the militia, and that is the more pervasive threat."

Looking at a map he had his intelligence officers create, which highlights current battle zones and details the changing religious makeup of neighborhoods, Colonel Miska noted just how many different forces, each answering to different bosses, currently occupied the battlefield.

"Who would design this mess?" he said. "It is like an orchestra where everyone is playing a different song."

His main focus, he said, is trying to establish some kind of unity of command.

As it stands, the police and military answer to different ministries, and within the police force the bureaucracy is divided even further between the regular police and the national police. On top of that are about 145,000 armed men who work as protection detail for the Facilities Protection Services, with minimal oversight, according to United States military officials.

There are also thousands of Shiite militia members and Sunni insurgents posing as security forces.

Colonel Miska tried to define where American forces fit in the tangle of competing interests, which is only further complicated by the complicity and direct participation of top government officials.

"When they are conducting armed aggression against the population, that is where we try and step in and stop it," he said, adding that when the groups fight one another, "We sit back and watch because that can only benefit us."

Some days, the line between militia and insurgent clashes and attacks on the population is a blurry one.

Nowhere can the current battle be seen more starkly than on the border between the Shiite district of Shuala and the Sunni controlled Ghazaliya.

Major Voorhies briefed his men before dawn last Thursday morning about the day's mission, code-named Operation Thunderball. They were to join with Lt. Col. Sabah Kadam Fadily and his command unit and direct a joint search of houses in Ghazaliya. There were 300 American troops and 200 Iraqis involved in the operation.

The sun was just rising as the team set out, and daylight revealed an apocalyptic landscape, trash everywhere, open sewers emitting a revolting smell and scores of buildings damaged in recent clashes. A mosque on the side of the road had a massive hole blown in its once ornate blue dome.

Major Voorhies got a call on his radio. The Iraqi soldiers had spotted a body.

It was a man, dead, tossed on the side of the road, piled with the garbage. His hands were bound behind his back and his shoes were off. His head was turned to the right, revealing a single bullet hole covered in blood that still appeared wet.

As the Iraqi soldiers called the police, who pick up dozens of similarly abused bodies around the city daily, an American soldier spotted a pair of legs. Major Voorhies walked over and, with a stick, flipped a piece of plastic foam off the body.

It was another man, his neck slit, his head almost completely severed. He was lying on his back, eyes open looking vacantly to nowhere, arms bound behind him and torn from their sockets.

Major Voorhies asked Colonel Sabah if he could tell if the man was Shiite or Sunni, but the answer was obvious to the colonel.

"He is Shiite," Colonel Sabah said absently.

"How do you know?" asked the American major.

"Because this is the Sunni sector," Colonel Sabah said.

There would be little investigation and no chance that anyone would ever be arrested for the murders, Major Voorhies said. In fact, he said, Colonel Sabah's assessment might not even be right since the Sunnis and the Mahdi militia, called JAM for Jaish al-Mahdi by American troops, had been fighting for control of this forlorn ground.

"This is either a warning from the Sunni here" to the Shiites to get out, he said. "Or a message sent by JAM that we are winning."

For the American soldiers, it was just another morning in Baghdad, where Americans are trying to protect people on both sides while being attacked by people on both sides, trying not to take a side themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0109754

Major Voorhies thought about what he had just seen and the cycle of killing it would inspire.

"I don't know what the answer is," he said, almost to himself.

But he said he would push forward with his mission regardless.

Last week, a search of a house led to the discovery of 23 men being held captive, likely to be killed. He could take pride in helping save their lives, even if some of them might be shooting at him tomorrow.

Colonel Sabah, in glaring contrast to his efficient and focused American partners, did not seem to display a sense of urgency. He paid a visit to a house that belonged to a former Army colleague, a general, who had to flee the area. There he drank tea.

Then he went to see another past colleague, an admiral, and drank more tea. The two discussed what fun they had getting drunk and going to brothels.

Major Voorhies struggled to keep his patience.

"Sometimes I feel like I work for the Iraqi government," he said.

Outside, neighbors gathered, telling strikingly similar accounts of having their lives threatened by Shiite militiamen, who forced them from their homes. They were angry about the searches.

"Anyone leaving Ghazaliya will get killed because they know you are Sunni," said Fadhel A. Zaidan, who had lived in nearby Huriya for 50 years. "Now the Americans are taking our weapons, and when they leave, the Mahdi militia will attack."

American commanders say they are aware of this danger. In part, that is why residents are allowed one AK-47 and two cartridges.

Among Sunnis, there is absolutely no faith in the ability, or desire, of the Iraqi Army or police to provide protection. Colonel Sabah, who is Shiite but who had to leave his own home because of threats by the militia, is viewed as a collaborator.

Major Voorhies acknowledged that it was easier to persuade Colonel Sabah to search Sunni neighborhoods. Still, he said the colonel was one of Iraq's better army officers.

"When we have his back, he will fight anyone," said Major Voorhies. "When we don't, he will cut deals."

American soldiers seemed to appreciate the difficult position of officers like Colonel Sabah. His brother was murdered on Sept. 12, and just working in the Iraqi Army puts his life in danger.

Facing such stark challenges already, it makes the actions of Iraqi political leaders who try to manipulate the security forces that much more galling, Major Voorhies said.

"Colonel Sabah gets in a very political predicament sometimes," Major Voorhies said. "He will detain someone and then gets a call and is told not to take them away, so he has no choice."

Letter By Hussein, Written After Conviction, Urges Iraqis To Renounce Hatred (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 27 — Saddam Hussein, who is expected to make the short walk up the gallows stairs to his death here sometime in the next 30 days, said he was prepared to die and sure of his place in heaven as a martyr, and he called on Iraqis to unite, according to a letter that his lawyers said Wednesday had been composed by the former dictator.

Fears that the announcement upholding his death penalty on Tuesday would set off violence appeared not to be immediately borne out. But officials were still concerned about possible public reaction to the execution itself, and some speculated that the hanging would take place in secret and be announced only after the fact. American and Iraqi officials said nothing definitive about the execution's details on Wednesday.

Mr. Hussein is being held at Camp Cropper, an American base near the Baghdad Airport. Although the site of the hanging has yet to be announced, the main execution center in Baghdad is near his cell. In a drab concrete building, a set of steel stairs leads to a platform, about 15 feet above the ground. There, nooses fashioned from hemp ropes are slipped around the necks of the condemned before a steel trapdoor swings down.

In his latest letter, Mr. Hussein displayed none of the bombast that had defined his court appearances. He was convicted Nov. 5 of crimes against humanity for his part in the execution of 148 men and boys in the northern town of Dujail, and he wrote his farewell letter at the time of his conviction, his lawyers said.

"I say goodbye to you, but I will be with the merciful God who helps those who take refuge in him and who will never disappoint any honest believer," the letter said. "I call on you not to hate, because hate does not leave space for a person to be fair and it makes you blind and closes all doors of thinking." The letter, which was posted on a Baath Party Web site and received extensive coverage on Arabic TV news stations, seemed to cause little public stir here.

American forces continued Wednesday to focus on the Mahdi Army militia, loyal to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr. In Najaf, which is the second holiest city for Shiite Muslims, American and Iraqi forces raided the home of a Sadr loyalist, Sahib al-Amiri, and shot him dead.

Mr. Amiri led a well-known social organization in Najaf called the Shahid Allah Foundation and was personally close to Mr. Sadr, Iraqi officials in Najaf said. While thousands of angry supporters marched in Mr. Amiri's funeral procession, Mr. Sadr urged his followers in the city to remain calm. At the same time, he released a statement that praised attacks on American forces.

"We heard that Bush, the enemy of God, is crying over the killing of American soldiers in Iraq," the statement said. "We ask God to extend his crying. We tell him that the killing of any Iraqi by the hands of his Army is a source of pride for us."

Americans handed control of security in Najaf Province to the Iraqis in an elaborate ceremony last week, but local leaders questioned the significance of the transfer if Americans could still direct raids there.

"When Iraqis were feeling happy about the approval of the execution of the dictator Saddam Hussein, they were surprised today with the raid on the house of Sahab al-Amiri and killing him in front of the eyes of his family and his children," said Abdul Hussein al-Musawi, the head of Najaf's governorate council. "This horrible act shows how reckless the raiding forces are."

American military officials said Mr. Amiri was responsible for planning and directing attacks using improvised explosive devices. They said that the raid was conducted with the Iraqi Eighth Army Division and that Mr. Amiri tried to flee when soldiers entered the house. He ran to the roof, was pursued and then aimed an assault rifle at an Iraqi officer. At that point, a soldier shot him dead, the military said in a statement.

There was also increased pressure on Sadr loyalists in Baghdad on Wednesday. Throughout the day, American and Iraqi troops engaged in actions against militia members around the Sadr City district in the capital, according to witnesses and Iraqi officials. Clashes between Iraqi security forces and militiamen were reported in a half dozen other Baghdad neighborhoods. Government forces killed at least 32 people and arrested 39 more, Iraqi officials said.

Separately, around 2:30 p.m., a car bomb exploded near a restaurant downtown and killed at least 10 civilians, an Iraqi official said. One hour later, another car bomb exploded near a bridge, killing four more people, the official said. The bodies of 50 people, many apparently tortured, were found around the city.

In Anbar Province, where American forces are battling Sunni Arab insurgents, a marine was killed in fighting, according to the military.

In Washington on Wednesday, a District Court judge refused to intervene in the death-penalty case for Mr. Hussein, turning down a request by American defense lawyers to temporarily block the execution. Lawyers for Awad al-Bandar, a former Iraqi judge sentenced to death along with Mr. Hussein, had filed a writ of habeas corpus on his behalf in United States District Court seeking to halt the execution on the grounds that he did not receive a fair trial.

The lawyers, including Ramsey Clark, the former United States attorney general who served on the defense team in the Baghdad trial, maintained that the federal court had jurisdiction because Mr. Bandar was effectively being held in American military custody in Iraq.

The judge, Reggie B. Walton, rejected the claim, saying he did not have jurisdiction. But he did allow the defense lawyers to appeal the issue in hopes of persuading the American courts to intervene.

Noting that the Iraqis had set up the tribunals by which Mr. Hussein and Mr. Bandar were tried, Judge Walton asked, "Why should I step in and interfere with the operations of a sovereign nation?"

Mr. Clark said in an interview that he had filed the petition at the request of Mr. Bandar's son after Mr. Hussein refused to allow him to do so. In a conversation in Iraq at the time of Mr. Hussein's sentencing last month, Mr. Clark said he tried to persuade the deposed leader to appeal to the American courts to block the execution. "He said it would be interpreted as his seeking mercy from the United States," Mr. Clark said, "and he would never permit it."

Hussein Bids Farewell To Iraqis In Note On Web (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 27 -- A farewell letter posted on the Internet Wednesday in the name of Saddam Hussein declared the former president to be victimized by foreign armies but ready to die and "be with the merciful God." The letter urged Iraqis not to hate the foreign peoples whose armies invaded the country, just their leaders.

Released a day after Iraq's highest court upheld his death sentence and opened the way for his execution within 30 days, the letter said: "I call you now and invite you not to hate, because hatred does not leave space for a person to be fair and it will blind your vision and close all doors of thinking."

Published on several Iraqi Web sites, the letter was written in ancient Arabic verse. Though Hussein took power a generation ago as a secular leader, in later years he mirrored the rise of religious fundamentalism in the Middle East, depicting himself as devoted to Islam. Much of the letter reflects that tone.

In interviews on Wednesday, two of Hussein's defense lawyers based in Amman, Jordan, said the letter was authentic and written by Hussein on Nov. 5. That was the day he was sentenced to death by hanging for the killings of 148 Shiite residents of the town of Dujail following an attempt on his life there in 1982.

"Yes, it is true," said Khalil al-Dulaimi, one of his lawyers.

The second lawyer, Saleh al-Armouti, said the letter was Hussein's way of expressing contempt for his sentence and for the Bush administration. "He's not an enemy of the American forces. He's an enemy of Bush," said Armouti. "There are a lot free people in the United States who are against the American occupation, and who should be respected for their opinions."

There was no independent way to verify that the letter was written by Hussein.

In the letter, Hussein said he was expressing his sentiments because the Iraqi High Tribunal and its chief judge "did not give us a chance to say what we want to say." The court, the letter continued, "issued its verdict without any explanation and read us the sentence -- according to orders of the invaders -- without presenting the evidence."

Turning to the future, the letter says: "Here, I offer my soul to God as a sacrifice, and if God wants he will lift it up to where the first believers and martyrs are and if his decision is postponed, then He is the most merciful. . . . So be patient and depend on Him against the unjust nations."

Addressing the "generous, loyal people," the letter bids them farewell. "I say goodbye to you, but I will be with the merciful God who helps those who take refuge in him and God won't disappoint any honest believer."

Portions of the letter praised Americans who assisted Hussein in his trial, an apparent reference to former U.S. attorney general Ramsey Clark, who joined Hussein's defense team.

"You should know that among the aggressors, there are people who support your struggle against the invaders, and some of them volunteered for the legal defense of detainees, and one of them is Saddam Hussein," the letter said. "Others exposed the scandals of the invaders or condemned them.

"Some of these people cried profusely and honestly when they said goodbye to me," the letter added.

Armouti, acknowledging that Hussein was referring to Clark, said that his team had met many American judges and lawyers who supported its view that the trial was unfair and improperly conducted. "We met Americans who are condemning this American intrusion in Iraq," he said.

Iraqi government officials have said that the nine-month trial was conducted properly. They disputed allegations that the court was politicized and dispensed victor's justice.

The letter was posted on the same day that loyalists warned, through a posting on a Web site of Hussein's former Baath Party, that they "are determined to retaliate, with all means and everywhere, to harm America and its interests if it commits this crime," referring to his execution.

According to Iraq's constitution, President Jalal Talabani and two vice presidents must ratify the court's decision if Hussein is to go to the gallows. On Tuesday, a spokesman for Talabani said his approval may not be legally necessary. An Iraqi High Tribunal provision that requires the implementation of the death sentence could outweigh the constitution, said the spokesman, Hiwa Osman.

"Some people believe there is no need for his approval," Osman told the Associated Press. "We still have to hear from the court as to how the procedure can be carried out."

On Wednesday, a New York-based human rights group accused the Iraqi High Tribunal of bowing to political pressures and issuing "its final judgment at worrying speed."

"The Appeals Chamber's ruling was issued far too rapidly for a case involving complex international crimes," said Miranda Sissons, head of the Iraq program of the International Center for Transitional Justice, which works on issues of accountability for atrocities.

"The Chamber should have conducted a serious revision of the evidentiary and fairness issues in the Dujail trial to ensure that justice was done," Sissons said. "That clearly hasn't happened."

Saddam Counsels Against Hating U.S. (WT/AP)

By Christopher Torchia

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Saddam Hussein called on Iraqis not to hate the U.S.-led forces that invaded Iraq in 2003 in a farewell letter posted on a Web site yesterday, a day after an appeals court upheld the former dictator's death sentence and ordered him to be hanged within one month.

DOJ_NMG_0109757

One of Saddam's attorneys, Issam Ghazzawi, confirmed in Jordan that the letter was authentic, saying it was written by Saddam on Nov. 5 -- the day he was convicted by an Iraqi tribunal for ordering the killings of 148 Shi'ite Muslims in the city of Dujail in 1982.

"I call on you not to hate because hate does not leave space for a person to be fair and it makes you blind and closes all doors of thinking," the letter said.

Mr. Ghazzawi said the letter was released Tuesday and published yesterday on the Web site of Saddam's former Ba'ath Party.

The deposed leader said he was writing the letter because his attorneys had told him the Iraqi High Tribunal that tried his case would give him an opportunity to say a final word.

"But that court and its chief judge did not give us the chance to say a word, and issued its verdict without explanation and read out the sentence -- dictated by the invaders -- without presenting the evidence," Saddam wrote.

"Dear faithful people," he added, "I say goodbye to you, but I will be with the merciful God who helps those who take refuge in him and who will never disappoint any honest believer."

The letter was released as Saddam's last legal means of avoiding execution came under question. A spokesman for President Jalal Talabani said the appeals court order upholding the death sentence might not require Mr. Talabani's approval to carry out the execution.

Meanwhile, some Saddam loyalists threatened to retaliate if he is executed, warning in a posting on the Ba'ath Party Web site that they would target U.S. interests anywhere.

The Ba'ath Party was disbanded after U.S.-led forces overthrew Saddam in 2003. The Web site is thought to be run from Yemen, where several exiled members of the party are based.

In its ruling Tuesday, the appeals court said Saddam must be hanged within 30 days for his role in the Dujail killings. The court also affirmed death sentences for two co-defendants, including Saddam's half brother. It ruled that life imprisonment for a third was too lenient and demanded that he also be sentenced to death.

Many Baghdad neighborhoods were jittery yesterday amid fears that Sunni Arab insurgents would target Shi'ite areas in revenge attacks.

Violence appeared to be relatively minimal, though, with one car bombing killing eight civilians and wounding 10 near an army checkpoint in the capital, police said.

The U.S. military reported three troop deaths, bringing the U.S. death toll in December to 93 in one of the bloodiest months for American troops in Iraq this year.

Two Latvian soldiers were killed and three were wounded when a roadside bomb exploded under their Humvee, the Latvian Defense Ministry said. It was not clear where the incident occurred, but Latvia has about 130 troops serving in Diwaniyah, 80 miles south of Baghdad.

Saddam Advises Against Hatred In Farewell Letter (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis And Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Saddam Hussein declared in a handwritten farewell letter published Wednesday that his execution for crimes against humanity would be a sacrifice for his people, and he urged Iraqis not to give in to hatred.

"Here I am presenting myself as a sacrifice, if God wants this," the former Iraqi president wrote. "I invite you now to reject hatred, since hatred will not allow justice and fairness.... I also invite you, brothers and sisters, my sons and Iraq's sons, strugglers, comrades not to hate the nations that assaulted us."

The letter was released as shootings and explosions rattled Baghdad for another day, and protesters took to the streets of the Shiite holy city of Najaf after an associate of a radical anti-American cleric was killed in a confrontation with Iraqi and foreign troops.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of three service personnel: a Marine killed in combat Wednesday in Al Anbar province, a soldier killed in a road accident Tuesday while on a combat mission and another soldier who died of noncombat injuries in Balad on Dec. 23. Their deaths raised the number of U.S. troops who have died in Iraq since 2003 to 2,983, according to the Web site icasualties.org.

Saddam's letter was posted on a Web site used by his Baath Party. Bushra Khalil, a member of Saddam's defense team, confirmed its authenticity.

The letter was dated Nov. 5, the day Saddam was sentenced to death for crimes against humanity in connection with the execution of 148 men and boys from the Shiite town of Dujail after a 1982 assassination attempt. It was released after a nine-judge appeals panel upheld the sentence Tuesday.

Saddam said he wrote the letter because he was not given a chance to make a final statement when his sentence was handed down. "Oh loyal, generous people," his letter concluded, "I say farewell and my soul will be with the merciful God who helps those who take refuge in him and doesn't disappoint an honest believer."

Aref Shahin, the chief judge of the appeals panel, said the government was obliged to carry out the execution within 30 days. But Khalil said there might be grounds to block it. Saddam's defense team plans to meet Thursday in Jordan to discuss the next move.

Relatives of those killed in Dujail and other victims of Saddam's regime have demanded a public hanging. But government officials said Saddam's execution probably would be carried out in private in front of select witnesses. They said it might occur within days.

Under Iraq's constitution, President Jalal Talabani, a firm opponent of the death penalty, and his two deputies must ratify the executions of Saddam and three co-defendants before Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can order them carried out.

However, the code governing the court created specifically to try Saddam and members of his regime does not permit any change once the sentence is ratified by the appeals panel.

"We have a contradiction here," Khalil said by telephone from Lebanon. "In such cases everywhere in the world, it is the constitution that is regarded as the highest law of the land."

Talabani's spokesman, Hiwa Osman, said Tuesday that the president regarded the issue of sentencing as a matter for the judiciary. In previous cases, Talabani has deputized one of his vice presidents to sign on his behalf.

"The fact of the matter is that this (signature) is more ceremonial than it is official," said Mariam Rayis, al-Maliki's legal adviser. "The sentence will be carried out regardless of whether they actually sign or not."

Talk of executions comes amid surging sectarian bloodshed in Iraq. Sunni political leaders have warned that hanging Saddam could inflame violence and intensify attacks against U.S. troops.

Politicians close to al-Maliki said the prime minister wanted the sentence carried out quickly, to deny insurgents an opportunity to plan revenge attacks or to attempt to free Saddam. Education Minister Khodayer Khozar said the prime minister and other Cabinet members also wanted to avoid a distasteful public display.

"It would be the joy of millions of Iraqis to see him hang on television, but ethically we cannot do this," he said.

In Najaf on Thursday, at least 2,000 mourners in black chanted "No, no to America" during the funeral procession for Saheb Amiri, an associate of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr's.

U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said Amiri, who was suspected of planning and supplying materials for roadside bombings including an October attack on the Najaf police chief, was killed when he fired at an Iraqi soldier.

Abdul Razzaq Naddawi, an al-Sadr official in Najaf, claimed that Amiri was killed in front of his wife and children, and that he did not belong to al-Sadr's Mahi Army militia.

Caldwell said coalition forces were still holding two of five Iranian men detained in raids Dec. 20 and 21 in Baghdad's central Jadriya neighborhood. Evidence seized by the military links the two men to illegal weapons shipments to armed groups in Iraq, Caldwell said.

Four of the men arrested, including the two still held, were diplomats visiting Iraq at the invitation of Talibani, according to an official at the Iranian embassy in Baghdad who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Times staff writers Mohammed Rasheed, Raheem Salma and Said Rifai in Baghdad, and correspondents in Baghdad, Babil, Hilla, Najaf and Tehran, Iran, contributed to this report.

Iraqis Split Over Death Penalty For Saddam (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

News of Saddam Hussein's imminent execution provoked widely differing reactions among Iraqis on Wednesday, with some welcoming the demise of their former persecutor and many afraid that it would cause further disruption to their lives, and others convinced that the president would strike a last-minute deal to avoid death.

Iraqi officials announced on Tuesday that the execution could be carried out at any time, but suggested that it would probably not take place until after the four-day Eid al-Adha holiday, which is due to start at the end of the week.

An appeals court announced on Tuesday that it had turned down the former president's final appeal and that his execution would follow within 30 days. The deposed dictator was convicted in November of complicity in a campaign of reprisals against a Shia village after an assassination attempt against him in 1982.

Some residents in northern Kurdistanexpressed jubilation at the deposed leader's imminent hanging, even though it will supersede his trial on charges of carrying out a genocide against the Kurds in the late 1980s.

In Baghdad, the centre of Iraq's sectarian conflict, reaction was mixed. Some residents worried that Mr Hussein's execution would disrupt what little normalcy was left in their lives, fearing either retaliation from his supporters or an extended security clampdown on movement in the capital to prevent such attacks.

In Sadr City, a largely Shia district that is the support base of the radical Sadrist movement, one resident said few of his neighbours actually believed that Mr Hussein would be executed. He cited recent events – the escape of a Sunni minister from an Iraqi jail, and the demolition by UK forces of a police station in the southern city of Basra on the grounds that it had been affiliated with death squads – as indicators that Mr Hussein would somehow be able to cut a deal with the Americans and be allowed to escape.

Many Shia believe the US military is tying their hands in the country's sectarian conflict, and some believe that the Americans want to return his former ruling Ba'ath party to power.

Both sets of reactions indicate the degree to which Iraqis are likely to view Mr Hussein's execution through the lens of their own predicament and the country's shifting web of political alliances.

Meanwhile, Mr Hussein's lawyer released a letter written by the former president before his appeal was denied, in which he stated that he would go to the gallows as a "sacrifice" and called on his former Iraqi subjects to unite against their enemies.

A website affiliated with members of the Ba'ath party and believed to be run from Yemen posted a statement threatening retaliation against the US if the execution was carried out.

"The Ba'ath and the resistance are determined to retaliate, with all means and everywhere, to harm America and its interests if it commits this crime," the statement said.

The New York-based Human Rights Watch said that the Iraqi government should not implement the death penalty. It called Mr Hussein's trial "deeply flawed", citing Iraqi government actions that threatened the court's independence as well as procedural errors.

Execution Likely To Come Soon For Saddam Hussein (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — Saddam Hussein, sentenced to hang within 30 days, will likely be executed soon at a private gathering of select witnesses, officials close to Iraq's Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said today.

Hussein, 69, was sentenced to death Nov. 5 after being convicted of crimes against humanity in connection with the extermination of 100 men and boys from the Shiite town of Dujail after locals attempted to assassinate him in 1982.

A letter Hussein wrote on the day of his sentencing was released today on his former Baath party's web site.

"Dear faithful people," the deposed president wrote, "I say goodbye to you, but I will be with the merciful God who helps those who take refuge in him and who will never disappoint any honest believer."

Hussein's victims, particularly those from Dujail, are demanding a public hanging so they can see justice done. But government officials concerned about exacerbating sectarian tensions rejected the idea, said a cabinet member of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, adding the government will likely only release photographs of the hanging to the public.

A U.S. Marine was also killed today in combat in western Anbar province, the military said, and a U.S. soldier died Tuesday after his vehicle rolled over on a dirt canal trail while on a combat mission south of the capital. Their deaths raised the number of U.S. troops killed in Iraq since 2003 to 2,983, according to icasualties.org.

Explosions and shootings rocked the capital today, as protesters took to the streets in the southern city of Najaf after Iraqi and coalition forces killed a local aide to anti-U.S. cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Protesters chanted anti-American slogans during the funeral procession for Saheb Amiri, an associate of Sadr, who ran a civic organization called Shaheedollah, or God's Martyrs, and a newspaper.

U.S. military spokesman Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV described the raid at an afternoon briefing in Baghdad.

Caldwell said that after soldiers arrived, Amir fled to the roof of his house. An Iraqi soldier pursued him, followed by a coalition soldier, Caldwell said, and when Amiri shot at the Iraqi soldier with an assault rifle, the coalition soldier returned fire, killing Amiri.

Amiri's 16-year-old son, Ali, confirmed the story of the raid, but said the soldiers followed his father to the roof and killed him.

Caldwell said Amiri was suspected of planning and supplying roadside bomb attacks against Iraqi and coalition forces, including an October attack on the Najaf police chief.

Asked about Amiri's ties to Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia, Caldwell said Amiri was targeted for suspected illegal activity, "not because he was associated with any particular organization." But provincial and Sadr party leaders condemned the killing.

DOJ_NMG_0109760

"This act is not accepted at all and it's a significant violation for sovereignty in Najaf," said a provincial leader who asked not to be named.

Sadr party leaders said Amiri was gunned down while trying to call them for help.

"He was killed in front of his wife and his children," said Abudl Razzaq Naddawi, a Sadr official in Najaf, adding that at the time he was killed, Amiri was trying to call Sadr officials, "To tell them that he was surrounded by Americans." Naddawi said "Martyr Amiri" ran the civic group and a newspaper, Anwar Al Ghoori, and did not belong to the Mahdi Army.

Naddawi and other Sadr party leaders called a press conference in Najaf this afternoon where they urged followers not to lash out at U.S. forces.

"The Americans want to drag us into an open battle and we will not be lured into provocations," Naddawi said.

U.S. forces could be seen patrolling in greater numbers today in Baghdad's Shiite stronghold of Sadr City, and more were arriving in vehicles and helicopters late today, according to an Interior Ministry source.

Caldwell said operations are underway in Sadr City to root out the death squad responsible for extra-judicial killings. Such killings have been linked to both the Mahdi Army and the Shiite Badr Organization, a militia association with the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq party.

"Anybody who is operating outside of the law, extra-judicial killings, we are going to take down, regardless of their affiliations," Caldwell said.

He said coalition forces were still holding two of five Iranian men detained in separate raids Dec. 20 and 21 in Baghdad's central Jadriya neighborhood, Caldwell said. During the later raid, the military seized evidence that links the two men to illegal weapons shipments to armed groups in Iraq, including documents, maps, photographs and videos, Caldwell said.

Four of the men arrested, including the two still held, were diplomats visiting Iraq at Talibani's invitation, according to an official at the Iranian embassy in Baghdad who spoke on condition of anonymity. He said embassy officials have been trying unsuccessfully to visit the prisoners.

At least 23 people died in today's violence across Iraq.

In the southern city of Babil, two roadside bombs exploded at an Iraqi Army patrol post, killing three soldiers, according to police in nearby Kut.

Gunmen killed the mayor of the southern county of Husseiniya, Hameed Sharifi and his bodyguard as they were driving to his office in nearby Karbala today, according to Karbala's mayor.

In the capital, explosions and shootings erupted at several points during the day. At least 50 bodies were recovered in the 24-hour period ending today, according to the Interior Ministry.

A car bomb exploded at about 2:10 p.m. in the north Baghdad neighborhood of Talibiya, killing at least ten people.

A roadside bomb near Baghdad's Wathiq Square killed seven, including three police, according to police. Gunmen attacked a bus ferrying workers to Kindi Medical College near Shurta Tunnel in west Baghdad, injuring several.

Saddam Hussein's Baath Party Threatens To Retaliate If Their Leader Is Executed (IHT/AP)

By The Associated Press

International Herald Tribune/AP, December 28, 2006

Saddam Hussein's Baath party threatens to retaliate if their leader is executed

AMMAN, Jordan: Saddam Hussein's Baath Party threatened Wednesday to retaliate if the ousted Iraqi leader is executed, warning in an Internet posting it would target U.S. interests anywhere.

The statement appeared on a Web site known to represent the Baath, which was disbanded after U.S.-led forces overthrew Saddam in 2003. The site is believed to be run from Yemen, where a number of exiled members of the party are based.

On Tuesday, Iraq's highest court rejected Saddam's appeal against a conviction and death sentence for the killing of 148 people who were detained after an attempt to assassinate in Dujail, northern Iraq, in 1982. The court said the former president should be hanged within 30 days.

"Our party warns again of the consequences of executing Mr. President and his comrades," the statement said.

"The Baath and the resistance are determined to retaliate, with all means and everywhere, to harm America and its interests if it commits this crime," the statement added, referring to Baath fighters as "the resistance."

"The American Administration will be held responsible for any harm inflicted on the president because the United States is the decision-maker (in Iraq) and not the puppet Iraqi government."

The statement said that if the execution takes place, it would be impossible for the Baath to take part in any prospective negotiations with U.S. and Iraqi officials to reduce the violence in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0109761

Saddam's defense lawyers, who are based in Amman, called on Arab governments and the United Nations to intervene to stop the execution.

"Otherwise, all may be participating in what is going on, either actually or due to their silence in face of the crimes, which are being committed in Iraq in the name of democracy," the lawyers said in a statement in English that was e-mailed to The Associated Press bureau.

The statement, signed by "the Defense Committee for President Saddam Hussein," said the court's rejection of Saddam's appeal was part of the "continued shedding of pure Iraqi blood by the current regime in Iraq, which (is) directly connected with the American occupation."

One of Saddam's counsel, Najib al-Nueimi, a former justice minister in the Gulf state of Qatar, said it was now time for Saddam's family to appeal to Iraqi President Jalal Talabani.

"The defense team has exhausted all the legal channels to appeal this decision, so it is up to the president's family to present an appeal for clemency to the current president, asking him not to sign the execution papers," al-Nueimi said, speaking in a phone interview from Qatar.

Saddam's wife, Sajda, lives in Qatar, and his daughter Raghad, who has supervised his defense team, lives in Amman.

Asked whether the family would appeal to Talabani, al-Nueimi would only say: "It's up to them."

Later in the day, the lawyer of the former Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tareq Aziz condemned the verdict saying it was a flagrant violation of the regulations of the court. He believes that court regulations require that an execution occur after 30 days — not within this period, as the court announced.

Badee Izzat Aref told the AP in a telephone call from Dubai that he met Saddam and Aziz last week in Baghdad and understood from them that Aziz will testify in court for the benefit of Saddam in his ongoing trial. Saddam is currently on trial for the military campaign, codenamed Operation Anfal, that took place during the 1980-88 Iraq-Iran war. An estimated 180,000 Kurds died during the campaign.

"He has very important issues to reveal during the trial," Aref said. "He will uncover the involvement of many important foreign and local personalities."

"The Iraqi government wants to accelerate the execution process to avoid the testimony of Tariq Aziz," Aref said.

Noting that Iraqi President Jalal Talabani he was against the death penalty, whether against Saddam or anybody else, Aref said, "If he gives authority to his vice president to sign the execution order, he will face great embarrassment before his party and the Kurdish people."

Rough Justice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

AT FIRST, British Prime Minister Tony Blair's reaction to Saddam Hussein's imminent hanging sounds a little wishy-washy. Blair reiterated his own opposition to capital punishment but also said the sentence "does give us a very clear reminder of the total and barbaric brutality of that regime."

Wishy-washy or not — and when it comes to Iraq, thoughtful equivocation is preferable to false certainty — Blair got it right. If one opposes capital punishment as a matter of principle, as we do, putting Hussein to death is of course objectionable. So was executing Adolf Eichmann and Timothy McVeigh. Rather than dwell on generic objections to capital punishment, a futile exercise given Iraqi law, Blair emphasized the sentence's significance as a judgment on the former Iraqi leader's misrule.

That said, both the sentence and the trial that produced it can be described as very rough justice. By British and U.S. standards, there were lapses in the trial that convicted Hussein of ordering the murders of 148 residents of a Shiite village in 1982. It's also troubling that the Iraqi appeals court that ruled Tuesday that Hussein should be hanged within 30 days took only three weeks to rule on detailed arguments submitted by his lawyers.

The most practical argument for sparing Hussein's life is rooted not in procedural scruples or a rejection of the death penalty but in political strategy. Ideally, Hussein would have been convicted against the backdrop of an Iraqi government regarded as legitimate by all segments of society, including Sunnis who prospered under the despot's rule. The current Shiite-led government in Baghdad falls sadly short of that description.

Assuming that Iraq's president or vice president could commute Hussein's sentence — and the appeals court insists that its ruling can't be altered — the best argument for mercy is that it might appease Sunnis who regard Prime Minister Nouri Maliki as partial to his fellow Shiites. At the same time, sparing Hussein could further destabilize Iraq by outraging both Shiites and Kurds. Tens of thousands of the latter group died in a military campaign that forms the basis of a separate genocide charge against Hussein.

As with so much about Iraq, there is no simple answer to the question of whether the nation would be better off if the condemned keeps his date with the hangman. Hussein claims that he is prepared to join the ranks of "the true men and martyrs." Iraq's leaders need to ask themselves if that "martyrdom" will come, and if so whether it will be at too high a price.

G.O.P. Senator In Spotlight After A Critical Iraq Speech (NYT)

By James Risen

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 27 — At the close of the Senate's lame-duck session, in between formulaic tributes to senators departing voluntarily or otherwise, a Republican backbencher suddenly rose to give one of the most passionate and surprising speeches about the war in Iraq yet delivered in Congress.

For a solid Republican who had originally voted for the war, the words spoken by the senator, Gordon H. Smith of Oregon, on the evening of Dec. 7 were incendiary and marked a stunning break with the president.

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day," Mr. Smith said. "That is absurd. It may even be criminal."

But the real impact of the address came not just from Mr. Smith's words, but from the way he delivered them. His somber cadence resonated in a way that made political Washington take notice, transforming him into one of the most talked-about Republicans heading into the new Congress.

After acknowledging that he had been "rather silent" on Iraq since voting to authorize the war in 2002, Mr. Smith said he was rising "to speak from my heart" because he had witnessed "the slow undoing of our efforts there."

"I remember the pride I felt when the statue of Saddam Hussein came down," he said. "I remember the thrill when three times, Iraqis risked their own lives to vote democratically in a way that was internationally verifiable as well as legitimate and important. Now all those memories seem much like ashes to me."

"Many things have been attributed to George Bush," Mr. Smith said, "but I do not believe him to be a liar."

He continued, "He is not guilty of perfidy, but I do believe he is guilty of believing bad intelligence and giving us the same. I can't tell you how devastated I was to learn that in fact we were not going to find weapons of mass destruction."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, stopped short as he was walking out of the chamber to listen to Mr. Smith. He was so struck by the speech that he called him to congratulate him, an aide to Mr. Kennedy said.

A White House official also quickly called Mr. Smith to discuss his speech, Mr. Smith said in an interview.

Before his speech, Mr. Smith had last garnered national publicity with efforts to pass legislation to prevent suicides among youths after his son, Garrett, killed himself in 2003, on the day before his 22nd birthday.

But within days of the Iraq speech, Mr. Smith emerged as a new spokesman for an endangered political species: the moderate Republican.

In the process, Mr. Smith may have signaled that some moderate Republicans in the Senate are poised to break openly with the White House on the war, just as President Bush is seeking a new strategy to deal with the bloody stalemate in Iraq.

Only three or four senators were in the chamber when Mr. Smith spoke, but his speech has been replayed repeatedly on cable news and on the Internet and has had reverberations throughout the Republican Party.

For some, the speech helped crystallize the post-election anger many Republican lawmakers have for the Bush administration and its conduct of the war, which they believe cost them control of Congress. In the aftermath of his speech, Mr. Smith said he heard from several other Republican senators who he said agreed with his views.

"I sensed a cold shoulder or two," he said. "But many of my colleagues said, 'Boy, you spoke for me.' "

Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine, said, "I think Gordon sort of struck a chord, and his speech represented a manifestation of frustrations that exists among many of us, not just moderate Republicans but all Americans."

"I think for some, that speech was a tipping point," Ms. Snowe added. "It was a reality check. We have to admit that something has gone terribly wrong."

But other Republican lawmakers argued that Mr. Smith's speech was not representative of most Senate Republicans' views.

"I don't believe it's true that a lot of Republican senators are ready to break with the White House on Iraq," said Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire. "I don't think the views he expressed represent a significant number of senators in the Republican caucus."

First elected to the Senate in 1996, Mr. Smith, 54, has forged an image as a centrist Republican in a swing state that is now tilting a bit Democratic.

He said he had previously refrained from publicly criticizing the war because he had been struck by the comment of a soldier from Oregon, who told him during a 2005 visit to Iraq that if he supported the troops, he also had to support their mission.

DOJ_NMG_0109763

But Mr. Smith's attitude began to change over the past year, particularly after he visited Iraq in May. In an interview, the senator recalled two occurrences in Baghdad during his visit, one in which a massive bomb killed about 70 people and a second in which some American troops were killed on patrol.

And a book on World War I he had been reading, by John Keegan, the British military historian, was beginning to haunt him.

Mr. Smith said that his use of the word "criminal" in his speech to describe the war in Iraq came from his reading of that book, which he said explained to him the "practice of British generals, sending a whole generation of British men running into machine guns, despite memos back to London saying, in effect, machine guns work."

Much like the British in World War I, he added, "I have concluded that we are employing strategies that are needlessly getting kids killed."

After returning to Washington from Baghdad, Mr. Smith said he listened with growing dismay to optimistic briefings given to senators by Donald H. Rumsfeld, then secretary of defense, and other administration officials. Even in closed-door briefings, he said, "the answers always seemed to be, It's tough but we have to stay the course.

"And so I started thinking about the British generals," he said.

Last summer, on a flight from Portland, Ore., to Washington, Mr. Smith said he read "Fiasco," a history of the Iraq war by Thomas E. Ricks, "and by the time I landed I was heartsick."

As the situation in Iraq worsened in the fall, Mr. Smith said it became increasingly obvious to him that "we were playing street cop in a civil war."

"I started thinking about those British generals again," he said.

He said he had decided not to speak out before the midterm elections, both out of political loyalty and a fear that his words would be drowned out by partisan attacks.

"Then we were back in Washington for the lame-duck session," he said, "and I woke up one morning and turned on the news and another 10 soldiers had been killed. And I went from steaming to boiled. And then I went to the floor."

Mr. Smith faces re-election in 2008, and some Democrats in Oregon have suggested that his break with the White House was timed to aid his coming campaign, an accusation he adamantly denies.

Oregon's Democratic governor dismisses talk that the speech was politically motivated. Instead, the governor, Theodore R. Kulongoski, said he believed that the suicide of Mr. Smith's son had had a large effect on Mr. Smith's thinking on a wide variety of issues.

"I think the loss of his son has dramatically changed his view," Mr. Kulongoski said in an interview. "He understands the loss of a child. I think he's gotten tired of reading about these kids dying."

"I think he has been struggling through this for a long time," he added. "I think the trauma in him has been his loyalty to his party and to his president, at the same time this gut-wrenching thing in him."

Mr. Smith said he recognized that his words upset the White House and some fellow Republicans.

"It is not easy to stand up to the president of your own party to say you are unhappy with the way this has been managed," he said. "But if you can't speak up, then you should go home."

Support Is Lacking For British Troops, Commander Says (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 27 — The commander of Britain's 7,000 troops in southern Iraq has complained that they are operating in conditions that display "a generation of underfunding and relative neglect" by successive governments back home.

The remarks by the commander, Maj. Gen. Richard Shirreff, echoed criticism by two other high-ranking officers in recent months, breaking with a tradition of public restraint by military commanders in expressing political views.

In an interview with the BBC, General Shirreff said, "The nation needs to understand that the quality work done by these courageous men and women out here only happens and can only continue if our soldiers are properly supported back home in terms of the support for training, infrastructure, barracks, accommodation."

"Some of these issues need solving," he said, describing many of them as "the result of a generation of underfunding and relative neglect."

General Shirreff did not blame a specific government and directed some of his criticism at the broader relationship between civilians and the military.

"I don't blame any particular party or government; I think this is a general issue," he said. "There's a whole range of areas — it's not just the sharp end here." He said the "military covenant between the nation and its soldiers" was "seriously out of kilter."

DOJ_NMG_0109764

General Shirreff's comments followed remarks in October by Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt, the top army commander, who said British troops, based primarily in Basra, should be withdrawn from Iraq "sometime soon" because their presence was adding to security problems.

Snipers Stalk Marine Supply Route In Western Iraq (LAT)

By Tony Perry

along msr mobile, outside fallouja, iraq — The battle for this desolate stretch of road east of Fallouja is relentless: Twenty-four hours a day, Marines lumber up and down the six-lane freeway in 23-ton amphibious assault vehicles, looking for bombs and dodging snipers.

The shadowy gunmen are a constant menace on MSR Mobile — short for Main Supply Route Mobile, so dubbed because it serves as a main link between several U.S. bases here in Al Anbar province. In the last two weeks, two Marines with Company B of the 2nd Assault Amphibian Battalion from Camp Lejeune, N.C., have fallen to snipers' bullets: Lance Cpl. Luke Yepsen, 20, of Brazos, Texas, and Cpl. Joshua Pickard, 20, of Merced, Calif.

Marines suspect the same sniper killed Yepsen and Pickard.

"I hope he shows up today — I'd like to blast his ass," Sgt. Clayton Chism, 26, of Prentiss, Miss., said at the beginning of a patrol involving 14 Marines and three vehicles from the battalion's Team Gator.

The mission on the road linking Fallouja to Baghdad could be seen as a microcosm of the Marine mission in Al Anbar: nothing likely to be made into a Hollywood war movie, just a "persistent presence" to wear down the insurgency.

But there are moments of adrenalin-pumping drama. On this day, the Marines shot an Iraqi spotted planting a roadside bomb. When Lance Cpl. William Shaw was lifting the wounded Iraqi into a vehicle to be taken to a field hospital, the Marine was shot in the back by a sniper.

The round struck the back plate in the flak vest worn by the 22-year-old from Fort Bend, Texas. A few inches lower, and Shaw might have been killed or his spine severed.

The explosive ordnance detail was called to examine the bomb. It was fake.

Fake bombs are a recent wrinkle in the insurgents' game plan. The strategy, apparently, is to fire at Marines who arrive to neutralize the devices.

Navy trauma doctors who have treated wounded Marines say the snipers have also learned how to find vulnerable spots not covered by protective plates.

"We're not bionic men," said Gunnery Sgt. Justin Smith, 32, of Boston.

Several sniper shootings have taken place nearby. Marines suspect that insurgents use low-slung buildings parallel to the freeway as a staging ground and a place to make bombs.

The Marines raided the buildings recently and detained dozens of Iraqis. Some Marines had hoped to get permission to demolish the buildings, but that was denied by upper authority.

"It's like being in the U.S. and having a public park being used by drug dealers," said Capt. Eric Dominijanni, 34, of New York, commander of B Company. "Not everybody there is a drug dealer, and you can't destroy the park."

Chism's three-vehicle convoy arrived to provide additional security for the Marines. Inside one vehicle, nicknamed "Event Horizon," after a sci-fi movie, three Marines waited to respond if the searchers were attacked.

Protecting MSR Mobile is sometimes boring.

For four hours, they waited. "It was a good day: not much action," said Cpl. Dennis Bryant, 21, of Kodiak, Alaska. "Everybody came back OK."

Navy corpsman Raymond Casas, 35, of Victoria, Texas, was hit by a sniper round in the upper chest while on a mission just off the freeway. The bullet hit his M-16 and then the fabric of his protective vest, leaving Casas with a deep gouge in his Grim Reaper tattoo.

Casas said he felt a sharp sting in his chest and immediately went on the radio to report he'd been hit. "I was more mad than hurt," he said. He knows that if the bullet hadn't been deflected by his M-16, he'd be dead. "I was lucky, I guess."

Although the sniper thought to have killed Yepsen and Pickard is still at large, the Marines here have killed and captured numerous snipers and bombers.

"We take one off, there seems to be another to take his place," Smith said.

Pakistan Proposes Fence To Rein In Taliban (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, December 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0109765

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN

First, Pakistan tried to fight the Taliban militia along its remote, craggy border with Afghanistan. Then it tried to make peace with them. This week, Pakistan announced a new solution to the problem on its western frontier: mines and fences along the Afghan border, designed to keep militants from crossing in and out of the tribal zone.

Western capitals, newspapers, and military intelligence reports are increasingly voicing concern that the source of the Taliban's growing power rests in Pakistan and that Pakistan is not doing enough to quell it. This latest approach, beyond being quixotic, is also risky, analysts say: If the fence doesn't work, Pakistan may have exhausted all apparent options - and possibly its credibility, too.

"If this doesn't solve the problem, then what next?" asks Ramiyullah Yusufzai, a prominent journalist and tribal analyst in Peshawar.

For its part, Afghanistan immediately responded with anger to the fence idea. "The border is not where the problem lies," Khaliq Ahmad, a presidential spokesman in Kabul, was quoted as saying.

Many critics in Pakistan agree. "Are we going to detain ourselves? Or should we look into the root causes - the policy of tolerating militants inside our borders," asks Afrasiab Khattak, a political analyst and member of the opposition Awami National Party in Peshawar, near the Afghan border.

Pakistan has repeatedly dismissed the numerous claims that it has shied away from engaging Taliban militants, reiterating its commitment to fighting terrorism. The fence proposal, Pakistani officials insist, has not been timed to address rising concerns in the international community.

"It's not that our military action failed and our political action failed. No. This proposal pre-dates those," says Tasneem Aslam, Pakistan's Foreign Office spokesperson. Ms. Aslam refused to characterize the fence as a barrier to prevent Pakistani-based terrorists from entering Afghanistan, insisting that Taliban violence was an internal Afghan problem.

"There are 200,000 [people] crossing the border a day, and they're not all crossing at designated points. We want to control that," she explains.

In September, however, President Pervez Musharraf admitted that Pakistani militants are responsible for some portion of violence inside Afghanistan.

"There are al-Qaeda and Taliban in both Afghanistan and Pakistan," Musharraf said during talks in Kabul. "Clearly they are crossing from the Pakistan side and causing bomb blasts in Afghanistan."

The job of preventing those attacks is, by all accounts, not an easy one. Afghanistan and Pakistan share a 1,500-mile-long border, studded with some of the most rugged terrain in the world. The Taliban are well-trained, well-armed and well-versed in that terrain, analysts agree. There are no easy, short-term solutions. Half-hearted ones, like the fencing proposal, will only chip away at Pakistan's credibility, which some see as already fading.

A more realistic solution begins with an honest review of Pakistan's policy of supporting militants, some analysts contend.

"It is for the policymakers in Islamabad," says Mr. Khattak.

Other analysts caution against such claims, citing a lack of hard proof. But they agree that substantive political reform is vital. Political parties are banned from the tribal areas, meaning there is no force to contest religious leaders who support the Taliban. Draconian, colonial-era laws are the rule of the land, compelling many to view Taliban-inspired laws as more just.

"Pakistan has the will [to stop militants]. It is a problem of its political capacity," says Rasul Bahksh Rais, a professor of political science at the Lahore School of Management Sciences. Introducing political parties is a critical step, he adds, but one the government has resisted for fears such parties will resist them.

"We are not going to impede the movement between countries," Aslam assured. The fencing proposal, which Pakistan has broached in the past, will include designated crossing points where officials can easily monitor traffic. So far, the proposal has no timeframe.

It is unclear if Pakistani authorities plan to mine and wire the entire 1,500-mile stretch. Pakistan has proposed the project unilaterally - a move that has sparked ire from Afghan officials and raised eyebrows at home.

"You make an agreement when you do these kinds of things. But they haven't discussed it with the Afghan authorities," says Yusufzai.

Pakistan's Foreign Secretary, Riaz Muhammed Khan, insisted at a press conference, however, that Pakistan "needs no permission or agreement with any country, including Afghanistan, while carrying out any such project within its territorial boundaries."

The proposed fence would run along the Durand Line, a border set by British colonialists in 1893. Pakistan recognizes the line as an international border, but Afghanistan does not. Pashtun tribes, who live on both sides of the border and have migrated in between for centuries, are unlikely to accept the fence.

DOJ_NMG_0109766

"There would be attempts to stop the fence or blow up areas of the fence," says Mr. Yusufzai. Others add that for every militant felled by a mine, many more will emerge from the swirl of death and violence."One part of a family on one side [of the border] will be stepping over dynamite to see family on the other side. Don't we have enough gun powder in our area?" asks Khattak.

Afghan Air Strike Irks U.S. Soldiers (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

Special-operations soldiers say that if the command in Afghanistan had listened to them four years ago, there would have been no need this month for a U.S. air strike that killed senior Taliban leader Mullah Akhtar Mohammed Osmani.

He already would have been locked up.

As reported in 2002 by The Washington Times, an Army Green Beret "A Team" said it captured Osmani in a village near Kandahar, the Taliban's birthplace.

The U.S. prison at the Bagram military base north of Kabul later released Osmani, the Special Forces soldiers said. They suspect Osmani convinced his captors that he was not a Taliban leader but a poor villager. The soldiers said they heard later that he crossed into Pakistan and reorganized his forces.

A military spokesman told The Times, "If we had captured Osmani, we would still have him."

Osmani was killed earlier this month. The Combined Forces Command in Kabul said that on Dec. 19 Osmani was identified, based on intelligence reports, as riding in a vehicle near the Pakistan border in a deserted area. An air strike killed him and two unidentified companions.

"Osmani was in the top ring of the Taliban leadership, and he was also a close associate of Osama bin Laden and [anti-U.S. warlord] Gulbuddin Hekmatyr," said Col. Tom Collins, a command spokesman. "His death is a major achievement in the fight against extremists and their terrorist networks."

Osmani had helped lead a Taliban resurgence this year that saw the radical Islamic movement recapture towns in southern Afghanistan, commit a string of atrocities and ramp up ambushes of NATO troops.

The command said Osmani ran the Taliban's military operations in Kandahar and other southern towns. His leader, Mullah Mohammed Omar, remains at large.

Soldiers on the A Team in 2002 said Osmani should never have had the second chance to reorganize the Taliban.

"We may never find out what really happened to him and if he was really let go by mistake, or something else, but it would have saved many, many lives, Afghan and American, if Osmani had been locked up or killed in '02," said a Special Forces soldier who was in Afghanistan at the time.

The soldiers told The Times that in July 2002 they received intelligence from locals that Osmani was staying in a compound in the village of Sangin. The soldiers said that U.S. military operations had slowed by then and that some ex-Taliban felt reasonably secure living in small villages.

While his compound was under surveillance, a man matching Osmani's description emerged to attend morning prayers, the soldiers said. The man was stopped at gunpoint and searched. He had an old Taliban ID card with the name "Osmani," they said, and scars on his chest that matched an intelligence profile.

The soldiers said they took the man by truck to Kandahar, from where he was flown to the prison in Bagram. Weeks later, they said, they heard he had been released.

A Defense Intelligence Agency spokesman said, "The DIA has no knowledge that Mullah Akhtar Mohammed Osmani was ever in U.S. custody in Afghanistan. Given Osmani's high profile and our interest in detaining him, misidentification by experienced personnel is unlikely."

Air Force May Hire Outsiders To Oversee Projects (WSJ)

By Andy Pasztor

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

The Air Force is considering a potential new approach to managing multibillion-dollar space projects that could help it avoid the costly troubles that plagued previous efforts and lead to a lucrative new role for private-sector contractors.

But the new approach could present its own share of problems, including the potential for conflicts of interest.

The Air Force is considering hiring outside engineers or consultants to oversee systems integration of its next-generation navigational satellites, according to industry and government officials. Typically, the military service that orders a particular system retains primary responsibility and control over systems engineering and integration.

DOJ_NMG_0109767

But hiring a separate project integrator could set a precedent for future projects and would be a tacit acknowledgment that both Air Force Space Command and the Pentagon's massive weapons-buying bureaucracy lack the necessary expertise to perform the required oversight role.

The project involves setting up a next-generation U.S. global positioning system, which is widely used by the military and supports consumer applications such as in-car driving directions. The new system would feature stronger signals and be more jam-resistant. While a final price tag has yet to be determined, preliminary specifications for the system call for as many as two dozen satellites costing $100 million or more.

Boeing Co. and Lockheed Martin Corp. are vying to build satellites for the new system, known as GPS III, and may end up competing for the integration work as well. Production go-ahead is expected in 2008, though the newly designed spacecraft may not go into orbit until 2013. So far, the Air Force hasn't made a final decision on whether units of the two prime contractors will be eligible to receive any integration contracts, or if the Pentagon will seek a separate consulting firm to do that work, said the people familiar with the matter.

An Air Force spokesman declined to comment. A Boeing spokeswoman said the company is waiting for official requests for bids. A Lockheed Martin spokesman said the company is still reviewing details to determine if bidding on a potential systems-integration contract for GPS III "makes good business sense."

In the past few weeks, Air Force officials in conjunction with Aerospace Corp., a federally sponsored think tank that advises the Pentagon on acquisition matters, have been reviewing draft versions of the bid requests for GPS III. Air Force acquisition officials are specifically debating whether prime contractors for GPS III or other big-ticket programs should be barred from competing for certain integration contracts in order to avoid potential conflicts of interest, said a person familiar with the matter. The Air Force is seeking a mitigation plan to deal with any conflicts.

While an integrator wouldn't have final say over which company gets business, it would serve as the Air Force's eyes and ears and would play an important role in resolving technical issues and evaluating the performance of other contractors. Even if different parts of the same contractor are prevented from sharing sensitive information by setting up strict organizational divisions, the military recognizes such protections "by themselves will not mitigate" potential conflicts of interest, according to the Air Force's preliminary bid-solicitation document, issued earlier this month.

Having an integrator also doesn't eliminate complications. Boeing is the integrator for the Army's modernization program, called Future Combat System, and has faced scrutiny over costs and the viability of some of the technologies involved. Boeing has defended its work and the system.

Air Force officials already have said they intend to award separate manufacturing contracts for the satellites and related ground facilities.

The Air Force previously chose the international consulting giant Booz Allen Hamilton Inc. to serve as the lead systems integrator for its $16 billion Transformational Communications System. But that program is still in the concept-development phase and, compared to GPS III, a production ramp-up is likely to occur years later.

Top Federal Prosecutor In Conn. Named To National Position (AP)

By John Christoffersen, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. (AP) -- Connecticut's top federal prosecutor has been appointed to a national position focused on combatting violence amid signs that a three-year lull in crime is ending, officials said Wednesday.

U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor has been named associate deputy attorney general at the U.S. Justice Department, where he will lead a team focused on violent crime and initiatives to crack down on gangs and illegal guns. He also plans to remain U.S. attorney for Connecticut for at least six months.

"I'm honored that they asked me to do it," O'Connor said. "To me this is a great opportunity to be involved on the national level on the same issues I've been involved in on a local level."

Preliminary FBI data released last week showed that murders and robberies continued to rise across the country during the first six months of 2006. Violent crime figures are on pace for a second straight annual increase. Violent crime rose 2.2 percent nationally last year - the first increase since 2001.

Authorities around the country also are worried about a resurgence in gangs. O'Connor held the state's first gang summit in September, and his office has been stepping up prosecutions.

O'Connor, who was appointed U.S. attorney in 2002 and starts his new position next week, also has been active in Project Safe Neighborhoods, which targets gun-carrying felons and has recovered about 4,000 guns over the past five years, he said.

His appointment comes nearly a year after Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced an expanded program to combat gang violence, including an infusion of federal funds for cities with gang problems. His plan also called for expanding Project Safe Neighborhoods to include more anti-gang efforts and a new national gang task force.

O'Connor, whose new job will not increase his salary of about $145,000, said he will be in Connecticut as least once a week and plans to keep his Connecticut position for at least six months.

"I have no plans of stepping down as U.S. attorney unless circumstances lead me to conclude doing two jobs is having a negative effect on either one," O'Connor said. "I would not have accepted this offer from the deputy attorney general if I was not fully confident my leadership team could manage this district very effectively in my absence."

O'Connor's new position could help Connecticut with its law enforcement needs as well as position O'Connor for a top Justice Department position, said Stan Twardy, a former U.S. attorney for Connecticut. Others have held dual roles before, he said.

"If there are needs in Connecticut, they'll be heard directly, not through filters," Twardy said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple 'falsified' Files On Jobs' Options (FT)

By Richard Waters In San Francisco

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

Steve Jobs, chief executive of Apple Computer, was handed 7.5m stock options in 2001 without the required authorisation from the company's board of directors, according to people familiar with the matter.

Records that purported to show a full board meeting had taken place to approve Mr Jobs' remuneration, as required by Apple's procedures, were later falsified. These are now among the pieces of evidence being weighed by the Securities and Exchange Commission as it decides whether to pursue a case against the company or any individuals over the affair, according to these people.

News of the irregularities, which is expected to be revealed in a regulatory filing by Apple before the end of this week, will add to pressure that has been growing on one of Silicon Valley's most highly-regarded companies since the middle of 2005.

Apple is among more than 160 companies that have owned up to stock option backdating – handing options to executives and other employees at exercise prices that were set in hindsight at favourable levels – a scandal which has led to the departure of a number of chief executives.

The latest revelation is likely to add to questions about Apple's disclosures about its internal investigation into the backdating issue. In October, the company largely exonerated Mr Jobs over the matter, saying that while he had been "aware" of the backdating "in a few instances", he "did not receive or otherwise benefit from these grants and was unaware of the accounting implications".

According to an Apple filing in 2002, the options under review were handed to Mr Jobs in October 2001, at an exercise price of $18.30 a share. However, the purported board authorisation was dated near the end of the year, suggesting that the benefits were both not properly authorised and were backdated. Mr Jobs later surrendered his options before they were exercised, implying that he did not gain any direct benefit from them. He was later given a grant of restricted stock by the company instead.

Apple's lawyers have briefed people involved in the case on the findings of the company's internal review of the matter, though it remains unclear how much detail will be included in the filing.

Under Apple's rules, the chief executive's remuneration must be set by a compensation committee of independent directors and later authorised by the full board.

An Apple spokesman refused to comment on the matter on Wednesday, but said the company had handed the findings of its internal enquiry to the SEC. The company said in October that it had found "no misconduct by any member of Apple's current management team" but that its investigation "raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers". At the same time, it also announced the resignation from its board of Fred Andersen, a former chief financial officer. Mr Andersen had not been a director at the time of the 2001 options grant.

Legal News Slams Apple, But Stock Recovers (AP)

By May Wong, Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0109769

AP, December 28, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Wall Street ultimately shrugged off a report Wednesday that federal prosecutors are investigating whether former Apple Computer Inc. officials forged documents to maximize executives' profit from stock options.

The legal publication that detailed the federal probe also reported that CEO Steve Jobs has hired outside attorneys to represent him in the investigation.

Shares of the iPod and Macintosh computer maker went on a roller-coaster ride in trading Wednesday, falling almost 5 percent before rebounding to close up a penny at $81.52 on the Nasdaq.

In a morning note, UBS Investment Research analyst Ben Reitzes called investors' fears "overblown."

"Investors seem to be reacting to the mention of Steve Jobs," Reitzes said in his note. "We believe it could make sense to obtain counsel, given his immense personal fortune and influence."

The Recorder, a San Francisco-based publication owned by American Lawyer Media, reported late Tuesday that federal prosecutors are looking into forged documents at Apple related to administering stock options. The report cited people with knowledge of the case who requested anonymity because the case is the subject of criminal and civil government investigations.

Apple spokesman Steve Dowling said the company is providing the Securities and Exchange Commission with the results of an internal investigation into its practices for granting stock options, but had no further comment Wednesday.

Apple is one of nearly 200 companies that have disclosed SEC, Justice Department or internal investigations for potential backdating of stock options. Backdating refers to retroactively pegging the strike price of an option to a day when the stock traded cheaply. Options with low strike prices are more valuable to their owner because they are less expensive to exercise.

In October, Apple said the internal investigation found no misconduct by any current officers but raised concerns about how two former officers recorded and accounted for stock options. Citing people with knowledge of the investigation, the Recorder also reported those two former officers were general counsel Nancy Heinen and Chief Financial Officer Fred Anderson.

Anderson retired as Apple's CFO in 2004 but remained a board member until he resigned in October after the internal inquiry. Heinen left Apple for unknown reasons in the spring, before Apple initiated its stock options probe in June.

Apple said the probe found accounting "irregularities" that occurred between 1997 and 2002. The troublesome awards included millions of options given to Jobs, though he subsequently surrendered the awards in 2003.

Echoing other analysts who have said they do not believe Jobs' position will be affected by the scandal, Piper Jaffray analyst Gene Munster said Wednesday that he remains convinced Jobs was not involved in any wrongdoing.

"Apple has issues with stock options, but I don't think it matters unless Steve Jobs is impacted," Munster said. "I think Wall Street could care less about this. They've already got two fall people — Nancy and Fred — and what it comes down to for investors is how many iPods they sold in the December quarter."

On Dec. 15, Apple said it was delaying filing its annual report with the SEC because of its ongoing investigation into stock option grants.

Apple Recovers After New Options Info (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, December 28, 2006

NEW YORK (MarketWatch) -- Apple Computer Inc. shares regained ground after being rocked Wednesday by a published report that some company officials may have falsified stock-option documents, and that Chief Executive Steve Jobs has hired a lawyer to represent him in federal inquiries.

The report from the California legal newspaper the Recorder, which appeared on the Web site Law.com, said federal prosecutors are examining the documents to determine whether criminal charges should be filed. The report cited "individuals familiar with the case who requested anonymity."

A separate report, which appeared in the Financial Times online edition, indicated that Jobs gained 7.5 million stock options in 2001 without the board's authorization, which is required.

The FT report, which cites unnamed people familiar with the matter, added that records were falsified to show that the board had approved the options for Jobs. The Securities and Exchange Commission is looking at those records to decide whether to pursue a case against Apple, according to the FT story.

The FT story didn't say who allegedly gave the options to Jobs or who allegedly falsified company records.

The Recorder story also said Jobs had decided to hire his own attorney to deal with inquiries by the Justice Department and the SEC. The high-profile chief executive had been represented by the company's outside law firm.

Apple had previously said that its own internal investigation found no misconduct by Jobs or other senior executives. The company did say that its probe had raised concerns about the actions of two unidentified former executives.

Company spokesman Steve Dowling had no specific comment on the news report, except to say Apple is "providing all the details of its investigation" to the SEC.

He said Apple plans to file its 10-K on or before Dec. 29, but he declined to say if it will contain any update on the stock-option investigation.

Gene Munster, an analyst at Piper Jaffray, pegged the odds that Jobs was involved in any shenanigans at less than 5%.

"We believe there is a very low likelihood that Steve Jobs was involved in the falsification of options documents, although we expect the investigation may continue to point to former Apple officers," Munster wrote Wednesday in a research note.

He reiterated his outperform rating on the stock.

Further details about Apple's situation are expected to be unveiled Friday, when the company plans to file several quarterly reports and its annual report for the fiscal year ended Sept. 30.

Apple has delayed the filings amid an internal probe into the backdating of employee stock-option grants.

The company previously has said that it would restate financial results for prior reporting periods to record noncash compensation charges after it found accounting irregularities for some grants issued between 1997 and 2002. Apple has not given an estimate of those charges.

The maker of Macintosh personal computers and iPod music and video players is among more than 100 firms under scrutiny for the practice of pricing option grants on dates that were different from their actual grant dates.

Grants priced on days when the underlying stock price was at monthly or quarterly lows led, in many cases, to sizable financial windfalls for corporate executives.

Revelations of options backdating have led to the ouster of more than 30 executives at companies. Among them is a former Apple chief financial officer, Fred Anderson, who resigned on Oct. 4, the same day that the company said its internal probe had found evidence of backdating.

That same investigation revealed that "in a few instances, Chief Executive Steve Jobs was aware that favorable grant dates had been selected, but he did not receive or otherwise benefit from these grants and was unaware of the accounting implications" of backdating.

Apple Shares May Fall On FT Report Of Jobs's Options Grant (BLOOM)

By Ian King And Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, December 28, 2006

Dec. 28 (Bloomberg) -- Shares of Apple Computer Inc. may fall after the Financial Times reported Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs was given stock options in 2001 without the authorization of the company's board.

Company records that appear to show the full board considered a grant of 7.5 million stock options were falsified, the newspaper reported, citing people familiar with the matter. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission is examining the evidence, the report said.

``It does create a certain amount of doubt as to whether Steve Jobs can stay with the company," Rob Enderle of the research firm Enderle Group said yesterday in an interview. ``It looks more and more serious."

Apple is among the biggest names caught in a stock-option scandal that has widened to more than 190 companies. In June the maker of the iPod music player began an internal review of its grants, including one to Jobs. Apple said in October said it found 15 misdated grants from 1997 to 2002. The Recorder, a San Francisco-based legal newspaper, first reported yesterday on the discovery of possibly falsified documents related to options.

``We are providing all details regarding the internal independent investigation to the SEC and not commenting beyond that," Steve Dowling, an Apple spokesman, said by telephone.

John Nester, a spokesman for the SEC, refused to comment on the Financial Times article. Claude Stern, the partner in charge of the Redwood City, California, office of Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges, the law firm hired by Apple's board to examine the grants, declined to comment.

Shares Fall

Shares of Cupertino, California-based Apple declined $2.47, or 3 percent, to $79.05 in extended trading after the report. They gained 1 cent to $81.52 in regular Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading and had risen 13 percent this year.

``The SEC has been looking very hard at these cases and they're working with the Department of Justice to put together criminal cases," said Bill Portanova, a former federal prosecutor in solo practice in Sacramento, California. ``When prosecutors are looking at something that they think is wrong in the first place, and they find paperwork in support of that thing that has been falsified, their appetite is whetted."

When Apple released the results of its three-month investigation in October, it didn't disclose any falsified documents. The company said it found backdated option awards on 15 occasions from 1997 to January 2002. While Jobs, 51, was aware of some instances, he didn't benefit, Apple said.

Restatements Due

Apple promised to submit restatements for the third quarter ended July 1 and the year ended Sept. 30 by the end of December.

Backdating allows executives to inflate the value of the stock options by retroactively choosing grant dates when the underlying shares are lower. Restatements, revisions and charges have topped $5.7 billion among the companies that have corrected their results thus far.

Jobs apologized to shareholders in October after finding instances of favorable grants. Apple said at the time the actions of two unnamed former executives raised ``serious concerns.'' Former Chief Financial Officer Fred Anderson, whose tenure included the five years when options were manipulated, resigned from the company's board.

While Jobs knew some options were backdated, he didn't benefit or understand the accounting, the company said. Apple added there has been no misconduct by current management.

U.S. Attorney

The Recorder said yesterday federal prosecutors are examining whether Apple officials falsified documents to inflate the value of grants. The fake documents were uncovered during the company's internal probe, and the information was passed on to the U.S. Attorney's office, the Recorder said, citing people familiar with the case.

Helen Yee, a Justice Department spokeswoman in San Francisco, didn't return a phone call seeking comment after normal business hours.

``How does it affect the timing, predictability or size of cash flow of Apple going forward? The only way it can is if they implicate Jobs in some way,'' said James Grossman, a fund manager at Thrivent Financial for Lutherans in Appleton, Wisconsin. The firm oversees $65 billion including Apple shares.

``The charges are serious,'' said Grossman. ``I'm going to stick with the original statement by the company that Jobs isn't a part of it.''

Nabors Industries Will Relaunch Review Of Option-Grant Practices (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Nabors Industries Ltd. said it is initiating a further review of its option-granting practices in light of "issues raised" in an article published by The Wall Street Journal.

The oil-and-gas driller said this review follows an internal review earlier this year of its stock-option practices going back to 1998. It said this initial review "did not suggest that there was reason to question the propriety" of its option-granting practices.

The Journal article, published yesterday, said that Eugene Isenberg, the chief executive officer of Nabors, is among the highest-paid corporate executives in history, receiving more than $450 million in compensation over the past 19 years, largely due to stock-option grants whose value, the article contends, was enhanced by certain "controversial moves" made by the company, which has U.S. headquarters in Houston but is registered in Bermuda.

The moves cited by the Journal included allowing Mr. Isenberg to trade in certain worthless options for new ones with lower exercise prices and "reloading" Mr. Isenberg with new options when he cashed in others.

In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading yesterday, Nabors's shares rose 30 cents, or 1%, to $30.53.

In separate options-related news, HCC Insurance Holdings Inc. said it has completed an independent review of its stock-option-granting practice and recorded a gross noncash compensation expense of $26.6 million related to corrections of errors from 1997 to 2005.

The company said the charge had no impact on its reported net revenue, cash or cash flow for the period, but it did result in a net after-tax decrease in shareholders' equity of $3.3 million.

HCC, of Houston, said its conclusion of the review and subsequent completion of certain quarterly and annual financial filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission will have "cured any possible Event of Default" stemming from its failure to deliver the reports in a timely manner under the provisions of certain debt offerings.

In addition, HCC posted third-quarter net income of $93.3 million, or 80 cents a share, up from $7.4 million, or seven cents a share, in the year-earlier period.

HCC's shares rose 38 cents, or 1.2%, to $32.04 on the Big Board.

Street Sleuth France Ready To Bring Hedge Case (WSJ)

By Alistair MacDonald

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

France's markets regulator will fine hedge fund GLG Partners LP and Deutsche Bank AG for abuses arising out of a convertible-bond offer for French telecommunications-equipment maker Alcatel SA, according to people familiar with the matter.

The Autorité des Marchés Financiers, or AMF, is following the recommendations of a preliminary report it received in October that was compiled by one of its officials.

The AMF has decided to increase the fine levied on London-based GLG to €1.2 million ($1.6 million) from €1 million recommended in the report and reduce Deutsche Bank's fine to about €300,000 from €1.5 million, these people said.

Alcatel SA, now Alcatel-Lucent, announced Dec. 12, 2002, that it would offer between $640 million and $835 million in bonds that would convert into shares.

The AMF was investigating whether hedge funds acted on information offered by Deutsche Bank before the bonds' issuance was publicly announced.

While it is common practice by banks to preview deals to select clients ahead of their announcement, it is against market regulations in Europe to act on that information.

The AMF's final report will mainly blame former GLG trader Philippe Jabre for abuses related to the convertible-bond issue, according to one person familiar with the matter. Mr. Jabre is planning to launch a hedge fund in Geneva.

A spokesman for Mr. Jabre declined to comment. A spokesman for GLG said the firm will appeal the AMF's decision.

A Deutsche Bank spokeswoman said, "Deutsche Bank has been sanctioned for technical and procedural reasons. There is no case to answer on insider trading. Deutsche Bank will not be appealing."

The AMF typically allows the appeals process to get under way before announcing the final results of its investigations.

The preliminary report said three other hedge funds, Marshall Wace LLP, Meditor Capital Management Ltd. and Ferox Capital Management Ltd., which had been targets of the investigation, didn't have a case to answer to. It is unclear whether they have been given a final clearance by the AMF.

The AMF's decision comes as politicians and some regulators in Europe call for increased scrutiny of hedge funds, which are private investment pools catering mainly to wealthy investors and institutions.

KLA-Tencor's Former Chief Tompkins Resigns From Board (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Ian King

Bloomberg, December 28, 2006

Dec. 27 (Bloomberg) -- Former KLA-Tencor Corp. Chairman Jon Tompkins resigned from the board, making him the fourth senior official to sever ties with the company since it discovered problems related to the backdating of stock option grants.

Tompkins resigned on Dec. 21, San Jose, California-based KLA-Tencor said in a U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission filing today. Tompkins, who is also chairman of Electro Scientific Industries Inc., quit for personal reasons, KLA-Tencor spokeswoman Kyra Whitten said. She declined to comment further.

Tompkins served as chief executive officer from May 1997 until July 1998, then as chairman until June 1999. The company said in September it would restate results from 1997 to 2002 after a special committee found incorrect dates were used in granting stock options to executives.

KLA-Tencor, the second-largest U.S. chip-equipment maker, said on Oct. 16 it found $400 million in costs related to backdated stock options and canceled grants to another former CEO, Kenneth Schroeder.

General Counsel Stuart J. Nichols resigned that day and KLA-Tencor said it terminated ``all aspects of its employment relationship'' with Schroeder, who ran the company from 1999 to 2005, succeeding Tompkins. A day later, Chairman Kenneth Levy retired. The company said it would reprice options held by Levy and other executives.

Tompkins didn't respond to a phone message seeking comment left at Electro Scientific Industries.

Shares

Shares of KLA-Tencor rose 20 cents to $50.21 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading and have gained 1.8 percent this year.

KLA-Tencor is among more than 190 companies to disclose internal or federal investigations of stock-option practices to determine if grant dates were manipulated to enrich employees. The SEC, the Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are looking for evidence that companies broke securities or tax laws by backdating grants to coincide with days when share prices were low.

They're also examining grants that were made in advance of news that drove up company stock prices, a practice known as spring-loading.

SEC Reversal Irks A Committee Chief (WSJ)

By Siobhan Hughes

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Securities and Exchange Commission's decision to reverse course and relax disclosure rules on executive pay isn't sitting well with the Democrat who will head the House Financial Services Committee in the new Congress.

Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.) said he is "very disappointed with both the substance and the procedure" involved in the rule changes, which the SEC announced late Friday, just before the long Christmas weekend.

The rules, which apply to publicly held companies, would reduce the amount of top executives' compensation that many companies would be required to disclose next year. Companies would be allowed to spread the value of options and restricted-stock awards over a number of years, disclosing them as they vested, rather than in the year they were granted. Businesses had lobbied for the change, arguing that the SEC's plan to tighten disclosure requirements for options would have overstated executive pay.

Mr. Frank's committee has oversight of the SEC, and he could hold hearings on the executive-pay rules. He has already said he would push for legislation to allow shareholders to vote on executive compensation.

"Backtracking by the SEC on this important matter of stock options reinforces my determination that Congress must act to deal with the problem of executive compensation that is now unconstrained by anything except the self-restraint of top executives, a commodity that is apparently in insufficient supply," Mr. Frank said.

The SEC said it acted to reconcile the value of stock-options awards as disclosed in corporate financial statements with the value of executive-stock option grants disclosed to investors.

Companies treat stock options as costs in their financial statements as the options become exercisable. The SEC rules had previously required companies to disclose the value of stock-options awards on the date of the award, sometimes years before the recipient was entitled to exercise them.

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox said in a statement yesterday that "the object is to report accurate numbers. Artificially inflating executive pay, or reporting 'phantom' pay, is just as misleading as routinely underreporting it, which was the case before we adopted the new executive-compensation rules in July."

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce had complained that by including the value of options, stock or other awards that wouldn't vest -- or pay out -- for years, the earlier rules would have made executive pay packages look misleadingly large.

Executive pay increasingly is becoming a hot-button political issue as the pay gap widens between corporate chieftains and rank-and-file employees. Prompted by investor concern, the SEC earlier this year approved rules that will provide more information about the pay and perquisites granted to top executives. The new details of executive-pay packages will be released mostly in early 2007, when companies file annual proxy statements.

In its latest changes, the SEC took the unusual approach of making the new rules for stock options effective almost immediately. That decision essentially renders moot the agency's plans to provide a 30-day public comment period on the matter.

"The problem of executive pay that is both greatly excessive and deliberately obscured is a grave one," Mr. Frank said. "I had been encouraged when the SEC recognized this problem in its initial proposal, and while that continues to provide improvements in the relevant rules, this slippage is regrettable both substantively and for not having been open to more public discussion."

Frank Wants Pullback On Executive Salaries (USAT)

USA Today, December 28, 2006

Rep. Barney Frank, who will head the House committee that oversees the Securities and Exchange Commission, said Congress should rein in executive pay after the SEC changed rules for how companies value stock-option awards.

"Backtracking by the SEC on this important matter of stock options reinforces my determination that Congress must act to deal with the problem of executive compensation that is now unconstrained by anything except the self-restraint of top executives," Frank, D-Mass., said in a statement Wednesday.

The SEC said on Dec. 22 that it will let companies report stock-option expenses "as that cost is recognized" instead of when awards are made. The change conforms with an accounting rule that requires recognition of the costs of equity awards over the period in which an employee works for them, the SEC said. Stock options often vest three to five years after being granted.

The change will allow firms to report lower compensation costs by spreading expenses over many years rather than disclosing them all at once, said accounting experts including Charles Mulford, a professor at the Georgia Institute of Technology.

Frank, the next chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, said it's "ironic" that the agency wants to change its rules when regulators are uncovering "widespread abuses" in stock-option awards. Almost 200 companies are under investigation on issues involving backdating option awards to periods of low share prices, a practice that boosts the value of the grants.

SEC spokesman John Nester didn't immediately return a phone call seeking comment.

Last week's action by the SEC amends regulations approved by the agency in July, which were the most extensive overhaul of executive-pay rules in 14 years.

New SEC Pay Rule To Benefit Executives (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

The incoming chairman of the House Financial Services Committee suggested it was a Christmas present for corporate executives from the Securities and Exchange Commission.

But SEC Chairman Christopher Cox yesterday defended the agency's recent action to modify stock option disclosures, saying it "will provide the maximum clarity and consistency for investors."

On the Friday before Christmas, without advance notice or a public vote, the SEC announced an amendment that generally would make top executives' annual pay appear smaller than it otherwise would have.

The amendment, which represented an about-face from a requirement that the agency adopted in July, would change the way stock option grants are reflected in the main compensation table of companies' annual pay reports. This revision lets businesses spread the estimated value of those options over multiple years instead of reporting their full value in the year the options are awarded.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and accounting firms that work for public companies had advocated such an approach. But reaction from other quarters was critical.

"I didn't even know they had a chimney at the SEC, and then all of a sudden this came slipping down it," Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), who is set to lead the Financial Services Committee, said in an interview.

"Backtracking by the SEC on this important matter of stock options reinforces my determination that Congress must act to deal with the problem of executive compensation," Frank said in a statement yesterday.

The change "will make it harder for investors to get a transparent picture of the magnitude and value of options being granted to corporate executives," said Lynn E. Turner, former chief accountant at the SEC and now head of research at Glass, Lewis & Co., an adviser to institutional investors.

The commissioners adopted the amendment Dec. 15, but the agency waited to announce it because the Office of Management and Budget did not approve the rule until Friday afternoon, SEC spokesman John Nester said yesterday.

The SEC action reflects the confusion and criticism that surround stock options, which have created great wealth for many executives and have been criticized as contributing to some of the worst corporate scandals. In recent months, many companies have been examining whether option grants were improperly backdated to maximize their value to executives, and some corporate chiefs have lost their jobs.

The SEC and the Justice Department have been conducting probes of options practices, and criminal charges have been filed against officials from two companies.

An option gives the holder the right to buy a share of stock at a set price. If the market price of the stock rises above that level, the holder can exercise the option at a profit. Option grants typically vest incrementally over a period of years.

Policymakers have long struggled to include some measure of option value in executive pay, because the ultimate value of options only becomes clear when they are exercised. They may end up being worthless, or worth much more than initially estimated.

In July, the SEC overhauled the rules for pay disclosures, requiring that companies show annual compensation totals for top executives that include full estimated values of option grants. The approach the SEC announced Friday would spread the value of the options over the vesting period, following the method companies must use to account for the cost of options on their financial statements.

"Artificially inflating executive pay, or reporting 'phantom' pay that will never be received, is just as misleading as routinely underreporting it," the SEC chairman said in a statement yesterday.

Estimates of the total value of option grants will not disappear from the pay disclosures. Rather, they are to appear in a separate chart from the summary compensation table.

"I don't see it as an effort [by] the commission to enable companies to hide the ball on the value of option grants," said John Olson of the law firm Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, which represents business groups.

Federal law generally requires that the SEC to publish a rule 30 days before it takes effect, but there are exceptions. In this case, the SEC found that inviting 30 days of advance public comment would have been "impracticable, unnecessary and contrary to the public interest," partly because the disclosure rules it adopted in July kicked in Dec. 15.

Editorial: Thompson Memorandum (PAPN)

Harrisburg Patriot-News (PA), December 28, 2006

Reacting to pressure by Arlen Specter and others on the "Thompson Memorandum," the Justice Department has proposed guidelines on what critics contend have been coercive and unconstitutional tactics used in investigations of corporations.

But the new guidelines still fall short of adequately protecting constitutional rights of employees. Specter and his allies, who include former Pennsylvania governor and U.S. Attorney General Dick Thornburgh and incoming Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., should continue pushing.

A memorandum issued in 2003 by then Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson issued a number of factors prosecutors should consider in deciding whether to bring criminal charges against a company. One of them took heavily into account the degree of a company's cooperation with investigators.

As a result, critics contend companies have gone too far and pressured employees to do such things as waive attorney-client privileges and other protections. While this may aid the company, it can expose individuals.

The starkest example came when a federal judge in New York ruled the Justice Department was responsible for undue pressure executives of accounting firm KPMG put on employees to cooperate in the government's probe of tax shelters.

The judge, siding with two ex-employees who alleged they were threatened with termination if they didn't waive certain rights in dealing with investigators, issued a blistering attack on the Thompson Memorandum as depriving individuals of their Fifth Amendment protection against self-incrimination.

Specter has said he will re-introduce legislation in the next Congress that would prohibit the Justice Department from pressuring corporations to waive their rights to preserve conversations and other information shared with lawyers as confidential; allow corporations to continue paying employees' lawyers fees without threat of retribution from prosecutors; and bar the department from considering how cooperative a corporation has been in determining whether to file charges.

The Thompson Memorandum remains in effect, but investigators must show a "legitimate need" to obtain privileged information and must obtain written approve from a deputy attorney general before pursuing them.

This is unsatisfactory in that we are talking about constitutional rights still being left to the discretion of too few in the Justice Department.

Specter and his allies should insist on further negotiations, and if they prove futile, spell things out clearly in legislation.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Feds Look For Fraud In Detroit City Lease (DEN)

By Paul Egan, The Detroit News

Detroit News, December 28, 2006

Audit shows $1.5M overbilling for building owned by political donor; his lawyer says city was repaid.

DETROIT -- The U.S. Justice Department is investigating possible fraud in a building lease held by Detroit's Employment and Training Department after an audit identified $1.5 million in apparent overcharges, sources familiar with the investigation said.

The Detroit City Council allocated $5.3 million at the end of 1999 to cover five years of lease payments on the building at 1300 Rosa Parks, but city payments totaled $10.7 million after 39 months, the audit said.

The building is owned by Hampton Ridge Properties LLC, which is controlled by Grosse Pointe Farms businessman Cullan Meathe, a major donor to several Detroit politicians and co-owner of Metro Cars Inc.

Detroit lawyer Steve Fishman, who represents Meathe, said the case is essentially a landlord-tenant dispute. "My understanding is that most, if not all, of the money in dispute has been paid back to the city," Fishman said.

The city-commissioned audit, by the Whall Group of Auburn Hills, found in 2003 that Hampton Ridge charged the city for insurance and other expenses the company was supposed to pay; charged the property taxes for other buildings or for taxes it never paid; and submitted duplicate invoices for security, taxes, insurance and other expenses.

Federal investigators also are reviewing allegations that a subcontractor supplied Hampton Ridge Properties two sets of invoices -- a lower one to be paid by Hampton Ridge and a higher one to be submitted to the city for reimbursement, sources familiar with the investigation said.

The inquiry is one of several investigations at Detroit City Hall that have led to the indictment of two former City Council members and scrutiny of city contracts at Cobo Center and elsewhere. Justice Department officials refused to confirm or deny the lease investigation.

Aside from any possible fraud, city officials have acknowledged their own mistakes in allowing unusual lease provisions and paying invoices that should not have been approved.

"It was horribly sloppy on the city's part," said Matt Allen, a spokesman for Detroit Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick.

Rent is $1.06M a year

Even without any overcharges, $5.3 million would not have been enough to cover the five-year lease, which allowed Hampton Ridge to charge a 5 percent management fee in addition to the $1.06 million-a-year rent, plus be reimbursed for certain expenses.

Allen said city officials are cooperating with the federal investigation and are also conducting an internal probe into the lease -- signed before Kilpatrick took office in 2002.

The 117,800-square-foot building houses a state-run Michigan Works employment satellite center and the state and federal governments provided money the city used to make the lease payments.

This year, city General Counsel Sharon McPhail negotiated the return of $1.2 million in overcharges to the city from Hampton Ridge, Allen said. A final financial settlement has not been reached, pending a meeting in January with state officials, he said.

City and state officials refused to release a copy of the Whall audit under Michigan's Freedom of Information Act., but a copy of the 61-page report was reviewed by The Detroit News.

The audit said it appeared Hampton Ridge overcharged the city about $686,000 for building improvements, $375,000 for property taxes, $215,000 for maintenance, $214,000 for heating and cooling, elevator and roof work, $163,000 for insurance and $75,000 for security.

Poor bookkeeping blamed

The lease required Hampton Ridge to maintain insurance "at its sole cost and expense," the audit said.

"Nevertheless, Hampton Ridge Properties billed and the department paid approximately $162,771.50 for insurance," the audit said.

Even if the city had been responsible for insurance payments, Hampton Ridge Properties still would have overcharged the city by about $50,000, through duplicate invoices and by improperly billing a $2,013 automobile insurance invoice to the lease, the audit said.

In the area of security, "it appears that … several invoices were submitted twice and the department paid them twice," the audit said.

According to the report, Meathe acknowledged a problem with overcharges in a 2003 meeting with city officials and blamed poor bookkeeping.

Meathe, who did not return phone calls from The News, asked city officials in January 2003 to pay his February 2003 invoice early because he was experiencing a cash flow problem, the audit said.

At an April 9, 2003, meeting with city officials, Meathe complained about slow payments by the city and said he was "carrying the city … because he had to pay the vendors before the department paid him the rental monies due," the audit said.

But one of the vendors claims it was not being paid for work it did for Hampton Ridge that was charged to the lease. Security company Pinkerton's Inc. sued Hampton Ridge in Wayne Circuit Court in August 2004, alleging it had not been paid nearly $169,000 for security it had provided at 1300 Rosa Parks since November 2000, court records show.

City officials said that at the time Meathe complained about late payments, the city had paid all invoices on or before the due date, except for two, the audit said. Those two invoices were paid eight days late, the audit said.

Murders Are Up In New York And Several Other U.S. Cities For 2006 (FINDLAW/AP)

By Karen Matthews, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-After many years of decline, the number of murders climbed this year in New York and many other major U.S. cities, reaching their highest levels in a decade in some places.

Among the reasons given: gangs, drugs, the easy availability of illegal guns, a disturbing tendency among young people to pull guns when they do not get the respect they demand, and, in Houston at least, an influx of Hurricane Katrina evacuees.

In New York, where the city reported 579 homicides through Dec. 24 - a nearly 10 percent increase from the year before - the spike is mostly the result of an unusually large number of "reclassified homicides," or those involving victims who were shot or stabbed years ago but did not die until this year. Thirty-five such deaths have been added to this year's toll, compared with an annual average of about a dozen.

At the same time, Police Department spokesman Paul Browne noted that this year's total is only slightly higher than last year's 539 homicides - the city's lowest death toll in more than 40 years.

Browne blamed the rise in part on the availability of guns, particularly weapons from out of state. The city this year sued dozens of out-of-state gun shops that it says are responsible for many of the illegal weapons on the streets of New York.

In Chicago, homicides through the first 11 months of the year were up 3.3 percent compared with the same period in 2005, reversing a four-year decline. A police spokeswoman said gang violence has been a contributing factor.

In New Haven, Connecticut, there were 23 homicides as of Tuesday, compared with 15 in 2004 and in 2005. Police Chief Francisco Ortiz said that about half of this year's killings involve young people settling disputes with guns instead of fists.

"They're all struggling with this thing about respect and pride," Ortiz said. "It's about respect. It's about revenge. It's about having a reputation. It's about turf and it's about girls."

Houston police attribute the 15 percent increase in the homicide count to the influx of Katrina evacuees from the Gulf Coast

"So we expect that to settle," Lt. Murray Smith said. "We're hoping it will go down."

New Orleans, with its post-Katrina exodus, is the only major U.S. city that saw a sharp decline in the number of homicides. There were 154 in New Orleans this year as of Monday, said police spokesman Sgt. Jeffrey Johnson, down from 210 in 2005. But the city was largely empty during the fall and winter of 2005-06, and even now has only about half of its pre-Katrina population of 455,000.

Some cities, like Cincinnati - which has had 83 homicides so far, up from 79 in 2005 - posted their highest numbers ever. Others saw their highest death tolls in years.

Oakland, California, had 148 homicides as of Wednesday, up 57 percent from last year and the highest in more than a decade. Philadelphia's 2006 homicide total was 403 as of Wednesday, the first time the number has topped 400 in nearly a decade. There were 380 killings in all of 2005.

Philadelphia officials have struggled all year to reduce the violence. In July, Mayor John F. Street gave a televised address in which pleaded with young people: "Lay down your weapons. Do it now. Choose education over violence."

A few cities reported slight decreases in murders. Los Angeles' total was down about 4 percent to 464 homicides through Dec. 23. San Francisco's fell about 15 percent. San Francisco Police Sgt. Steve Mannina said the drop is partly due to increased patrols in violence-prone areas and more overtime approved by the police chief.

The FBI does not release its national crime statistics until several months after the end of the year. The bureau's statistics for the first six months of 2006 showed an increase of 1.4 percent in the number of murders in the first half of 2006 compared with the first six months of 2005.

Andrew Karmen, a criminologist at John Jay College in New York, said that while there are various theories for the drop in murders in New York and other cities in the 1990s, no one knows for sure why it happened. And if they are going up again, no one knows the reason for that, either, he said.

He noted that police departments tend to take credit when the murder rate goes down. "When crime goes up it will be interesting to see whether they will accept responsibility," Karmen said.

Ryan Sues To Keep Pension (CHIT)

By Michael Higgins, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, December 28, 2006

Former Gov. George Ryan filed a lawsuit Wednesday against state retirement officials, battling to keep a pension of more than $60,000 a year that Ryan says he earned before the scandals that led to his wide-ranging fraud convictions in April.

The seven-member board of the General Assembly Retirement System voted unanimously last month to cancel Ryan's entire $197,000-a-year pension in light of the convictions.

But that decision was "erroneous," Ryan's lawyers argued in the lawsuit filed in Cook County Circuit Court. They contend that Ryan's racketeering and fraud convictions dealt only with his actions as secretary of state and governor—not his 24 previous years in public office.

DOJ_NMG_0109778

"The Board of Trustees failed to produce any evidence that Ryan's felony conviction related to or arose out of ... his service as a member of the Kankakee County Board of Supervisors, a member of the Illinois General Assembly, or lieutenant governor," wrote Ryan's attorneys, who include former Gov. James Thompson.

Thompson's argument, if successful, would allow Ryan to collect $61,885 a year, nearly his entire ending salary as lieutenant governor, pension officials said earlier.

Ryan was convicted in April on charges that, as secretary of state and governor, he doled out sweetheart deals to friends and used state resources and employees for political gain.

He was sentenced in September to 6? years in prison. A federal appeals court ruled last month that Ryan may remain free while his appeal is pending.

Officials at the Retirement System could not be reached Wednesday for comment.

Scott Mulford, a spokesman for Atty. Gen. Lisa Madigan, said Wednesday that he could not comment specifically on Ryan's suit. "The opinion that Atty. Gen. Madigan issued [earlier] speaks for itself," Mulford said. "It was researched exhaustively."

But retirement officials, relying on a legal opinion from Madigan, had said in an earlier ruling that Ryan's attorneys had misinterpreted state law on pensions.

According to the retirement board, public officials who commit felonies relating to their "official duties" forfeit the right to receive any pension from the state.

While Ryan held many positions over the years, "there is but one employer, the state of Illinois," the retirement board ruled.

If Ryan's position prevailed, the law would be too weak to deter corruption, the retirement board said.

Under Ryan's approach, "a lifelong legislator ... having decided not to run again after what may be 20 years of service, can therefore feel free to take his chances during his last term, knowing that all he is risking is the last two years of his service," the board said. "Surely, that is not the intent" of the law.

Ryan served on the Kankakee board from 1966 to 1973; in the General Assembly from 1973 to 1983; and as lieutenant governor from 1983 to 1991.

Since leaving the governor's office in 2003, Ryan has collected $630,000 from the state pension fund, according to retirement officials. Officials said the board's ruling did not require Ryan to return that money and he is eligible to be refunded the $235,508 he paid into the system.

In Ryan's criminal case, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer had previously denied his request to remain free pending appeal. But the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned that ruling. Ryan's lawyers had argued that tumultuous jury deliberations raised significant legal questions that could result in a new trial.

Mortgage Fraud Hits Couple To The Tune Of $2M (WFAA)

WFAA-TV, December 28, 2006

Misfortune is not the only reason 3500 homes are posted for foreclosure next month in North Texas. The FBI says mortgage fraud has reached epidemic proportions.

One couple, who found they were major property owners in North Texas without ever signing any papers, has felt the epidemic first-hand.

Paul Dyl and his wife Jackie live in a mobile home in Cheyenne, Wyoming. Mr. Dyl drives a well used pickup truck and their annual income is less than $30,000 a year.

While Mr. Dyl has never been to Texas and Mrs. Dyl has only been in the state once, beginning in 2004, six North Texas properties ended up in their name.

They said they knew nothing about it until they began receiving phone calls from bill collectors all over the country claiming they owed more than $2 million dollars.

"And now I'm 57 years old and I'm never going to recover," Mr. Dyl said. "It just turned everything upside down."

The first bank to call was what is now Fidelity Bank in Plano. The Dyls said bank president Tom Freas was among the nastiest of the callers.

"He just screamed at me one day," Mr. Dyl said. "He said, 'You signed these documents saying you were going to live in Texas."

Mr. Dyl said Freas said he had actually met up with him face to face.

"And I said, 'No, I've never seen you face to face,'" he said.

Anybody who has ever really met Mr. Dyl would most likely remember him since he has no right hand after losing it in an accident years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0109779

"You can't miss a hook," he said.

The Dyls, it turns out, were victims of identity theft and mortgage fraud to the tune of more than $2 million. The checks and balances that might be expected to be in place when getting a mortgage failed, six times.

Despite the anguish the Dyls have been through, virtually everybody News 8 could find in the case claimed it was a private matter and somebody else's fault.

Freas wouldn't talk about the case saying, "It's covered under the privacy act....the issue is resolved between me and my customers."

The problem is the Dyls never were his customers.

"He got real nasty about it," Mr. Dyl said. "And he said, 'We give you a loan and then you can't make the payments. What's the deal? And I said, 'I don't know you people.'"

The Fidelity loan only accounts for one vacant lot in Flower Mound that had been bought in the Dyls' name for more than $294,000. Nearly every day over the past year, they said they have discovered more as debt collectors continued to call.

A meager paper trail on a Plano house, which was bought in their name for $360,000, led partly to Benchmark Mortgage.

On its website, Benchmark touts how much money brokers can earn making loans through them. Benchmark Chief Operating Officer Stewart Hunter wouldn't talk about the case either. However, he said the Dyls were his customer and cited the Privacy Act.

A loan application for the property bears the address of a Benchmark Mortgage "office," which turned out to be an apartment house in Irving.

Experts say an apartment can be a mortgage office and be part of a drive to make buying a home easier to make money.

"There are people who will do deals over the phone from Florida or California having never visited the property and having never physically met the loan officer or the realtor or whatever," said David Hamilton, a mortgage lender.

Experts say the way to prevent fraud by the various entities handling the process is by requiring the people to come in person.

The Dyls said they always sign their names using their middle initial, which was one of the indicators that their signatures were forged. One forgery apparently led to another.

David Fair, CEO of one of Dallas' leading title companies, said mortgage fraud can snowball.

There have been so many fraudulent mortgage fraud transactions in the last two years that now someone who is a perpetrator is able to go get a previous mortgage fraud to use it to support the current mortgage fraud," he said.

Washington Mutual, one of the nation's largest home lenders, made four loans to someone purporting to be the Dyls for more than $800,000.

The Dyls said they receive dozens of threatening letters and even more calls.

"They were so threatening sometimes it was just fearful," said Mrs. Dyl.

They filed a complaint to Washington Mutual, known as WaMu, in the fall of 2005. However, nothing happened until News 8 contacted the company. WaMu declined an on camera interview.

But in a statement, Brad Russell said, "It is the [mortgage] broker's responsibility to verify the identity of the borrower" and; "WaMu is committed to working with the credit agencies, proper authorities and victims to minimize any future impact this may have on the Dyl family."

"You guys screwed up our credit," Dyl said. "We can't go out and buy a car. We can't buy nothing without all this stuff going on."

Fair said the growth of mortgage fraud is disastrous to the real estate economy and sees one solution.

"We need to have more enforcement," he said. "We don't seem to have enough enforcement."

The Dyls contacted the FBI but nothing has happened. They ultimately took their case to the Cheyenne Wyoming Police Department, which took their complaint.

They tried to hire a lawyer but most wanted $5,000 to even start a case. Now, Mike Haines of Dallas is representing them.

Credit Agencies Lag On Errors, Fraud (BOS)

By Beth Healy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, December 28, 2006

Consumers struggle to untangle reports

BRIDGEWATER -- Eric W. Carroll's credit report says he has a home in Florida, a wife named Katrina, and a pile of unpaid bills.

He first learned this when a debt collector called him in 2002, dialing his apartment in Bridgewater, yet asking for an Eric W. Carroll from Avon Park, Fla. Carroll insisted there was some mistake: He was not married, and he had never lived in Florida.

Nearly five years later, collectors are still hounding the wrong Eric Carroll.

The details of his financial life have been hopelessly interwoven with those of another man by the same name, a man who appears, in credit reports, to have stiffed more than two dozen creditors, from banks to utilities, and has a history of bouncing checks. As a result, the Massachusetts Eric Carroll, living in Newton with his fiancee Nancy and their new baby, can't get a mortgage, can't rent an apartment in his own name, and last July could not buy an engagement ring without his father's help.

"I felt this big," said Carroll, 29, pinching together his thumb and forefinger. "It literally ruins your life."

Carroll was one of scores who contacted the Globe after a Spotlight Team report this summer on debt collection abuses. Many felt victimized by the power and ruthless tactics of debt collectors. But Carroll and others complained of another maddening aspect of the system: The glacial and ineffectual response of the three giant keepers of consumer credit records -- Experian, Equifax, and TransUnion -- to any errors in their files, even those that appear to result from fraud.

Until the errors are corrected, debt collectors will try again and again to squeeze out a payment. Some back off when they find they're after the wrong consumer, but often, another firm buys the account and goes after the likes of Carroll again.

The local, state, and federal law enforcement response to complaints of identity fraud is similarly passive, despite the huge volume of complaints -- 255,000 last year to the Federal Trade Commission alone. Consumers are left to fend for themselves -- a recipe for frustration and worse, as Carroll has found.

"This kid's trying to start a life for himself," said Leo "Buddy" Carroll, Eric's father, who has devoted hundreds of hours to fielding calls from collectors on his son's behalf, and helping him dispute items on his credit report. "It's not fair."

Was this identity theft, or a data debacle? Either way, Eric Carroll's credit was ruined. And the Carrolls couldn't get to the bottom of the case, nor could they get help in solving it.

They quickly suspected that the real deadbeat was the Carroll from Florida, whose address appeared on the Massachusetts Carroll's credit reports. The Florida man shares the middle initial W, though it stands for Wayne, not Winslow. He is almost the same age, at 31, and shows up on numerous accounts with the Newton man's Social Security number.

But all that was not enough to untangle the mess -- or even spark an investigation by the credit bureaus. The information was a conversation stopper with debt collectors, who hung up upon hearing they had the "wrong" Eric Carroll. Two creditors, Dell Computer and Sprint, looked into the matter after Carroll complained, and wrote him letters saying they'd found evidence of fraud and that he was not responsible for the bills. But neither company, as a practice, passes such findings on to law enforcement.

The credit bureaus, in turn, generally expect consumers to dispute incorrect items on their credit reports one by one, over the Internet, and to patiently wait 30 days for each item to be checked out. When they find evidence of fraud, the credit bureaus will flag or temporarily "freeze" a consumer's record, to prevent banks and others from mistakenly extending credit to a person they suspect of fraud. But they are under no legal obligation to pass the information on to authorities.

David Rubinger , a spokesman for Equifax Inc. , said the company does what it can to help people deal with identity theft, but ultimately, "The consumer needs to help themself ."

The credit bureaus do urge consumers to file police reports. But that step usually accomplishes little. In Carroll's case, the Bridgewater Police Department took his report of alleged identity theft and "went the extra mile," according to Sergeant Christopher Delmonte , faxing the report to the Highlands County Sheriff's Office in Florida. But that's as far as they could take it, he said.

Even when the police do pass along a tip, it can die quickly. Leo Carroll recalls speaking with a deputy sheriff in Highlands County, Robert Campbell, to follow up. He said Campbell told him Eric's was a case of mistaken identity. Campbell, in an interview with the Globe, said he recalled going to see an Eric W. Carroll, who was then living in Lake Placid, Fla. He said he determined that the matter was a data error, not identity fraud, although he could not remember how he came to that conclusion. The county could not locate any record of the investigation.

A little further digging turned up an arrest record for the Florida-based Eric W. Carroll that included charges of defrauding several people on eBay in 2004.

In a telephone interview from Florida, Carroll said he'd had longtime financial problems. He got into trouble on eBay, he said, when he started a business selling music amplifiers but ran short of cash -- taking orders from people that he couldn't fulfill. Records show the charges against him were dropped. "I was able to get everybody their money back," Eric Wayne Carroll said.

He denied having used the Social Security number of Eric Carroll in Massachusetts, and said he had no knowledge of their intertwined identities. He did not respond to subsequent calls and e-mails from the Globe.

In Norwell, Susan and David Litchfield figured they, too, were hot on the trail of an identity thief. While battling the credit bureaus for six years to erase numerous debts on their record that were incurred by a David J. Leighton of Tampa, the Litchfields obtained a copy of one credit card agreement they had allegedly signed. On the form, which the Globe reviewed, is what appears to be Leighton's signature, along with David M. Litchfield's Social Security number neatly penned in.

But that did not interest the credit bureaus. Susan Litchfield wrote to the three companies, telling them of the apparent fraud, to no avail. She said she filed a complaint with the FTC, and she called the FBI and US Secret Service. She has disputed more than a dozen items on the report, including a Tampa child support enforcement order that last December totaled $19,060, according to an Experian credit report.

In 2004, the Litchfields went to the Norwell police. The department forwarded the matter to the Tampa police, who responded that the case "was investigated by our Department and determined to be unfounded." A Tampa detective wrote that the accounts had been mixed up because the two men have nearly the same Social Security number, except for the last digit.

But that didn't explain Litchfield's Social Security number appearing on the credit application with Leighton's name, address, and apparent signature.

Leighton, reached by telephone, said he had heard from the Litchfields years ago and thought the issue was resolved. He said he had no memory of signing for the Mastercard application on which his name appears and said, "The only Social Security number I've used is my own." He did not respond to numerous requests to see a copy of his signature.

The ordeal has been costly to the Litchfields, who first learned of the problem when they were rejected for a student loan for the younger of their two daughters. Sears and Citibank have raised the Litchfields' credit card interest rates, as a penalty for the Leighton items on their credit report. And when they recently went to refinance their home equity loan, the bank where Susan Litchfield has done business her entire life, Scituate Federal Savings Bank, at first declined them over the credit report. "I just sat here and cried," she said. After she explained they were victims of fraud, the bank did extend the loan -- but not on the best terms the Litchfields were used to.

After an inquiry by the Globe, TransUnion, one of the credit bureaus, reviewed Litchfield's case. On Dec. 15, the Chicago firm's director of consumer solutions and fraud victim assistance, Steve Reger , told Susan Litchfield that the company had found evidence of fraud and promised to wipe the record clean. In an interview, Reger said: "Mr. Leighton was using Mr. Litchfield's Social Security number."

Meanwhile, the Carrolls are still fighting for justice for Eric.

In response to Globe questions, Experian recently asked several creditors, including Wachovia Bank, to review their files on Eric W. Carroll. Wachovia then wrote to the Carrolls, asserting that its records on Eric were correct, attaching a copy of the credit card contract it said belonged to him. It was signed by Katrina S. Carroll -- Lake Placid, Fla.

It would take another round of calls by the Carrolls, and a bank investigation, to get Wachovia to back down. The new information from creditors has led Experian, too, to a new conclusion; the firm now says Carroll's file shows evidence of identity theft.

Fines Levied In FEMA Fraud (SCT)

By Tami K. Phillips

Scott County Times (MS), December 27, 2006

JACKSON--A federal court has ordered two Morton women to pay restitution fines and conduct community service for their part in a scam to secure FEMA funds following Hurricane Katrina.

One of the women will also serve time in prison, the office of United States Attorney Dunn Lampton announced earlier this month.

Stephanie Fontan was sentenced to serve eight months in prison and to pay restitution to FEMA in the amount of $6,000. Glenda Spangler was ordered to pay $4,358 in restitution to FEMA.

In addition, both women were ordered to conduct 40 hours of community service.

Fontan and Spangler had previously pled guilty to charges that they filed an application with FEMA for disaster assistance in which they represented that Spangler's primary residence was in Pascagoula and that her personal property located therein had sustained damage as a result of Hurricane Katrina.

After an investigation by the United States Department of Homeland Security, it was determined that both representations in the claim to FEMA were false.

Ex-gossip Columnist Convicted On Sex Charge (AP)

AP, December 28, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - Former Us Weekly gossip columnist Timothy McDarrah has been found guilty of charges related to soliciting sex with a minor.

McDarrah, a former reporter at the Las Vegas Sun, was arrested last year in New York after soliciting sex from an undercover federal agent posing as a 13-year-old girl.

DOJ_NMG_0109782

He was charged with one count of using a computer and the Internet "to attempt to entice, induce, coerce and persuade a minor to engage in sexual activity," according to an indictment handed up in November 2005. He was convicted Dec. 20 after an eight-day jury trial.

McDarrah, 44, responded in June 2005 to a posting on the craigslist.com Web site offering introductions to the "freshest, youngest" girls in New York, an FBI affidavit said. The gossip writer told an undercover FBI agent, who had posted the advertisement to lure pedophiles, that he would pay $200 for sex with a 13-year-old girl, the affidavit said.

After his arrest, McDarrah was suspended without pay from his post as the editor of Us Weekly's "Hot Stuff" column. From 2002 to 2004, he worked as a gossip columnist at the Las Vegas Sun.

McDarrah faces a mandatory minimum of five years in prison, according to court documents.

Judge Won't Reinstate Abortion Charges (WP/AP)

By John Hanna

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

WICHITA, Dec. 27 -- A judge refused Wednesday to reinstate criminal charges against a Wichita abortion doctor, only hours after the outgoing attorney general named a special prosecutor to handle the case.

Last week, state Attorney General Phill Kline, a vocal abortion opponent, filed 30 charges against George Tiller, accusing him of performing 15 illegal late-term abortions in 2003 on patients ages 10 to 22 and not properly reporting details to the state.

Sedgwick County Judge Paul W. Clark dismissed the charges on jurisdictional grounds later the same day. Kline this week asked Clark to reinstate the charges, but the judge rejected that request during a hearing Wednesday.

Clark agreed with the Sedgwick County district attorney, who argued that Kline did not have authority to file the charges.

Kline criticized Clark's decision, saying neither the judge nor the district attorney had reviewed the evidence.

Kline, a Republican who was defeated for reelection in November, said he is turning over decisions about the case -- including whether to appeal Clark's latest ruling -- to the newly appointed special prosecutor: Don McKinney, a Democrat and brother of state House Minority Leader Dennis McKinney (D).

"This appointment of an independent special prosecutor will remove this investigation from a highly charged political process," Kline said.

Tiller's clinic, one of the few in the country to perform late-term abortions, has been a target of abortion opponents for decades. The clinic was bombed in 1985, and Tiller was shot in both arms by a protester in 1993.

Judge Won't Revive Charges Against Abortion Doctor (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

A district court judge Wednesday refused to reinstate criminal charges against a nationally known abortion doctor, ruling that the Kansas attorney general had overstepped his authority in the case.

Outgoing Atty. Gen. Phill Kline last week charged Dr. George Tiller with performing illegal late-term abortions at his Wichita clinic and failing to report them accurately to state authorities. Hours later, Sedgwick County Judge Paul W. Clark dismissed the case on jurisdictional grounds: Only the locally elected district attorney, he said, had the power to bring such charges.

Kline asked Clark to reconsider. At a brief hearing Wednesday, the judge took another look at the legal arguments — and upheld his previous decision.

"The case is dismissed. We're very pleased," said Lee Thompson, an attorney for Tiller.

Kline, a Republican, has appointed a special prosecutor to handle the charges against Tiller, including a possible appeal of the dismissal. But it's unlikely that any appeal could be resolved before Kline leaves office Jan. 8.

His successor, Democrat Paul Morrison, won election by painting Kline as an antiabortion extremist. In a statement after the hearing, Morrison pledged to review the evidence carefully — but he strongly suggested he would drop Kline's long-running investigation into Tiller's clinic.

"Kansans expect more from their attorney general than grandstanding and political stunts," Morrison said. He promised to "refocus the vast resources of the attorney general's office."

But the antiabortion activists who pray daily outside Tiller's clinic are not willing to concede defeat.

Last spring, they gathered more than 7,700 signatures demanding that a grand jury be convened to investigate the death of a 19-year-old mentally disabled patient at Tiller's clinic. The patient, Christin Gilbert, died in January 2005 of complications from an early-third-trimester abortion. State health authorities cleared Tiller and his staff of wrongdoing. The grand jury found no grounds for criminal indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0109783

Antiabortion activist Troy Newman said he may begin another petition drive to seat a new grand jury — this time to consider Kline's allegations about illegal late-term abortions.

Kansas law permits abortions of viable fetuses only if the woman's life is in danger or if two doctors certify that continuing the pregnancy would cause "a substantial and irreversible impairment of a major bodily function." Tiller's clinic reported aborting 240 viable fetuses last year; Kline alleges that in some cases, the women were not facing irreversible health risks but rather were suffering from depression or anxiety.

"We'll be pressing as hard as we can to have these particular allegations brought before a court," said Newman, president of the activist group Operation Rescue. Dist. Atty. Nola Foulston, a Democrat, has asked Kline to turn over his evidence against Tiller so she can decide whether to file charges. But Kline has said repeatedly that he intends to keep investigating from the attorney general's office. He engaged in a two-year legal battle to get access to some of Tiller's patient medical records, and he continues to review them, even as his term winds down.

"The investigation," he said Wednesday, "is ongoing."

DA Won't Prosecute Nevada Governor-elect (AP)

By Kathleen Hennessey

AP, December 28, 2006

Nevada Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons will not be prosecuted on allegations that he assaulted a cocktail waitress in a parking garage three weeks before the election, authorities said Wednesday.

There was insufficient evidence to prove criminal charges against Gibbons beyond a reasonable doubt, Clark County District Attorney David Roger said.

"You may consider the case against Gov.-elect Jim Gibbons closed," he said.

Chrissy Mazzeo, 32, had accused Gibbons of pushing her against a wall and propositioning her near a restaurant where the two had been drinking with friends Oct. 13, less than a month before Gibbons was elected.

An apparently distraught and disoriented Mazzeo made three 911 calls that night, saying she had been assaulted by the congressman.

Gibbons, 61, has said he merely caught Mazzeo when she tripped in the parking garage.

Gibbons, a married five-term Republican congressman, beat Democrat Dina Titus in the Nov. 7 election. He is to be sworn in Monday.

Roger said prosecutors will investigate separate allegations made by Mazzeo and her lawyers that people associated with Gibbons tried to interfere with the investigation by influencing Mazzeo's testimony.

Roger would not identify the associates.

Investigators conducted interviews and reviewed video surveillance tapes from the garage before determining there was "no evidence to support the charge of battery," according to a police statement released this month.

Gibbons' spokesman, Brent Boynton, said the district attorney's decision was no surprise because Gibbons had done nothing inappropriate.

"He is pleased this matter is finally resolved and justice has been served," Boynton said.

Mazzeo told The Associated Press Wednesday she did not believe justice was served.

"I actually even said that if he apologized to me, I would drop everything. And he wasn't man enough to actually apologize. But he knows the truth and I know the truth," she said.

Link Eyed In Fairfax Assault, Slayings (WT)

By Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

Fairfax County police are trying to determine whether the assault on a Springfield woman alone in her home on Christmas Eve is related to the unsolved killings of two women nearby.

"There's certainly a possibility of a linkage in the other cases," said Fairfax County police spokeswoman Officer Camille Neville, "but there's nothing at this time to confirm it."

Police said a man forced his way into a house near Frontier Drive on Sunday between 8 and 9:40 p.m. and assaulted a 62-year-old woman. Police have not disclosed the location of the house.

The woman, who was found by a relative, was hospitalized with a puncture wound to her arm and other injuries that were not life-threatening. Investigators interviewed the woman at Inova Fairfax Hospital. She described her attacker only as a man wearing white or gray clothing.

The assault occurred about a mile from houses where two women were killed in recent months.

DOJ_NMG_0109784

Marion Newman, 74, was found dead inside her home in the 7100 block of Reservoir Road about 11:15 a.m. Nov. 21. A friend said she had missed a dinner appointment a day earlier.

Police found signs of a struggle but no forced entry.

At about 6:10 p.m. on Aug. 14, a friend found Marion Barbara Marshall, 72, slain inside her home two miles away in the 6600 block of Bostwick Drive.

Both women had been beaten to death.

"All it does is make people alert in the Springfield area," said Mrs. Marshall's neighbor, Logan Cotterall, 80.

Police would not say whether they have any evidence linking the killings, but investigators say the similarities of the crimes and the locations of the homes suggest the perpetrator was the same.

Investigators said the killer likely had close ties to the Crestwood and Edsall Park communities, where the women lived.

Police have not speculated on a motive.

Investigators are looking for a custom-made diamond ring they say Mrs. Newman was wearing when she was killed. The white gold band features a leaf design, and three diamonds are set side by side.

Investigators do not think robbery was the motive because valuable items were left untouched at the scenes of each of the killings.

Police have asked anyone with information about the ring or about anyone they think might be involved in the crime to call them at 703/691-2131 or Crime Solvers at 1-866/411-TIPS.

The families of Mrs. Marshall and Mrs. Newman have posted a $26,000 reward for information about the cases.

Inmate Suicides Linked To Solitary (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, December 28, 2006

The number of suicides in the nation's two largest state prison systems is ticking upward, and authorities in California and Texas are linking the increase to the rising number of inmates kept in solitary confinement.

In California, which has the largest state prison system with about 170,000 inmates, there have been 41 suicides this year, the most in at least six years and a 17% increase from 2005. Although an estimated 5% of California's inmates are housed in solitary confinement — also known as "administrative segregation" — 69% of last year's suicides occurred in units where inmates are isolated for 23 hours a day, according to state Department of Corrections records. About half the suicides this year were in such units.

In Texas' prison system, which has 169,000 inmates, there have been 24 suicides this year, up from 22 in 2005. Most of the inmates who killed themselves were in some form of solitary confinement, says John Moriarty, inspector general for the prison system.

Texas prisons also are reporting a 17% increase in attempted suicides: 652 so far this year, compared with 559 in 2005. The number of attempted suicides this year is the most in nearly a decade, according to state prison records. Statistics on attempted suicides in California prisons were not immediately available.

The figures from California and Texas are fueling a debate over whether solitary confinement is the best way to control or punish violent or dangerous inmates, particularly those who are mentally ill.

More than 70,000 of the 1.5 million inmates in state and federal prisons are kept in isolation, a reflection of get-tough policies designed to separate rival gang members and those who have gotten into fights while behind bars.

Isolated inmates typically have significant restrictions on visitors and get little help in dealing with the psychological problems that can be caused by isolation. They usually are allowed out of their cells for no more than an hour a day to exercise alone; their exposure to TV and reading material also is limited.

"Are we housing the mentally ill in prison facilities?" Moriarty asks. "I think the answer is yes. But I don't know if that's the best place for them to be."

Moriarty, whose office investigates every inmate death in Texas, says stress from isolation and increasing numbers of inmates with long sentences have contributed to the rise in suicides. "Length of sentence is a big factor. There is despair about not getting out."

The increase in inmate suicides in California has triggered recent changes in segregation units. In October, guards began checking inmates housed in solitary confinement every 30 minutes, rather than every hour, says Shama Chaiken, the state prison system's chief psychologist for mental health policy.

Some segregation cells also will be modified to remove shelving, vent openings and other features that offenders could use in hangings, the most common form of suicide in California prisons, Chaiken says. This month, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger announced a $1 billion plan that includes 10,000 new beds in prison medical and mental health units.

A few jurisdictions have credited expanded mental health programs with reducing prisoner suicides. After Kentucky set up a mental health program for those in the state's 83 county jails in 2004, suicides in the jails fell 47%, according to The (Louisville) Courier-Journal.

There have been 13 suicides this year in the 188,000-inmate federal prison system, the same total as in 2005. Florida, the third-largest state system with 90,000 inmates, has had nine prison suicides this year; it had eight last year.

On Way Out, D.C. Chief Gets Credit, Criticism (WP)

By Allison Klein And Cheryl W. Thompson

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Charles H. Ramsey arrived in spring 1998 as the District's newly minted police chief with a mandate to cut spiraling crime, build stronger relations with the community and reform a department tainted by scandal.

Under his watch, crime has dropped, standards have become tighter and the public has received access to more public safety information than ever, due in part to a Web site that charts robberies, burglaries and other offenses by the block.

Ramsey, a career cop who got as much attention for his personality as his policies, leaves office today as the city's longest-serving chief in more than three decades. As a master of the sound bite, he often spouted off about crimes and railed about topics that were beyond his control, including irresponsible parents and failing schools.

His critics -- in the police union, on the D.C. Council and in some crime-ravaged neighborhoods -- view him as a showboat. In many parts of the city, residents say that they don't see enough officers on patrol and that crimes are not investigated quickly or thoroughly. Inside the agency, morale is low, with officers saying that Ramsey overworked them by declaring crime emergencies that took away days off and lasted for months.

"I think he gets an A for public relations, but for actual substance, I think he gets a D," said Ronald E. Hampton, executive director of the National Black Police Association and a former D.C. police officer who was a member of the citizens panel that interviewed Ramsey and two other finalists for the job.

But Michael A. Mason, executive assistant director of the FBI, said public relations is a "huge part" of the job. "What police do is the embodiment of public relations," said Mason, who once headed the FBI's Washington Field Office.

Ramsey, 56, was hired at a time when the city's government was emerging from financial chaos and being run by a federally appointed control board. He was chosen from among 51 candidates, and as chief, had the backing of the control board, then-Mayor Marion Barry (D) and the 13-member D.C. Council. They wanted Ramsey to restore the force's credibility.

"I think he's been a good chief overall," said Barry, now a Ward 8 council member. "And he's viewed very favorably by people in the community."

Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D), who succeeded Barry in 1999, was one of Ramsey's biggest supporters. But over time, the makeup of the council changed, and critics emerged. They included council member Adrian M. Fenty (D-Ward 4), who becomes mayor next week. Soon after Fenty was elected in November, he announced plans to replace Ramsey with Cathy L. Lanier, a veteran D.C. commander and Ramsey protege.

Fenty said he wants to make the 3,800-member force nimble enough to respond to specific neighborhood concerns -- the everyday problems that he heard about in two years on the campaign trail. Fenty said he thinks that Lanier, 39, will bring new vigor and ideas to the force.

Ramsey had a similar charge when he was brought to Washington from the Chicago police department, where he was a deputy superintendent. He inherited a force that had been in near-constant turmoil under former chief Larry D. Soulsby, who resigned after his roommate, a D.C. police lieutenant, was arrested in a corruption probe.

Fewer than half of the city's officers were assigned to street patrols at a time when crime was escalating. The department was still paying the price for rushing officers through screening and training in a hiring push in 1989 and 1990; numerous officers from those classes were indicted or accused of departmental misconduct. The force's technology and equipment were so antiquated that many offices had rotary phones.

Being the first outside chief in a department that had always chosen its leader from among its ranks, Ramsey had to win over the command staff and officers and find out whom he could trust.

He needed to cut wasteful spending, improve recordkeeping and remove deadwood personnel. There were crime troubles in many neighborhoods, including east of the Anacostia River. Almost half of the force had not been recertified in several years with the firearms that the department had issued them.

And the U.S. attorney's office, a special D.C. Council committee and the city's inspector general were pursuing various investigations into corruption, misconduct and mismanagement. Ramsey described the department as "dysfunctional" and said it could take 15 years to fix.

"The department was in disarray," said D.C. Council member Jack Evans (D-Ward 2), who was chairman of the Judiciary Committee when Ramsey was hired. "He was brought in to reorganize."

Within months, Ramsey began that overhaul. He promoted, demoted and ousted officers and moved 400 detectives and officers in specialized units to the seven police districts. He increased spending for training and brought in more than a dozen top-level civilians, many from Chicago. He tightened policies on deadly force and other issues.

Officials have praised Ramsey for reducing crime in many neighborhoods and for keeping up the progress even after resources were tested after the 2001 terrorist attacks. Between 1998 and 2005, the number of major crimes, including homicides, rapes and robberies, dropped by about 29 percent in the city. As of yesterday, the city has had 165 homicides this year, compared with 195 for the same period in 2005. The highest number of homicides in one year -- 482 -- occurred in 1991.

"Look at the crime numbers," Ramsey said recently. "How do you think it gets there?"

Officer Kristopher Baumann, chairman of the D.C. police union, said economic development -- not Ramsey -- caused drops in crime in some neighborhoods. Although killings have dipped in gentrifying areas such as Capitol Hill and Shaw in Northwest Washington, they remain high in some communities east of the Anacostia.

Many residents say that the department too often lurches from crisis to crisis and that patrols pick up after a well-publicized crime, only to fall off within a matter of weeks.

"Sadly, we haven't seen an increased visibility in the neighborhood," said Shaw activist Alex Padro, who hoped police presence would pick up after another community activist, Chris Crowder, was slain in the area in July. "Ramsey, throughout his tenure, was very reactionary and not proactive."

The lack of officers on the street can be blamed partly on sickness or injury, officials said. About 4 percent of officers were unavailable for full duty this month because of illness or injury, police officials said.

Dorothy Brizill, executive director of D.C. Watch, a government watchdog group and a frequent critic of the police department, credited Ramsey with changing perceptions and "taking away the taint of corruption."

"I think you'd have to say he made a difference in this city," Brizill said.

Ramsey acknowledged that he had his share of critics, including some in the city government. "I've been in the water with a few sharks," he said. "The key is not to taste too good so they don't want to come back. One thing you don't need to be is weak."

In an interview, the chief fired back at the union's complaints, especially those about his declarations of "crime emergencies," moves that enabled him to more easily change officers' schedules and shifts.

"Nobody can tell you I've asked them to do anything that's not consistent with being a police officer," he said. "Some of what the job entails is sacrifice. You have to be psychologically tough to do this job."

Chuck Wexler, head of the Police Executive Research Forum, said Ramsey transformed the performance and perception of the department. "It is a world-class department," Wexler said. "It has to do with the advances Ramsey has brought to the department."

But council member Kathy Patterson (D-Ward 3) assessed the chief's overall performance as "very mixed." The two clashed over many issues, including the police department's handling of a demonstration in 2002 against the World Bank and International Monetary Fund. The city settled lawsuits stemming from the arrests, which had been ordered without warning, of 400 protesters and bystanders at Pershing Park.

"I think he did a good job of building resources for the department in terms of capital improvement and federal funding for equipment following 9/11," said Patterson, who headed the council's Judiciary Committee from 2001 until 2005.

Ramsey, who served about twice as long as the average big-city chief, has not decided what he'll do next. But he said that he and his wife, Sylvia, want to stay in Washington and that he is not likely to lead another local department. He has worked seven days a week, has no hobbies other than fighting crime and took just two vacations while chief.

He wants to be remembered as a leader who took the job seriously and made a difference.

"It has been an honor, and it will be truly difficult to walk away," Ramsey said, a sad smile growing on his face. "Truly difficult."

Ramsey 'Proud' Of Work On Force (WT)

By Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

Chief Charles H. Ramsey says that he will leave the Metropolitan Police Department next week after eight years and eight months on the job confident that he has done what he was hired to do.

"When other agencies look at the Metropolitan Police Department, it's a respected organization," he said. "That's what I'm most proud of."

Chief Ramsey, 56, will step down Tuesday, the day Adrian M. Fenty is sworn in as mayor.

DOJ_NMG_0109787

The District's only police chief to be hired from outside the city, Chief Ramsey reflected on his accomplishments during an interview last week in his office, which by then had been stripped of the mementos accumulated during a 38-year career in law enforcement.

"Quite frankly, I think patriotism drew me to this job more than anything," said Chief Ramsey, who came from the Chicago Police Department. "A police department in the nation's capital shouldn't have been going through what this department was going through."

Upon his arrival in 1998, the Metropolitan Police Department was mired in mismanagement and scandal. Top officials were under criminal investigation, poor recruiting and standards gave rise to second-rate officers, technology and information systems were substandard, facilities were crumbling, and officers were driving around in 10-year-old squad cars with used tires bought from the U.S. Park Police.

"I didn't realize we had as many issues as we had," he said.

Chief Ramsey helped secure $100 million in federal funding to rebuild the department's infrastructure. He upgraded radios, started a mounted unit, equipped a bicycle unit, instituted uniform training standards, and restarted an aviation unit that had been shut down in 1996 and had its helicopters sold because of a budget shortfall.

On September 11, 2001, the department opened its $7 million Joint Operations Command Center a week early to coordinate operations among local and federal agencies. The command center is where Chief Ramsey meets daily with his senior staff to review crime trends and plot enforcement strategies.

The department's budget has also swelled from $272 million in fiscal 1998 to $377 million this year.

He said it took two years on the job before he began to think that the department was turning the corner.

"The first time I really felt positive about the department and where we were going was April 2000 when we handled the [International Monetary Fund/World Bank] protests," he said. "When all was said and done, all the meetings went off as scheduled, we got the delegates to and from the meetings safely, and protesters were able to come and have their voices heard."

The meetings drew 10,000 protesters to the District. Similar protests in Seattle had turned violent in 1999, resulting in more than 580 arrests and about $10 million worth of property damage.

The national reputation the police department earned during that event was tarnished in March 2002 after Chief Ramsey ordered the arrest of several hundred protesters in Pershing Park in Northwest. The anti-IMF protesters, who said they were given no verbal warning to disperse, were demonstrating without a permit, and several journalists and passers-by were swept up in the arrests.

"We should have done a better job following our procedures," Chief Ramsey said.

Critics, including Mr. Fenty, complained that police were not visible and said that the chief had not put enough officers on the streets. But every category of crime dropped during Chief Ramsey's tenure. Most notably, the number of homicides tumbled from 301 in 1997, the last full year before Chief Ramsey took over, to 165 so far this year.

Many officers within the department complain that Chief Ramsey limited their effectiveness when he invited the Department of Justice to investigate the department's use-of-force policies in 1999 and entered into a memorandum of understanding governing the use and display of force in 2001.

Chief Ramsey said he knows those decisions were "not popular" but he said the department had lost the public trust and only an outside investigation could restore it.

He said that he understands the adrenaline that drives an officer whose life is on the line, but he questioned the usefulness of tactics such as shooting at oncoming vehicles.

"They want to get the bad guys so badly they don't always react in a way that keeps them safe," he said.

During his tenure, Chief Ramsey implemented training exercises that emphasize good judgment. In addition to passing twice-yearly firearms-proficiency tests, officers also must train in simulated situations in which firing a weapon is frequently not the correct option.

Asked about his regrets, he goes back to the unsolved March 2005 daylight shooting of a 9-year old boy playing in front of his home in Columbia Heights.

"My biggest regret is the Donte Manning case. For some reason, that case haunts me."

The chief said that he hopes to stay in the District and that he could work as a consultant or in homeland security, but he doesn't think he will be a police chief again any time soon.

"I'm not interested in running another department right now," he said. "I had my shot at running a department. Now it's time to start a new chapter."

He said a political run is unlikely, but he wouldn't rule out the possibility five or 10 years down the road.

DOJ_NMG_0109788

As for his successor, Cmdr. Cathy L. Lanier, a 16-year veteran of the department, Chief Ramsey advises her to "stay focused on crime fighting."

"Don't let a lot of other things distract you, because when all is said and done, you're going to be judged on how well you control crime," he said. "For every dot on a crime map, that's a person whose life has been forever changed. Stay focused on that."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Tosses $6.5M Jury Award To Ex-cop (AP)

AP, December 28, 2006

CHICAGO - A federal judge has thrown out a jury award of more than $6.5 million to a former policeman who claimed two FBI agents framed him for murder and kidnapping.

Steven Manning spent 14 years in prison - eight on death row - before the charges were dropped.

In a civil lawsuit against FBI agents Robert Buchan and Gary Miller, he claimed the agents framed him for the crimes after he tried to stop working as an FBI informant.

A jury last year awarded him $6,581,000 in damages in that case. Manning was 54 at the time.

Since then, Manning has lost a separate civil lawsuit he had filed against the federal government on the same allegations.

In a ruling released Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Matthew Kennelly cited Manning's failure to win that second lawsuit as the reason for vacating the jury's award for damages. Kennelly concluded the decision against Manning nullified the earlier jury decision in his favor.

"Manning made his choice" in pursuing two suits, the judge wrote, and "he cannot now avoid the consequences of that choice."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Haile, who represented Buchan and Miller, said the FBI was pleased with the decision.

Government attorneys long have claimed the agents acted in good faith in investigating Manning.

Manning's attorney said he plans to appeal.

"A jury spent a month listening to the evidence and concluded the FBI had framed Manning," Jon Loevy said. "A court shouldn't be so free to just override a jury verdict."

Manning had left the Chicago police force and was working as a limousine driver and security guard when he was arrested.

He was convicted in 1992 of taking part in the 1984 kidnapping of two reputed Kansas City drug traffickers and was sentenced to two life terms plus 100 years. The next year, he was convicted of the 1990 murder of suburban Chicago trucking company owner Jimmy Pellegrino and was sentenced to death.

Miller and Buchan investigated the Illinois case, and Buchan investigated the Missouri case.

The murder conviction was reversed and the case dropped in 2000 after the Illinois Supreme Court ruled that prosecutors used improper evidence.

The Missouri charges were also dropped after a federal appeals court ruled that Manning's lawyer had been ineffective and the FBI improperly used Manning's girlfriend as a government agent.

Miller has retired from the FBI. Buchan was still working for the bureau.

Agencies Investigating Abuse Claims At Pearl River County Jail (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, December 28, 2006

PICAYUNE, Miss. - The FBI and the Mississippi Bureau of Investigation are looking into allegations of prisoner abuse in the Pearl River County jail.

At least six inmates filed statements with Hancock County judges and as many as 10 or 11 told of beatings while making court appearances.

They said they were beaten by jailers, attacked by other prisoners as corrections officers stood by, and they received slow medical treatment, among other complaints, a pair of Hancock County judges said.

The prisoners are being held at the Pearl River jail because the Hancock County facility was damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

Pearl River County Sheriff Joe Stuart confirmed the reports of abuse and the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0109789

Hancock County Justice Court Judge Tommy Carver said he heard four reports of abuse in a single day shortly after the inmates began stays in Pearl River County. The complaints prompted Stuart and fellow Hancock County Judge Ricky Adams to ask the prisoners to make formal statements to forward to the Hancock County Sheriff's Department.

Some refused out of fear of reprisals when they returned to Pearl River County.

One inmate showed Carver a broken tooth he said he received during a beating.

"It's obvious something is going on," Carver said. "I just hope they check and see what's going on and correct the situation."

Carver said the statements tell of the use of Tasers in attacks and other physical abuse. They included the names of offending corrections officers.

Kenny Hurt, Hancock County Sheriff's investigator, forwarded the complaints to the MBI after receiving them from the judges. He said he has seen two or three inmates with bruises or wounds on their faces who claimed they were abused at the Pearl River jail.

Hancock County pays Pearl River $30 a day to hold each prisoner. The county's Board of Supervisors has not decided what to do with its damaged jail.

"If they are getting mistreated, I think something needs to be done," Hurt said. "We're paying $30 a day for these prisoners. They don't need to be mistreated."

In addition to the claims by prisoners, Stuart said residents of both counties have come to him with complaints, which he forwarded to the FBI to avoid the appearance of a conflict of interest.

"I have no problems with being investigated," Stuart said.

He said some corrections officers resigned after learning of the investigation and noted high turnover at the jail in the last 18 months. Some were let go because of disciplinary problems, though none were accused of abuse.

Stuart said his department has provided investigators with all material requested, including video footage, audio recordings and documents.

Activists Want Civilian Review Of Atlanta-area Police After Killings Of 13 People This Year (AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Associated Press

AP, December 28, 2006

ATLANTA – Community activists on Wednesday called for the creation of civilian review boards to investigate police misconduct complaints, citing the fatal shooting of an elderly woman by Atlanta police and the killings of 12 other people by suburban DeKalb County officers this year.

“The police, no matter how difficult their job, are not exempt from community scrutiny,” said the Rev. Joseph Lowery, co-founder of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and chairman of the Coalition for The People's Agenda.

Lowery was joined by close to a dozen other activists. He said that the civilian review boards should have subpoena power and that Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin had told him she was not opposed to the idea.

A spokeswoman for Franklin did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

DeKalb County Chief Executive Vernon Jones said he would take Lowery's suggestion under advisement.

“I respect Dr. Lowery for his experience and commitment to empower the quality of our lives,” Jones said.

The district attorney's office is already investigating the 12 lethal shootings by the DeKalb County Police Department. In addition, the Justice Department is “gathering information” about the shootings, according to a letter from the agency to a community activist.

The call for the review boards comes in the wake of the Nov. 21 fatal shooting of Kathryn Johnston by Atlanta police during a raid in search of a drug suspect. Police say Johnston fired at them first, wounding three officers, and they shot back. Family members said Johnston was 92; a medical examiner said she was 88.

Johnston's death is being investigated by local agencies and the FBI.

Atlanta Police Review Sought (LAT)

By Jenny Jarvie, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

In the city and suburban DeKalb County, a string of killings leads to calls for civilian boards with subpoena power.

ATLANTA — A string of fatal police shootings in the Atlanta area prompted civil rights activists Wednesday to urge the city of Atlanta and the neighboring suburb of DeKalb County to establish powerful civilian review boards to investigate complaints of police misconduct.

DOJ_NMG_0109790

The Rev. Joseph Lowery, convener of the Coalition for the Peoples' Agenda and co-founder of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, said the review boards should have a professional staff and the power to subpoena.

"The police should be absolutely accountable to the citizens for whom they work," Lowery said.

Public confidence in police departments in both jurisdictions has been shaken in recent months.

In November, Atlanta police shot and killed an 88-year-old woman, Kathryn Johnston, during a drug raid on her northwest Atlanta home.

In the last year, DeKalb officers have shot and killed 12 suspects — nearly all were black men.

A civilian review board, Lowery said, was vital in restoring trust in local law enforcement.

Atlanta already has a Civilian Review Board that examines allegations of excessive force, serious bodily injury or death resulting from the action of police officers. But the board, formed in 1996, has not reviewed a case since 2002. It has no subpoena power and requires citizens to file a complaint and waive their right to sue.

Beverly Isom, spokeswoman for Atlanta Mayor Shirley Franklin, said the mayor would consider Lowery's proposal.

In DeKalb County, police internal affairs units investigate all shootings involving law enforcement and then decide whether to hand them over to the county's district attorney's office.

The county's chief executive, Vernon Jones, issued a brief statement Wednesday saying he would also consider creating a citizen review board: "I respect Dr. Lowery for his experience and commitment to empower the quality of our lives," he said.

A number local and federal organizations are examining the recent shootings. In Atlanta, the FBI is already investigating the shooting of Johnston. In DeKalb, the district attorney's office is investigating the 12 lethal shootings by police officers.

The Justice Department, along with the FBI, is also gathering information about the case, but has yet to open a federal investigation. According to the National Assn. for Civilian Oversight of Law Enforcement, 71 of the nation's 100 largest cities have citizen review mechanisms.

Richard Rosenthal, who serves as an independent monitor of police and sheriff's departments in Denver, said even more important than subpoena power is that the review board have unfettered access to police department records.

"You can issue a subpoena to interview an officer, but you can't make them talk," he said.

Court Can't Force Gay Marriage Vote (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jay Lindsay, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

(AP) - BOSTON-Massachusetts' highest court said Wednesday it has no authority to force lawmakers to vote on a proposed constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage. But it rebuked the Legislature for its "indifference to, or defiance of, its constitutional duties."

The unanimous 7-0 ruling - and the stinging reproach - leave the fate of the amendment up in the air in the only state that allows gay marriage.

Opponents of gay marriage have collected 170,000 signatures in favor of an amendment to end the practice. But the measure needs the Legislature's approval to appear on the 2008 ballot, and lawmakers refused to vote on the proposal last month. Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican expected to run for president in 2008, and other opponents of gay marriage responded by suing to try to force the lawmakers to act.

In its ruling, the Supreme Judicial Court - the same court that ruled in 2003 that the Massachusetts Constitution gives gays the right to marry - said it cannot force a vote. It said that the Legislature's obligation to vote was "beyond serious debate," but that the most the court could do was remind lawmakers of that duty.

"There is no presently articulated judicial remedy for the Legislature's indifference to, or defiance of, its constitutional duties," the court said.

The proposed amendment needs the approval of lawmakers in two consecutive two-year sessions to appear on the 2008 ballot. The last day of the current session is Tuesday. If lawmakers adjourn without taking up the amendment, the measure will die.

In a statement, the governor said: "The issue is now whether the Legislature will follow the law."

The proposed amendment defines marriage as the union of a man and a woman. It would leave all existing same-sex marriages intact but would ban any more such weddings. More than 8,000 gay couples have been married in Massachusetts.

Opponents of gay marriage argue that it should be up to the people, not the courts, to define something as important as marriage. Supporters of gay marriage say the civil rights of a minority should not be put to a popular vote.

DOJ_NMG_0109791

Marc Solomon of MassEquality, a gay rights group, said after Wednesday's ruling: "We urge the Legislature to end this debate once and for all and let committed couples and their families get on with their lives."

One of the gay-marriage opponents who sued to try to force the Legislature to vote, C.J. Doyle of the Catholic Action League, said he doubts lawmakers will act, despite the court's rebuke.

"Our legislators have demonstrated time and time again a contempt for the constitution and for their oath of office," Doyle said.

Massachusetts Court Admonishes Lawmakers Over Gay Marriage (LAT)

By Ellen Barry

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

Massachusetts' highest court on Wednesday chastised the state's legislators for failing to vote on a proposed constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage, but said the court does not have the power to force lawmakers to act.

Opponents of gay marriage are seeking to override the 2003 court decision that made same-sex unions legal in Massachusetts. They collected 170,000 signatures -- enough to place the question before voters in 2008 -- but the legislature already has met twice without voting on the measure.

If the lawmakers adjourn Jan. 2 without a vote, as many predict they will, the measure to repeal gay marriage in Massachusetts will die. To appear on the ballot, a citizen initiative must be approved by at least a quarter of the legislature in two consecutive sessions.

Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican who is contemplating a run for the presidency, has been critical of the lawmakers' inaction. Romney was a lead plaintiff in the suit brought by opponents of gay marriage, which argued that lawmakers were stripping voters of their right to amend the state constitution.

The Supreme Judicial Court's unanimous ruling Wednesday agreed with the core of that argument, but it noted that "there is no presently articulated judicial remedy for the Legislature's indifference to, or defiance of, its constitutional duties.

"Those members who seek to avoid their lawful obligations . . . ultimately will have to answer to the people who elected them," read the decision, which was written by Justice John M. Greaney.

The court's 2003 ruling that legalized gay marriage sparked a national debate. But three years later, Massachusetts is still the only state to allow it. Three states -- Connecticut, Vermont and New Jersey -- allow same-sex couples to enter into civil unions, and California's domestic partnership law guarantees many rights of marriage. Maine, Hawaii and the District of Columbia also offer domestic partnerships.

Meanwhile, 26 states have passed constitutional amendments banning gay marriage.

This would not be the first citizen initiative to wither on the vine in Massachusetts; legislators have adjourned without voting on six out of the last seven proposed ballot questions -- on such issues as abortion, term limits and education.

Lawmakers voted 109-87 Nov. 9 to end debate and delay the vote on the gay marriage amendment, virtually guaranteeing its demise. Many spoke passionately before the vote to delay, such as state Sen. Edward Augustus, who said: "This amendment is about the past. It is about fear and intolerance." Advocates of gay marriage celebrated.

"They have refused to be bullied or intimidated, and we fully expect them to keep standing up for what's right," Lee Swislow, executive director of Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders, said in a statement during arguments in the case. "It is simply wrong to put the rights of a minority up for a popular vote. That's what this is about."

The ruling came with just one business day remaining before the end of the legislative session. Eric Fehrnstrom, a spokesman for Romney, said the governor hopes the sharply worded decision "changes the math at the Statehouse." But, Fehrnstrom said, Romney "doesn't have a formal role to play" in this matter.

"He is a bystander. Just like any other citizen of the Commonwealth, he has an interest in making sure that the legislature does its job," he said.

Deputy In Gibson Arrest Claims Harassment (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

Six months after he arrested Mel Gibson for drunk driving in Malibu, a Los Angeles County Sheriff's deputy claims he's being harassed for his action by officials who question whether he leaked a report detailing the actor's anti-Semitic rant to the news media.

DOJ_NMG_0109792

Deputy James Mee's attorney said Wednesday his client was abruptly transferred from patrolling Malibu to another assignment in Agoura Hills and unfairly singled out for scrutiny by his supervisors.

Attorney Richard Shinee also said sheriff's officials subjected him to a three-hour-long interrogation and served a search warrant on his home last September, taking a home computer and phone records.

"His life and career would be a lot different had he not made that arrest," Shinee told The Times.

The Sheriff's Department has already come under fire for initially telling reporters that Gibson was arrested "without incident" even though Mee's arrest report said the actor/director was belligerent, profane and unleashed a "barrage of anti-Semitic remarks."

Mee's report was leaked to TMZ.com, a celebrity news website.

Neal Tyler, the division chief who oversees the Sheriff's Department's Lost Hills station, where Gibson was booked, said he knew of no problems with Mee's treatment and said the deputy is in no way being singled out.

"I disagree with the assessment that personnel in the department or at the station have been relating to him or supervising him in an unfair manner," Tyler said.

He declined to discuss Mee's specific complaints, citing confidentiality rules.

In the wake of Gibson's arrest, the Sheriff's Department launched two investigations. One looked at whether the actor received preferential treatment, the other trying to determine who leaked the Mee's report to TMZ.com.

Tyler said a preliminary investigation into the issue of favoritism found "no evidence that anyone improperly influenced the investigation or prosecution of Mel Gibson's drunk driving arrest."

Sheriff's department sources said the probe into who leaked the report - an act that would likely violent department rules - is ongoing.

Shinee said that a few days after Gibson's July 29 arrest, sheriff investigators pressed Mee on why he chose to detail Gibson's inflammatory comments in his report.

He was also told to recount the precise sequence of events surrounding the writing and handling of the report and any discussions or contacts he had with others.

"Clearly the focus of the investigation was the leak and not whether there were any communications between department brass concerning suppression of the report," Shinee said. "My client has denied he gave the report to anyone."

Later, according to the attorney, Sheriff's officials told Mee that they were temporarily transferring him from his drunk driving patrol detail in Malibu to a similar job based at the Lost Hills station out of concern that paparazzi would try to bait him into creating an incident.

Not long after, five sheriff's deputies showed up at Mee's home where they removed his computer and took phone records, Shinee said.

Mee declined to discuss his concerns. But Shinee said the deputy also feels he's being unfair treated by supervisors. In August, Shinee said his client was written up by a sergeant for failing to report to work despite the fact that another supervisor had changed his schedule. Earlier this month, Shinee said the same sergeant called him in from a field assignment to answer why he didn't check a box on a vehicle inspection report.

Tyler declined to comment on these specific incidents.

ANTITRUST:

New Jersey Orders Municipal Bond Firms To Disclose Subpoenas (BLOOM)

By Adam L. Cataldo

Bloomberg, December 28, 2006

Dec. 27 (Bloomberg) -- New Jersey is demanding that financial firms seeking state business disclose whether they have been subpoenaed or audited by the government.

Treasury officials told firms applying to work for the state by investing proceeds from a planned bond sale to describe pending litigation and ``federal or state investigations or audits, subpoenas or other information requests'' since 2002, according to a Dec. 18 request for proposals. Similar documents in September and November didn't mention subpoenas or audits.

The requirement comes one month after federal investigators raided three brokers in the widest-ever criminal probe of the municipal bond market. The Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Internal Revenue Service are probing whether bankers and brokers conspired to fix prices on financial products sold to local governments when they invested proceeds from bond sales.

``It sounds like good due diligence to me," said Clifford Goldman who was state treasurer from 1976 to 1982. He now runs Goldman, Beale Associates, a Titusville, New Jersey-based firm that advises municipalities on bond financings.

Investigators last month demanded information from more than a dozen banks and insurers and raided the brokers as part of the probe, including CDR Financial Products Inc., New Jersey's adviser on interest-rate swaps. Earlier this month, the SEC asked officials in Jefferson County, Alabama, for records related to bond issues and derivatives since January 2002.

No Subpoenas

Tom Vincz, a spokesman for New Jersey treasurer Bradley Abelow, said the state hasn't received any subpoenas in connection with the probe.

``Issuers should be even more circumspect about who we do business with," said Patrick Born, the chief financial officer of Minneapolis and the head of the debt committee FOR the Chicago-based Government Finance Officers Association. ``The municipal market is such a valuable and important resource for state and local governments in the U.S. that we simply cannot tolerate abuses."

New Jersey needs a firm to help invest funds from a planned sale of bonds backed by revenue from a settlement with cigarette makers because it won't spend all the money immediately.

A group of treasury and public finance employees will review responses from firms, Vincz said. Six firms responded to the state's request for proposals, according to treasury spokesman Mark Perkiss. The responses won't be available to the public until after a selection has been made.

`Evolving, Improving'

The size of the bond sale, to be arranged by New York-based Bear Stearns Cos., wasn't specified in the request for proposals. The state is rated Aa3 by Moody's Investors Service and AA by Standard & Poor's.

Vincz said the language change in the request for proposals is an ``evolving, improving practice" and not a response to the federal probe.

New Jersey last sought proposals from financial firms in November, when it was looking to hire an adviser on the bond sale being underwritten by Bear Stearns.

The request asked ``if your firm, or any principal, director or officer thereof, is now or has in the last three years been a defendant in any litigation involving a sum of $100,000 or more, the subject of any professional disciplinary action, and/or is or has been the subject of any investigation." It doesn't ask whether a firm has been subpoenaed or otherwise asked for information by the government, or if it has been the subject of an audit.

``The experience of public finance in reviewing responses to questions of this kind has been that sometimes there is a lack of clarity and completeness in the responses," Vincz said.

Abelow and Nancy Feldman, New Jersey's director of public finance, declined to comment.

Named by Corzine

Governor Jon Corzine, the former chairman of New York-based Goldman, Sachs & Co., named Abelow and Feldman to their posts earlier this year after he took office. Both also worked at Goldman. Corzine, a Democrat, has vowed to use his Wall Street experience to shore up the state's finances and reduce its record $30 billion debt load.

The Government Finance Officers Association recommends governments seek competitive bids when hiring advisers and that they find out whether firms have any history of having been the subject of enforcement actions.

Swaps Contract

New Jersey is seeking a new swap adviser to take over next month after Beverly Hills, California-based CDR's contract ends.

A swap is a type of derivative, or financial contract whose value is derived from stocks, bonds, loans, currencies and commodities, or linked to specific events such as changes in interest rates or the weather. In a swap, parties agree to exchange interest payments, usually a fixed payment for one that varies based on the movements of benchmark indexes or rates used by banks to track borrowing rates. Swaps are private contracts and are unregulated.

Vincz wouldn't say whether CDR applied to renew its contract and said a date to pick a new swap adviser hasn't been set. CDR spokesman Allan Ripp declined to comment on whether the firm has responded to any requests for proposals from New Jersey.

Peter Shapiro, managing director of South Orange, New Jersey-based Swap Financial Group, said governments like New Jersey make it too easy for firms not to disclose potential liabilities. Shapiro, a former New Jersey assemblyman who advises municipal governments on finances, didn't bid for the reinvestment contract and applied to become the state's next swap adviser.

``If you, as the governing agency, want to find out everything, you have to make sure you ask for everything," Shapiro said.

FTC Clears Freeport Takeover Of Phelps (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0109794

AP, December 27, 2006

The Federal Trade Commission approved the $25.9 billion takeover of copper miner Phelps Dodge Corp. by Freeport-McMoran Copper & Gold, according to a notice posted Tuesday on the agency's Web site.

FTC clearance removes at least one obstacle to the proposed combination, which would create the world's largest copper miner. The deal still needs shareholder approval, and there is no certainty the companies will get it.

Earlier this month, a hedge fund with a 5.1 percent stake in Phelps Dodge said it would throw the weight of its 10.3 million shares against the takeover. SAC Capital Partners opposes the combination, saying that the cash-and-stock offer doesn't fairly value Phelps Dodge.

Since the deal was first announced in late November, Prudential analyst John C. Tumazos has said he expected to see additional bids emerge for Phelps Dodge. But that was when copper was trading at about $3.05 a pound on the spot market.

The price has since fallen to about $2.85 per pound -- down 18 cents from the date the companies decided to combine and down 67 cents from the third-quarter average.

"We estimate the odds of a higher bid drop about 1 percent with each penny that copper falls," Tumazos wrote in a recent note to clients.

The FTC granted early termination of a mandatory antitrust waiting period on Dec. 22.

Up For Review: 401(k) Industry (WSJ)

By Tom Lauricella

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Americans' 401(k) retirement plans are starting to face scrutiny -- of a kind that previously helped to reshape the mutual-fund business and many practices on Wall Street.

In recent months, a series of lawsuits has raised questions that longstanding business practices in the industry may represent illegal forms of collusion. In the past few weeks, Congressional Democrats -- after winning the majority in November for the first time in years -- are calling for hearings into whether current laws do enough to protect 401(k) investors. A November report by the Congressional Government Accountability Office said some practices "may not be in the best interest" of investors.

At the same time, the summer's landmark pension-reform law is encouraging employers to take a more active and even paternal role in their employees' 401(k) plans by offering in-depth investment advice and other tools designed to encourage people to save. Previously, companies were discouraged from taking these steps for fear of being sued should the investments go wrong.

As a result of these forces, 401(k) plans could receive their most significant overhaul since coming into existence a quarter-century ago. Fees to investors could be reduced, and companies could be forced to do a better job ensuring investors receive the most bang for their retirement dollar.

Since being created in 1981 as a way to sock away dollars tax-free for retirement, 401(k)s have supplanted traditional pension funds as the primary way most Americans save for retirement. Some 47 million participants have $2 trillion in money invested in the plans.

Critics increasingly are complaining about poorly disclosed financial arrangements -- known as "pay-to-play" deals -- that not only have the potential to influence which investment options are offered in a given plan, but also have the potential to drive up fees charged to investors.

The pressure for change is occurring at every level of a complex industry: Employers have a legal obligation to run a plan in the best interest of its participants. The money manager has responsibility for the investments, but other companies might have a separate role in keeping investor records and holding the actual securities being bought and sold in the plan. On top of that, sometimes there are outside brokers or consultants paid to help decide which investments go into a plan.

That complexity can breed problems, experts say. "Unfortunately there are [employer] fiduciaries who fell asleep at the switch; there are brokers who will charge excessively high fees; ... and there are plan providers who support all this," says Fred Reish, a Los Angeles attorney specializing in retirement-plan law. "This is all one big ball of wax."

The most direct attack on 401(k) plans -- and similar retirement plans for government employees and teachers called 457 plans and 403(b) plans -- has come in the courts. Several lawsuits allege that commonplace business arrangements between some of the parties are actually illegal.

For example, some mutual-fund companies that run retirement plans will take a portion of the money they collect from investors and use it to pay consultants, who, in turn, recommend which funds are included in a retirement plan. Because some consultants recommend only those fund companies that make such payments, these deals have been dubbed pay-to-play arrangements.

DOJ_NMG_0109795

Critics say it can result in participants being offered subpar investments or worse. In November, a lawsuit was filed against Nationwide Financial Services Inc. on behalf of participants in the retirement plan it runs for the Orange County, Fla., sheriff's office. The suit, filed in U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Ohio, alleges that unbeknownst to the plan's investors, money from some of these arrangements paid for meals, trips and entertainment.

Nationwide denies the allegations and says it will fight the suit.

A second common practice alleged to be improper is that big 401(k) plans often will use the same class of mutual-fund shares that small, individual investors use -- even though lower-fee classes of those shares are often available to big investors like these. In addition, certain fees (such as those for record-keeping) are assessed as a flat percentage of assets, which means as an investor's savings grow, more money is being collected from them even though no additional services are provided.

The most recent such suit was filed this month against Fidelity Investments, the nation's largest retirement-plan manager. The case, filed in U.S. District Court in the Western District of Wisconsin, argued that Fidelity charged "unreasonable and excessive" fees and had hidden arrangements that misused participants' money.

Fidelity says that it will fight the lawsuit and that fees its charges are reasonable.

In mid-September, a St. Louis law firm, Schlichter Bogard & Denton LLP, which specializes mainly in personal-injury cases, kicked off the recent spate of suits when it filed in federal court a series of cases (including the Fidelity suit) alleging that the 401(k) retirement plans of some of the country's biggest employers misled and overcharged investors.

Jerome Schlichter, the lawyer overseeing these cases, argues that employers and the companies that run 401(k) plans are failing to live up to a basic legal responsibility: ensuring that their fees are reasonable. "The fees are not being disclosed, and if you don't know what fees are being charged, you can't know if the fees are reasonable."

Meanwhile, Democrats in Congress, armed with the Government Accountability Office study, are looking at revisiting laws governing oversight of the plans. While the scope of the hearings hasn't been decided -- much less what any outcome might potentially be -- the stepped-up interest by politicians is further stirring the pot.

The GAO, in a recent report commissioned by George Miller (D., Calif.) said current rules result in "piecemeal" disclosure and that investors aren't given information that would help them determine whether they were getting a good deal. The GAO also warned against some of the same practices targeted by the lawsuits, saying they may hide conflicts of interest.

The GAO also said the Labor Department, which is responsible for regulating 401(k) plans, hasn't been collecting the kind of information on the plans that it needs to do the job.

Not all changes may come at the barrel of a gun. Laws passed by Congress this summer make it easier for employers to automatically enroll workers in 401(k) plans, increase their savings rates and automatically place them in appropriate stock- and bond-fund investments. These new laws lessen the risk to employers for taking these steps on a worker's behalf.

That is a big change from a few years ago. "It used to be that employers would say, 'We have this 401(k) plan with a great matching program -- now you guys go manage this on your own,'" says Terri Fox, who oversees the 401(k) plan at Texas Instruments. "The pendulum has swung."

Regulator Nudges Enel On Megawatt Sales (AP)

AP, December 28, 2006

Italy Antitrust Watchdog Says Enel Must Sell Up to 1,700 Megawatts by End of 2008

ROME (AP) -- Italy's antitrust watchdog said Wednesday that Enel SpA must sell 1,000 megawatts of capacity next year, and if necessary 700 more megawatts in 2008 to promote competition in the country's power market.

The regulator said in a statement that the sale will be at "competitive conditions," at which point the antitrust body will close its inquiry, started in April 2005, into possible anticompetitive behavior by Enel, Italy's former electricity monopoly.

The regulator said Enel will sell the capacity under a mechanism that allows a company to keep ownership of generation facilities while selling its output to competitors.

One-thousand megawatts correspond to about 3 percent of Italy's domestic power demand, the regulator said.

Polar Bears Face Meltdown (USAT)

By Robert Davis

USA Today, December 28, 2006

The fight against global warming got an iconic mascot Wednesday when the Bush administration proposed listing polar bears as a "threatened" species.

DOJ_NMG_0109796

Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne says polar bears appear to be dying because their habitat — ice in the Arctic Ocean — is melting.

"Polar bears are one of nature's ultimate survivors," Kempthorne says. But their "habitat may literally be melting."

Some environmentalists hope that the "threatened" designation, which could come within a year after public comments and more scientific review, could give a boost to the fight against global warming.

The Endangered Species Act puts the responsibility on the federal government to avoid authorizing any activities that might jeopardize an endangered species or the habitat where it lives.

Industries that pollute a river, for example, that is home to an endangered fish can be forced to stop.

But how effectively the designation might be used to regulate industries that produce high levels of so-called greenhouse gases — pollutants that contribute to global warming — is unclear.

GLOBAL WARMING: Climate change leaves animals scrambling | On Deadline

Kempthorne says climate change is "outside the bounds" of his department.

An estimated 20,000 to 25,000 polar bears live in the Arctic region. One study showed a 22% decline in numbers in Canada's Hudson Bay. Another showed a drop in weight and reduced cub survival in Alaska's Southern Beaufort Sea.

The proposal calls for polar bears to be listed as "threatened" because the species is not considered at immediate risk of becoming extinct, which would be categorized as "endangered."

Kempthorne says Alaskan natives and others who hunt the bears can continue to harvest the animals. And coastal and offshore oil and gas exploration can continue. "Oil and gas development is not a factor," he says, "period."

The proposal to add the bears to the list came after a two-year fight.

"It's frustrating to wait, but at the same time, it is still a significant step forward," says Brendan Cummings, an attorney for the Center for Biological Diversity, who filed suit to seek polar bear protection.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., the incoming head of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, says the polar bear's plight reflects the planet's health. "This news serves as a wake-up call to the U.S. Congress and the administration that we must quickly begin to address global warming through legislative action," she says.

Bush Administration Seeks Protection For Polar Bears (WSJ)

By Maya Jackson Randall

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Department of Interior on Wednesday proposed to list polar bears as a threatened species under the Endangered Species Act, saying global warming is causing sea ice -- a primary habitat for the bears -- to melt at dangerous rates.

While the burning of fossil fuels such as oil and coal are thought to lead to global warming, Interior Department Secretary Dirk Kempthorne Wednesday said oil and natural gas drilling in the Arctic region is not to blame for the receding ice.

"It is very clear that the oil and gas activity does not pose a threat," Mr. Kempthorne said. "In fact .. they have been partners."

Still, the Interior Department is silent on what's actually causing the warmer temperatures.

The "whole aspect of climate change is beyond the scope of the Endangered Species Act," Mr. Kempthorne said during a conference call with reporters. Other agencies within the Bush administration, not DOI, are charged with focusing on a national greenhouse gas reduction program and the factors leading to rising global temperatures and climate changes, he said.

The DOI plans to take comments on the proposal in effort to make a decision within 12 months on whether to list the bears as endangered species.

"There's concern that their habitat may be literally melting," Mr. Kempthorne said.

Agency Proposes To List Polar Bears As Threatened (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer and Andrew C. Revkin

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 27 — The Interior Department proposed Wednesday to designate polar bears as a threatened species, saying that the accelerating loss of the Arctic ice that is the bears' hunting platform has led biologists to believe that bear populations will decline, perhaps sharply, in the coming decades.

Many experts on the Arctic say that global warming is causing the ice to melt and that the warming is at least partly the result of the atmospheric buildup of heat-trapping gases from tailpipes and smokestacks. The plight of the polar bear has been held up by environmentalists as a symbol of global warming caused by humans.

But in a conference call with reporters, Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne said that although his decision to seek protection for polar bears acknowledged the melting of the Arctic ice, his department was not taking a position on why the ice was melting or what to do about it.

While the Bush administration "takes climate change very seriously and recognizes the role of greenhouse gases in climate change," Mr. Kempthorne said, it was not his department's job to assess causes or prescribe solutions. "That whole aspect of climate change is beyond the scope of the Endangered Species Act," he added.

The scientific analysis in the proposal itself, however, did assess the cause of melting ice. Most of the studies on the Arctic climate and ice trends cited to support the proposed listing assumed that the buildup of heat-trapping gases was probably contributing to the loss of sea ice, or that the continued buildup of these gases, left unchecked, could create ice-free Arctic summers later this century, and possibly in as little as three decades.

The Interior Department has a year to gather and study comments on the proposed listing and make a final determination. It must also work out a recovery plan to control and reduce harmful impacts to the species, usually by controlling the activities that cause harm.

It is unclear whether such a recovery plan could avoid addressing the link between manmade emissions of heat-trapping gases and the increase in Arctic temperatures.

Kert Davies, the research director for Greenpeace U.S.A., one of three environmental groups that sued the Interior Department in 2005 to force it to add polar bears to the list of threatened species, said the administration was "clearly scrambling for credibility of any kind in this issue."

Kassie Siegel, the lawyer for the Center for Biological Diversity, a group based in Arizona that took the lead in the lawsuit calling on the department to list the polar bear, added, "I don't see how even this administration can write this proposal without acknowledging that the primary threat to polar bears is global warming and without acknowledging the science of global warming."

As a result of the lawsuit, the Interior Department had a court-ordered deadline of Wednesday to make a decision.

The worldwide population of polar bears currently stands at 20,000 to 25,000, broken into 19 groups in Russia, Denmark, Norway, Canada and the United States. One-quarter to one-fifth of that population occupies waters off the shores of Alaska or the nearby coastlines, with separate groups in the Chukchi Sea off northwestern Alaska, the Northern Beaufort Sea and the Southern Beaufort Sea off the North Slope of Alaska

The most-studied bear population, in the Western Hudson Bay in Canada, dropped 22 percent, to 935 from 1,194 from 1987 to 2004, the proposal by the Fish and Wildlife Service said.

It added, "However, based on environmental factors and observed patterns of population trends for some populations, it is likely that most populations will exhibit declines in the future."

The International Conservation Union, in its latest red list of endangered wildlife, gave polar bears threatened status in May, projecting a decline of 30 percent by midcentury from current populations, mainly due to projected losses of sea ice in a warming world.

Polar bears are dependent on sea ice as a platform for hunting seals, and as a pathway to coastal areas. The ice shrinkage has meant that polar bears, which are strong swimmers, have had to cover longer distances between ice and land.

They have survived previous Arctic warming periods, including the last warm stretch between ice ages some 130,000 years ago, but some climate experts project that nothing in the species' history is likely to match the pace and extent of warming and ice retreats projected in this century and beyond, should emissions of heat-trapping gases continue unabated.

While Mr. Kempthorne and Dale Hall, director of the Fish and Wildlife Service, said Wednesday that they saw no separate risk to polar bears from oil and gas activity, the latest assessment of the species for the International Conservation Union, by a group of experts including Fish and Wildlife Service biologists, did include such activity in a list of threats, including toxic contaminants, shipping and recreational viewing.

Recently, the Minerals Management Service, another division of the Interior Department, proposed opening sections of the Beaufort and Chukchi Seas to oil and gas drilling.

"This listing will hopefully provide additional leverage to look more closely at those decisions," said Margaret Williams, director of the Bering Sea ecoregion program at the World Wildlife Federation.

Scott Schliebe, a federal biologist and the polar bear project leader for the Fish and Wildlife Service, said the basic connection between shrinking ice and greater distress for the bears was well established. This is shown clearly in areas where ice has retreated progressively in summers — including the Beaufort Sea off the North Slope and Hudson Bay in Canada. In such places, Mr. Schliebe said, "we know today that they're facing a situation of distress and nutritional stress."

The department's proposal said that "at this time" the lands and waters most critical to the bears' protection, called critical habitat in the law, were "not determinable."

DOJ_NMG_0109798

Critical-habitat designations ensure that federal agencies must study the impact that any activities they conduct or approve in that area might have on the species at risk.

Global Warming Puts Polar Bears On Thin Ice (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

Polar bears are in jeopardy and need stronger government protection because of melting Arctic sea ice related to global warming, the Bush administration said yesterday.

Pollution and overhunting also threaten their existence. Greenland and Norway have the most polar bears, and a quarter of them live mainly in Alaska and travel to Canada and Russia.

Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne yesterday proposed listing polar bears as a "threatened" species on the government list of imperiled species. The "endangered" category is reserved for species more likely to become extinct.

"Polar bears are one of nature's ultimate survivors, able to live and thrive in one of the world's harshest environments," Mr. Kempthorne said. "But we are concerned the polar bear's habitat may literally be melting."

A final decision on whether to add the polar bears to the list is a year away, after the government finishes more studies.

Such a decision would require all federal agencies to ensure that anything they authorize that might affect polar bears will not jeopardize their survival or the sea ice where they live. That could include oil and gas exploration, commercial shipping or even releases of toxic contaminants or climate-affecting pollution.

Mr. Kempthorne, however, said his department's studies indicate that coastal and offshore oil and gas exploration -- heavily promoted by the Bush administration, particularly in Alaska -- shouldn't be curtailed.

"It's very clear that the oil and gas activity in that area does not pose a threat to the polar bears," he said.

Similarly, Alaskan natives and other people who depend on hunting the bears as part of their subsistence diet probably will not be affected, Mr. Kempthorne said.

Environmentalists hope that invoking the Endangered Species Act protections eventually might provide impetus for the government to cut back on its emissions of carbon dioxide and other heat-trapping "greenhouse" gases blamed for warming the atmosphere.

The proposed listing also marks a potentially significant departure for the administration from its cautious rhetoric about the effects of global warming. Mr. Kempthorne cited the thinning sea ice brought about by global warming as the main culprit.

President Bush's steadfast refusal to go along with United Nations-brokered mandatory controls on carbon dioxide, the chief global warming gas, has contributed to tensions between the United States and other nations.

Polar bears, an iconic and cold weather-dependent animal, are dropping in numbers and weight in the Arctic. In July, the House approved a U.S.-Russia treaty to help protect polar bears from overhunting and other threats to their survival.

That vote put into effect a 2000 treaty that sets quotas on polar bear hunting by native populations in the two countries and establishes a bilateral commission to analyze how best to sustain sea ice. It also approved spending $2 million a year through 2010 for the polar bear program.

The Polar Bear Specialist Group of the World Conservation Union, based in Gland, Switzerland, has estimated the polar bear population in the Arctic is about 20,000 to 25,000.

US Says Global Warming Threatens Polar Bears (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

Polar bears should be classified as a threatened species because global warming could cause their habitat to melt away, the Bush administration said on Wednesday.

The iconic arctic animals were being threatened by receding ice, said Dirk Kempthorne, secretary of the Interior Department, who stopped short of calling for an investigation into the causes of climate change, saying the issue was beyond his department's remit.

"We need to just concentrate and focus on the species and its habitat," he said, adding the George W. Bush administration had already spent $29bn researching climate change issues and related technology.

While the proposal did not represent a clear departure from the Bush administration's stance on global warming, it marked the first time the White House had pointed to climate change as a phenomenon that could threaten the survival of a species.

Administration officials said they proposed adding polar bears to the threatened species list because Fish and Wildlife Service biologists feared that Alaska's population of polar bears could experience a significant decline in the future.

There are thought to be between 20,000 and 25,000 polar bears worldwide, most living in Greenland and Norway. But almost 5,000 live mainly in Alaska and travel to Canada and Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0109799

Recent scientific studies of adult polar bears in Canada and in Alaska's Southern Beaufort Sea found have found weight loss among the species and reduced cub survival. In Canada's western Hudson Bay, the population of polar bears has already declined 22 per cent.

The Fish and Wildlife Service will initiate a 12-month review of polar bears' current and future status before determining whether the species should be placed on the threatened list.

Dale Hall, director of the US Fish and Wildlife Service, said that if the polar bear was placed on the threatened list, the service would engage groups ranging from Alaskans to native Americans to scientists to "sit down and help us craft a recovery plan".

Although Mr Kempthorne said the nation's fish and wildlife service would not be asked to make a determination on why arctic sea ice was thinning, he emphasised that one potential environmental factor – oil and gas exploration – had "no negative impact on polar bears".

The conclusion contradicted a separate statement by the US Fish and Wildlife Service, which said that demands of oil and natural gas, and other resources in Alaska have led to "some conflicts" between polar bears and humans.

Ed Markey, a senior Democratic lawmaker on the House energy committee, said that the development "may signal the beginning of the end" of the Bush administration's policy of "global warming denial".

"After giving the cold shoulder to conservation, Kyoto, and better fuel economy standards, they seem to be warming up to protecting an icon of American wildlife," Mr Markey said.

Separately, Shell said on Wednesday it had hired Gale Norton, the former secretary of the Interior Department, to serve as a counsel for the Dutch oil giant.

The announcement from the energy company comes as the Bush administration is expected to face increased scrutiny by Congress on its ties to the oil and gas industry. This could include questions about whether the Interior Department has adequately collected royalty payments from oil and gas groups extracting resources from federally owned land.

Bright Idea Makes A Big Comeback: Conservation (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, December 28, 2006

Nearly all businesses share an all-consuming mission: sell, sell, sell. McDonald's wants to peddle more hamburgers. Airlines strive to fill every seat. Phone companies want you to make more calls.

But power companies these days are increasingly being told by regulators to pump hundreds of millions of dollars into selling less electricity.

Energy-efficiency programs, which first caught fire in the 1970s before fading in recent years, are making a big comeback spurred by global-warming fears and the public's aversion to more pollution-belching power plants. At least 15 states are starting or considering new or expanded rebate and tax-incentive programs. The campaigns entice consumers to buy compact fluorescent light bulbs and energy-saving dishwashers and coax businesses to replace power-guzzling freezers and lighting systems.

To prod utilities into better promoting or funding the initiatives, many states are carving out new financial inducements that turn the industry's 125-year-old business model on its head: In some cases, companies could make just as much money by selling less power.

"What (they're) asking us to do is cannibalize sales," says Trevor Lauer, vice president of retail sales for DTE Energy in Detroit, noting that DTE supports energy efficiency, especially if the company earns a sufficient financial return. "Our job is to sell as many kilowatt hours as we can."

States and cities are also beefing up building codes to require added insulation and more efficient heating systems in new homes and businesses. Wal-Mart last month announced a campaign to sell 100 million compact fluorescent bulbs by the end of 2007. The goal, if reached, would save $3 billion in electrical costs and keep 20 million tons of greenhouse gases from spewing out of power plants.

"It's pretty much understood that electricity as a growth industry is a dangerous thing," says California Energy Commissioner Art Rosenfeld, who is considered a pioneering advocate of energy efficiency.

Utilities are spending nearly $1.9 billion on energy-saving programs this year, up from $1.6 billion in 2005 and nearly double the 1999 total, says the American Council for an Energy-Efficient Economy, a non-profit group that is independent of the utility industry.

Driving the surge are soaring energy rates and a dilemma that even has a growing number of power companies embracing efficiency: Demand for electricity is projected to increase 19% over the next decade, yet building a power plant is no longer a surefire investment. That's because coal-fired plants might soon face expensive taxes on their carbon-dioxide emissions amid growing global-warming concerns. Meanwhile, natural gas prices are mercurial, nuclear plants face public opposition and renewable energy such as solar or wind doesn't operate 24 hours a day.

"We really view energy efficiency as the fifth fuel," says Jim Rogers, CEO of Duke Energy, which serves parts of the Southeast and Midwest and until recently resisted efficiency programs. "It gives us the capability to avoid building a new plant."

A report last month by McKinsey & Co. says worldwide growth in energy demand can be cut to 0.6% a year from 2.2% by tapping energy-saving technologies.

This isn't the first time conservation has captured the nation's fancy. The first efficiency wave was triggered by the 1973 Arab oil embargo. Utilities largely ditched those efforts in the mid-1990s, believing deregulation would breed new competition and lower prices. The competition never came, and efficiency has been on a gradual upswing since 2000.

It has shifted into high gear with global-warming fears and the federal Energy Policy Act of 2005. The legislation provides tax credits of up to $2,000 per home to builders of new homes that exceed international energy-saving standards by at least 50% and up to $500 to improve efficiency on existing homes.

But Steve Nadel, who heads the energy-efficiency council, criticizes the Bush administration as weak on conservation. The Natural Resources Defense Council sued the Energy Department for failing to update energy-efficiency standards for 22 appliances, from dishwashers to air-conditioning systems. Under a recent settlement, standards will be set over the next four years.

Energy Department spokesman Craig Stevens says clearing the backlog has been a priority for Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman.

Meanwhile, about 20 states have conservation programs, but many are not well-funded. The most aggressive are in California, the Pacific Northwest and the Northeast, where electricity prices are high.

Typically, states set budgets, and utilities design and run the programs. Power companies recoup their costs from customers, who each pay up to about $2 on their monthly energy bills to fund efficiency initiatives. Yet those who take advantage of the programs can save 30% or more in energy costs. That's because programs' incentives and associated expenses typically cost about 3 cents per kilowatt hour saved, while power costs an average 9.2 cents per kilowatt hour.

In California, Pacific Gas and Electric has used rebates to persuade consumers to buy 6 million compact fluorescent bulbs this year. More than half of California's homes have a compact fluorescent in at least one socket.

Many consumers shy away from the spiral-shaped bulbs because of retail costs of about $3 to $6 vs. as little as 25 cents for a standard light bulb. But the rebates drive the price to about 75 cents. Since compact fluorescents last about 10 years, or five times as long as standard bulbs, and use about 70% less energy, the extra cost can be recovered in weeks.

California also boasts some of the strictest appliance codes in the nation. For example, regulators this year limited to 1 watt the amount of power devices such as cellphone chargers and shavers can use when they're plugged in but turned off. The change will add a few cents to the cost of plugs but save users $80 a year in electricity costs.

All told, California utilities are spending $700 million this year to fund and promote energy efficiency, up from $410 million in 2005. California's 30-year-old efficiency program has held per-household electricity consumption at 1975 levels — and avoided construction of at least one power plant a year — while per-household usage in the rest of the USA has risen 50%.

"The public loves it, the risk to shareholders is less and the company's image is better," says PG&E Chief Executive Peter Darbee.

Government support for energy efficiency in other states is spotty but improving. Seventeen states have no standards, or obsolete ones, for how much insulation or what kinds of heating systems, for instance, must be used in houses, says the Building Codes Assistance Project. Louisiana recently adopted statewide standards as it rebuilds homes after Hurricane Katrina. Mississippi and Alabama may follow.

Some towns are going far beyond state minimums. In New York, the Long Island townships of Babylon and Brookhaven this year required all new homes to be built to Energy Star standards. Homes earn the federal Energy Star label if they're at least 15% more energy efficient than international building codes.

The requirements will add about $3,000 to the cost of an average $500,000 home but will save $720 a year in energy costs, says Neil Lewis of the Neighborhood Network, which pushed for the change.

The Long Island Builders Institute had opposed it, fearing thousands of dollars in costs to builders as they waited weeks for homes to be inspected. But group Executive Vice President Robert Wieboldt says, "The national goal of energy independence is something we might have to share the burden on."

Experts say the country isn't close to realizing its energy-saving potential. Nationwide, programs are helping utilities save 0.2% of power consumption each year. By contrast, Vermont and California — two states in the vanguard of energy efficiency — save an extra 1% in energy usage each year. By tripling funding in the next few years, Nadel says, the USA could cut up to 30% of new power demand by 2020, staving off the need for hundreds of new power plants.

Many states are moving toward that goal, even in the South and Midwest, where a plethora of power plants has tempered electricity rates and conservation programs. Michigan and Georgia are considering launching efficiency initiatives. Arizona, where torrid population growth is driving power demand, quadrupled funding to $34 million this year. Vermont plans to double its annual energy savings to 2% by 2008, wiping out the state's growth in power consumption.

Yet some utilities vigorously oppose efficiency mandates. "Our position is that you not set an arbitrary (funding) goal," says Oscar Harper, vice president of resource planning for Georgia Power, a Southern Co. unit that voluntarily runs some efficiency campaigns. Harper says many programs are not cost-effective and "can really hit low-income customers hard" by raising their monthly bills.

Steve Smith, executive director of the Southern Alliance for Clean Energy, contends the company simply fears eating into its growing revenue.

Regulators in several states are trying to prod utilities into spending more on efficiency. Rhode Island recently passed legislation requiring power companies to price efficiency programs before seeking bids for new electricity supply.

A utility must implement any program that costs less than the state's average electricity price, currently 14 cents per kilowatt hour. "It removes the artificial cap," says Ken Payne, director of the state Senate's policy office.

Six states — New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware, Wisconsin and Idaho — are considering severing the tie between electricity usage and utilities' profit. Under the proposals, a utility would earn a set rate of return even if power consumption rose above or fell below projected levels. If efficiency measures produced better-than-expected savings, rates on all customers would rise slightly to offset the utility's shortfall in revenue. California now uses such a system.

"It certainly removes the disincentive to moving ahead with energy-efficiency programs," says Joe Rigby, senior vice president and chief financial officer of Pepco, which serves southern Maryland.

But Con Edison, which serves New York City, opposes the idea. Company spokesman Mike Clendenin says a similar system cost customers $70 million in the mid-1990s when consumption fell short of revenue forecasts. Richard Cowart of the Regulatory Assistance Project, a consulting firm, says many utilities dislike the setup because it kills their chance to earn extra revenue when electricity usage exceeds projections.

Still another proposal, backed by Duke and DTE Energy, would allow utilities to earn a rate of return on the energy savings they achieve, just as they now earn profits on electricity sales. California regulators are weighing a similar plan.

"We would be (given the incentive) to drive (sales) down and take a piece of the savings as our earnings," says Duke's Rogers.

Further feeding the industry's interest in efficiency are new technologies that make that Energy Star refrigerator seem quaint. Just a few years away are smart meters linked to smart appliances via computers, or even the Internet.

After reading tomorrow's forecast for hot weather, your air conditioner could cool the house in the morning, when prices are low, and scale back midday when costs spike. That would save consumers money and help utilities reduce strain on the power grid during peak demand.

Technology "is what's really moving (energy efficiency) forward," Rogers says. "It makes things possible that weren't possible before."

Democrats Eye Revamp Of Toxic-cleanup Superfund (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, December 28, 2006

Although 1 in 4 Americans lives within four miles of a designated toxic-waste site, the federal program to clean up the sites has slowed.

Now, key Democrats in Congress are looking to push the program, known as Superfund, back into the spotlight. They're looking not only at its funding levels but also its funding sources. A central issue: whether to restore "polluter pay" taxes on industry to help fund cleanups.

"In some of these sites, the pollution is out of control, meaning it's still dangerous," Sen. Barbara Boxer, incoming chairwoman of the environment and public works committee, said this month. "We have to clean it up."

The California Democrat says she's making Superfund, along with global warming, focal points of her environmental agenda. She has tapped presumed presidential aspirant Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D) of New York to chair the Superfund subcommittee.

Superfund, started in the 1970s, has seen a decline in funding and completed projects in recent years. Between 1993 and 2005, funding fell 32 percent - from $1.8 billion to $1.2 billion in inflation-adjusted dollars, the Government Accountability Office (GAO) reports. During the same period, the number of cleanup sites earning "construction complete" status fell by more than half - from 88 to 40 - the lowest level in more than a decade.

DOJ_NMG_0109802

Officials at the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), which administers the program, deny funding is an issue. Fewer completed projects merely indicate transitions in construction cycles that can last a decade or more, they say.

"What's been cleared away already are the easier sites," says Susan Bodine, assistant administrator of the EPA's office of solid waste and emergency response. "The sites we're working on now, many of them are complex situations that were also being addressed in the 1990s, and they're still not done. But we're making progress."

Outside observers disagree. "Superfund is in trouble," says Velma Smith, a policy analyst at the National Environmental Trust in Washington. "People in the agency are telling me they're giving up on assessing new sites. They may know a problem exists, but they can't get the money to even go out and assess it."

Many of Superfund's biggest challenges can be traced back to its budget woes, critics and former EPA employees say. For example: While the EPA once had a "trust fund" from taxes on the production of toxic chemicals by chemical and oil companies, authorization for the tax lapsed in 1995. The fund shrank steadily from nearly $4 billion to zero by 2002, despite President Clinton's attempts to get Congress to restore it. President Bush has not asked to renew it.

That means that the share of Superfund programs paid for by taxpayers has risen steadily. From 1993 to 2000, it was less than 20 percent of the overall appropriation. By 2004, the public was footing the whole bill, the GAO reports.

That's why some Democrats, including Senator Boxer, want to reinstate "polluter pays" taxes. Polluters still pay to clean up their contaminated sites when the EPA can track them down. But when companies are bankrupt, the EPA pays. In the past, the "trust fund" helped offset the public cost through a tax on companies producing the chemicals that were being cleaned up.

Those taxes once generated about $1.5 billion a year, according to a June report by the Center for Progressive Reform. Now "with reduced funding, investigation and enforcement has lagged, causing fewer sites to be added to the list because nobody's out there looking for them," says Rena Steinzor, coauthor of the report.

But other analysts say the tax is too broad.

"The tax isn't fair," H. Sterling Burnett of the National Center for Policy Analysis, a think tank, told Environment and Energy Daily in an interview. "It's going to target some companies who had nothing to do with the pollution and it's not going to get the companies that did the pollution because many of them are no longer around."

Ms. Bodine of the EPA also sees little merit in taxing chemical producers. "We do have the federal funds we need," she says.

Even where toxic waste cleanup problems are identified, there are problems getting them into the Superfund pipeline. At least 61 sites are currently proposed but not yet added to the 1,241 nonfederal sites on the National Priority List or NPL. Among them are many "orphan" sites where there are no polluters to sue - and federal dollars must be used to clean them up.

Orphan sites are not a new problem.

"We had a number of these orphan sites that we had completed design for cleanup and just needed the money from headquarters for construction - and those dollars weren't forthcoming," says William Muno, former head of Superfund for the EPA's Midwest region. "I've spoken with people since I retired and, from what I understand, the situation is even more acute."

Even completed cleanups have caused controversy. In Ringwood, N.J., this summer, furious residents met with politicians over sludge and other contaminants left on a Ford site the EPA declared clean more than a decade ago.

Black Eye For Black Canyon (GJS)

By Bobby Magill, The Daily Sentinel

Grand Junction (CO) Sentinel, December 27, 2006

BLACK CANYON OF THE GUNNISON NATIONAL PARK — Before the dams were built, the Gunnison River raged through Black Canyon each spring with such ferocity that it carved through the volcanic rock Colorado's deepest and most sheer abyss.

More than 2,000 feet above the river on the south rim of Black Canyon of the Gunnison National Park, there's no running water, no grand lodge inviting tourists to luxuriate, no concession stand feeding the masses.

There is, however, a sense of remoteness and grandeur on the threshold of Colorado's deepest gorge. Overlooked by a rustic log cabin visitor center from which tourists peer into the chasm to the park's only permanent running water, the Gunnison River is barely visible from the canyon rim.

Only a gravel road penetrates the park on its north rim, where Black Canyon's most adventurous visitors attempt to either scale its sheer walls or negotiate one of several narrow poison ivy-riddled talus slopes plummeting surefooted hikers to the river below.

"When you go to the north rim, it's sort of like going to a park back in the '50s," said former Black Canyon Superintendent Bill Wellman, who was promoted in mid-November to the superintendent's post at sprawling Big Bend National Park in Texas.

Sixty-six years after President Herbert Hoover declared Black Canyon a national monument, Congress created Black Canyon of the Gunnison National Park in 1999, now the nation's fourth-newest national park senior only to a pair of eastern parks and Colorado's own Great Sand Dunes.

Black Canyon National Park is a picture of vitality in defiance of trends afflicting the region's other parks suffering from the National Park Service's budget woes and shrinking masses coming to see their natural wonders.

Visitation at Black Canyon has been on the rise the last three years, hitting 180,814 people in 2005, about half what it was three decades ago.

The park's south rim is endowed with facilities built within the last 15 years, most of which are in good condition.

Black Canyon's price tag for maintenance projects in need of completion is a mere $4.7 million — a fraction of the cost of its neighbor parks' maintenance backlogs, which are as high as $63 million.

The park could be rid of its maintenance backlog by 2010 because more than $1 million of maintenance projects are completed annually, Wellman said.

The park isn't immune to the budget crunch, however, and has had to consolidate management staff with Curecanti National Recreation Area and Florissant Fossil Beds National Monument west of Colorado Springs for efficiency, he said.

Down the river

One of the park's greatest strengths, Wellman said, is the quality of the canyon it protects. Development near the park and the fate of water flows in the Gunnison River could change that, however.

Black Canyon may be Colorado's most controversial national park —not necessarily because of how it was created or how its government caretakers manage its formidable land, but because of the water in the Gunnison River, which not only imbues the canyon with life, but supplies water and electricity to thousands of people in central Colorado.

During the spring floods, the Gunnison River sliced through the canyon at up to 20,000 cubic feet per second. So powerful was the Gunnison that it carved Black Canyon one inch deeper each year, creating a chasm 2,772 feet deep at its deepest and 40 feet wide at its narrowest.

The river's annual wax and wane was the natural order of things until the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation disrupted the Gunnison's water flows. In 1976, the bureau completed the last of the three dams and reservoirs of the Aspinall Unit immediately upstream of the park. The unit is part of the Colorado River Storage Project under which Arizona's Glen Canyon, Utah's Flaming Gorge and New Mexico's Navajo dams were also built.

With the completion of the Crystal Dam and its accompanying power plant, the bureau created on the Gunnison River a 40-mile swath of reservoirs and power plants that can produce more than 200 kilowatts of electricity and store over 1 million acre feet of water.

But the amount of water released below the dams would forever change the ecology of the river through Black Canyon National Park.

The dams eliminated the Gunnison River's natural hydrograph through the canyon, evening out flows during spring runoff, when the river should be raging with floodwater, said Ken Stahlnecker, chief of resource stewardship and science at Black Canyon. The gorge used to be the Gunnison's transition zone between warm water and cold water, but the dams cooled the river at the expense of native fish species.

"Now we see more of the trout species, rainbow and brown primarily, and it's quite a fishery down there now," he said.

The natural hydrograph needs to be maintained because it's the signal for fish to spawn, and it flushes the river channel of debris, said Wendy McDermott, executive director of the High Country Citizens Alliance.

But Wellman said the canyon can survive without a natural hydrograph, as long as it gets peak and lower "shoulder" flows each spring and a once-per-decade flood with flows of about 15,000 cubic feet per second.

"Our water right is not a consumptive right," Wellman said. "It doesn't take any water out of the river system."

But a 2003 agreement between the National Park Service, the U.S. Department of Interior and the State of Colorado threatened to starve the canyon of its flows, reducing it to a year-round minimum of 300 cubic feet per second.

To maintain the vitality of the Gunnison River through Black Canyon, water would ideally need to flow at a volume well above 300 cubic feet per second, especially during spring runoff when the river naturally runs highest, Stahlnecker said.

The agreement relinquished Black Canyon National Park's water right to peak and shoulder flows during the spring, a right dating to 1933 when President Hoover declared Black Canyon a national monument.

The agreement was "nonsensical," said U.S. District Court Judge Clarence A. Brimmer in his September decision to set aside the pact. The National Park Service ignored the needs of the public in a decision that would profoundly effect the canyon's ecology and human environment, he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0109804

He declared that because Black Canyon is a wilderness area and a national park, the National Park Service must maintain enough water in the river to leave the canyon's ecology and scenic beauty unimpaired. The agreement, he said, protected the canyon's competitors and not the canyon itself.

After being given until Dec. 18 — the court granted a one month extension to the government's original deadline — to appeal Brimmer's decision, the U.S. Department of Justice filed a notice of appeal that day, which preserves the government's right to file its appeal beyond the deadline.

Cynthia Magnuson, spokeswoman for the Justice Department in Washington, said the appeal would likely be filed by the beginning of January.

If its appeal fails, the federal government and the state will have to return to the table to forge a new agreement more friendly to the ecology of Black Canyon.

"We'd like to see an agreement that protects the resources of the park and protects current and future use of the water within the Gunnison Basin," said McDermott, whose group is a plaintiff in the case.

Development looms

As the canyon awaits the fate of its river, worries stir above its rim about how commercial and housing development on private property within and just outside park boundaries may one day become part of the landscape seen from Black Canyon's most popular viewpoints.

There's no lodge at Black Canyon National Park — not even flush toilets — and that's just fine with Lynn and Ted Farr. In early November, they were in the middle of a trans-continental road trip from their home in Emmaus, Penn., when they decided to visit the park, which they discovered in a tourism brochure.

The pair grew up in California, where car-clogged Yosemite served as their idea of a typical national park. But sparsely-visited Black Canyon, they said, should be different.

"They don't need a lodge in the park," Lynn Farr said. "Yosemite kind of set a standard. I don't think (this) park needs all of (those) facilities."

Where the Farrs see an ideal national park, real estate speculator Tom Chapman sees a business opportunity.

Owner of a 112-acre private inholding subdivided into three 37 acre parcels just south of Black Canyon's campground and within the park boundaries, Chapman is advertising his land as a rare opportunity for a savvy developer who wants to take advantage of doing business within a relatively undeveloped national park. One house has already been built on the land.

"These private parcels stand alone as being the only place where one can own a business or a luxury home within the U.S. National Park system," Chapman says in his online ad for the land. "Anchored on a high hill, the building site on Parcel No. 2 reigns supreme over the entire park and is an excellent candidate for a national park lodge or a luxury estate."

The ad trumpets the other parcel, on the East Portal Road which leads to a dam at the bottom of the canyon, as a great spot for a fast food joint.

Development on those inholdings would "potentially create homesites near the peak of Signal Hill, which would be visible from a lot of the overlooks from the roads within the park," and would sully the darkness of the park's night skies, Black Canyon National Park Management Assistant Dave Roberts said.

"The Park Service would rather see the area remain essentially rural and undeveloped," he said. "We've made attempts to acquire that land in the past, but we're not anywhere close on price."

Chapman is notorious among conservationists who criticize him for buying cheap private property within wilderness areas and national parks and selling it for millions.

On his Web site, Chapman is advertising a package of 19 inholdings — all sold — within Colorado's Weminuche, Holy Cross, Fossil Ridge, Spanish Peaks and Uncompahgre wilderness areas, where buyers could develop within a federally protected wildland.

Chapman's Black Canyon ad says the property is priceless and is currently off the market. As a representative of TDX, LP, he purchased the 112 acres in 1998 for $80,000, and pays only $45 in property taxes annually for the land's $3,100 agricultural production value, according to Montrose County records.

He's selling a nearby 1,700 acre ranch "targeted for inclusion in the Black Canyon National Park" for $10 million.

Chapman couldn't be reached for comment, but Roberts said the park's hopes of trying to buy the property is fading because the National Park Service has no money to spend on acquiring land.

"Our other concern is Grizzly Ridge," Wellman said.

The finger of private property on the ridge directly across Black Canyon from the visitor center was subdivided in 2004, and is "cherry stemmed" into the park, he said.

"That would be more intrusive than (TDX's) current house," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0109805

The park is trying to either acquire that property or ask the owner to put it under a conservation easement to preserve the views in the park.

In coping with outside development that could be within view of the park, Wellman said park officials know that it's the grandeur and quality of the canyon that draws people to the park.

And that's worth protecting, he said: "One of our objectives should be not to screw up what's really nice."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

The New FBI Means Business (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

EVANSTON, ILL. — At a class on leadership, a professor at Northwestern University's business school here asks his students to ponder a landmark on the Chicago skyline 10 miles south.

"Walk along the lake, and look downtown. You see the Sears Tower," Ranjay Gulati says. "Sears Roebuck & Co. owned retailing. They defined retailing."

That they no longer do, he says, shows "what happens when the world changes around you … and you don't."

Thirty senior FBI managers and executives stir at their desks.

They're here because their employer is looking for ways to manage what is still a wrenching transition: In the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, a newly urgent mission — disrupting terrorism before it hits the United States — was thrust upon the bureau.

In an effort to change the famously insular and hidebound organization, the FBI has sent more than 2,000 of its top agents and supervisors — including this group of spy-catchers, cyber-sleuths and terrorist-hunters — to management school at Northwestern.

This is new training for a new FBI, or at least that is the hope.

Traditionally, FBI agents and supervisors are schooled in the nuts and bolts of law enforcement. Agents learn how to become expert marksmen or cultivate informants. Supervisors learn how to mentor new agents or follow proper procedures.

Here, they explore how large corporations have shifted their missions. If Toyota can adapt its car lines to the baby-boom generation, then why can't the FBI adapt its role to the changing security needs of the country?

They practice role-playing exercises aimed at instilling teamwork, although about half fail to get the point of one exercise because they missed a subtlety in the instructions. "The competitive mentality is hard to break," Professor Leigh Thompson said.

Puzzled reactions

And they study business experiences that might help them present the FBI in the best light. They learn how Starbucks developed a strong identity and how Exxon botched its handling of the 1989 oil spill in Alaska.

The program was started three years ago by FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III. Most of the senior headquarters staffers and top agents from the 56 field offices have taken the weeklong courses, which cost the bureau about $3 million a year.

Mueller is an ardent student of management science. He has sought the views of successful chief executives, including former IBM Corp. chief executive Louis V. Gerstner Jr., and has looked to outsiders to fill high positions.

The training has been one of Mueller's main efforts to bring fresh thinking into the bureau, though some FBI officials at first found the idea puzzling.

"The initial response was, 'We are going to go where?' " recalls Kevin Brock, a counter-terrorism official who attended the program. "A lot of us did not know what we were getting into. So we were wondering, 'How does this connect with putting bad guys in jail, hunting terrorists and all that stuff?' "

Management experts say there are limits to what a government agency can learn from studying the ups and downs of companies. And there are questions about how much the FBI has really embraced the lessons.

But in being asked to fight terrorism while solving more traditional crimes, the bureau faces a quandary that is fairly common in the business world.

"How can one organization arrange itself to do two things well? This is hardly a challenge that is unique to the FBI," said Michael Roberto, a professor of management at Bryant University in Smithfield, R.I., who is co-writing a case study of the FBI that Harvard Business School plans to use.

"We have no monopoly on good ideas," Mueller said in an interview, adding that he and others found the training "tremendously educating."

DOJ_NMG_0109806

Mueller took a version a week or so before he testified before the Sept. 11 commission in 2004. The training focused in part on how to respond to a crisis. It highlighted traits of executives who successfully handle such situations: transparency, expertise, commitment and empathy.

At the time, the bureau was under siege and there was speculation the commission would order it dismantled because of intelligence failures that preceded the attacks.

Mueller followed the advice to a T, and gave a performance that drew praise from the commission, which recommended the bureau be preserved.

The classes take place in a modern conference center that caters to business. Lunch is served in the Johnson Wax Dining Room, breaks are in the Oscar Mayer Lounge.

Experienced group

The FBI allowed a Times reporter to sit in on several days of classes. The Times agreed to withhold certain details of some exercises and discussions, which in a few instances are based on actual cases.

The latest class is a seasoned one; its participants average about 20 years' experience. They include administrative officers and heads of some of the most sensitive investigations in recent bureau history, including the Sept. 11 attacks and the 2001 anthrax episode.

The students are self-effacing, and seem to have no illusions about the difficult task they face. The mission is akin to "building an airplane while trying to fly it," said Thomas Mahlik, a senior counter-espionage official.

A major theme is creating an atmosphere in which people are open to change, no small feat for an organization that has done things the same way for generations.

Gulati used as an example urinals introduced at Amsterdam's airport that used the image of a black fly inside the basin to try to get men to hit their mark. What seemed a good idea never caught on. "Just because you have a great idea … does not mean everybody will line up behind it," he said.

The class watches a video as part of an exercise in "Inattentional Blindness," which is when people do not see what is clearly in their visual field because they are focused on a different task.

In keeping track of how often people throw a basketball, most of the agents fail to see a mysterious figure who walks through the scene. Richard Lambert, head of the FBI's Knoxville, Tenn., office, was so certain that figure was not in the video, he said, "I would have bet you a paycheck."

Such conceptual learning — the classes have such names as "Strategic Leadership" and "Beyond Win-Win: Managing Interdependencies" — is an adjustment for an agency that has long been run by G-men.

"The bureau is full of people who are very good at crisis situations. We know how to do that. We got it," said Brock, the counter-terrorism specialist. "So far as large cultural changes, we are like everyone else."

Innovation is rare in organizations such as the FBI that are highly regimented. But the professors tell the class that quality is essential for large organizations to become successful.

"Every organization that operates efficiently and effectively has people who are exploring better ways to do things," said Joseph Hannigan, a Mueller confidant who heads the FBI program at Northwestern's Kellogg School of Management. "In the bureau, that has been kind of random."

So the agents are taught the value of dissent. Included in the assigned reading is an article called "How Management Teams Can Have a Good Fight."

The instructors teach that people are naturally drawn to obeying the rules, even where the consequences can be bizarre or lethal. They cite the case of a jet that landed in the wrong country even though 250 passengers and flight attendants could tell from an electronic map that the pilots were off course.

"People are afraid to break ranks," said another professor, Michelle Buck. "The role of a leader is to create an environment in which people feel free to speak up."

Steve Gomez, a former terrorism squad leader for the FBI in Los Angeles who is now a bureau supervisor in St. Louis, said the classes reinforced for him the importance of seeking out dissenting views among his team.

"When I have these meetings, and we are brainstorming, I have to find somebody to be my naysayer and challenge us," Gomez said. "I know who those people are. They are going to speak their mind. They really don't care what I think, and that helps."

PR crisis lesson

The class also gets a lesson in brand management by studying how Mercedes-Benz handled a public relations crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0109807

As it prepared to roll out a new subcompact in the mid-1990s, the model flipped while making a sharp turn during a routine test of whether it could avoid a sudden obstacle, such as a moose.

At first, the automaker reacted defensively. But as ridicule of the car's failure of the "moose test," Mercedes executives took action to protect their reputation and made a costly safety improvement in the car.

Mercedes then launched a public-relations blitz and tried to defuse the furor by putting plush moose toys in the new vehicles. The lesson, said Daniel Diermeier, one of the Kellogg professors, is that agents should not let "tactical excellence" get in the way of "strategic thinking" that may help the agency in the long run.

"Think of yourself as a steward of the FBI brand," he said.

Court Rules Feds Are Entitled To Baseball Steroid Testing Data (AP)

AP, December 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) - The names and urine samples of about 100 Major League Baseball players who tested positive three years ago can be used by federal investigators, a court ruled Wednesday -a decision that could have implications for Barry Bonds.

The ruling from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals could bolster the government's perjury case against Bonds if investigators are able to link his name to a positive test from baseball's anonymous testing in 2003. The San Francisco Giants slugger has been the target of a perjury investigation since he testified before a 2004 grand jury that he didn't knowingly use illegal drugs.

The decision also could help authorities find the drug sources. Those who tested positive could be called before the federal grand jury and asked where they obtained their performance-enhancing drugs.

Greg Anderson, Bonds' personal trainer, is currently in prison for refusing to testify in the perjury probe. Anderson previously was convicted of steroids distribution.

During 2004 raids on three labs involved in the MLB testing program, investigators seized computer files containing the 2003 test results. The unidentified samples had been collected as part of a MLB survey to gauge the prevalence of steroid use.

Baseball players and owners agreed in their 2002 labor contract that the results would be confidential, and each player was assigned a code number to be matched with his name.

Quest Diagnostics of Teterboro, N.J., one of the largest drug-testing firms in the nation, analyzed more than 1,400 urine samples from players in the 2003 season. Comprehensive Drug Testing, of Long Beach, coordinated the collection of specimens and compiled the data.

Subpoenas were issued to both companies in late 2003, a day before the test results were to be destroyed, and in April 2004 Internal Revenue Service agents seized the test results and samples. It's unclear whether the data seized includes test results or specimens from Bonds.

Bonds always has maintained he never tested positive, but federal investigators demanded to see the 2003 test results for Bonds, then Yankees players Gary Sheffield and Jason Giambi and seven other players. When they raided the testing labs for those 10 results, investigators also seized computer files containing the test results of nearly 100 other players not named in the government's subpoena and warrants.

The Major League Baseball Players Association protested the seizure as a violation of the players' constitutional rights.

Bonds' attorney didn't immediately return calls for comment.

Michael Weiner, general counsel for the players' association, which sued to keep the government from accessing the records, declined to immediately comment, wanting first to review the decision.

The government's investigation of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, the Burlingame supplements lab at the center of the steroid scandal, already has resulted in guilty pleas from BALCO president Victor Conte, BALCO vice president James Valente, chemist Patrick Arnold, track coach Remi Korchemny and Anderson.

100 Players Tested Positive For Steroids In 2003 (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, December 27, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- A federal appeals court revealed today that more than 100 major league baseball players tested positive for steroids in 2003, and ruled that the government could use their tests in its investigation of illegal drug distribution to athletes.

The Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco also said federal investigators had obtained Major league Baseball's 2003 testing samples and results for 10 players linked to the investigation of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, or BALCO, and that eight of them had tested positive for steroids.

DOJ_NMG_0109808

The ruling mentioned no athletes' names, but San Francisco Giants star Barry Bonds was part of the BALCO investigation and testified that he had never knowingly used steroids. A grand jury is investigating whether he committed perjury.

The government has expressed no intention of prosecuting any athlete for illegal drug use. The court quoted government lawyers as saying athletes who tested positive could be called before a grand jury and asked about their suppliers.

Five men, including BALCO founder Victor Conte, have pleaded guilty to illegal drug distribution in the case.

The Major League Baseball Players Association did not challenge federal prosecutors' authority to keep and use baseball's drug testing records of players, like Bonds, who were linked to BALCO. Those records were obtained in 2004 from two companies that conducted the testing for Major League Baseball, under search warrants that originated in the BALCO case.

But the association challenged prosecutors' seizure of records of any other players. Among the records seized by prosecutors, for example, was a spreadsheet that included the test results of the BALCO athletes plus other baseball players who had tested positive for steroids.

Three federal judges had ordered those records returned in separate rulings, saying federal agents had no advance evidence of steroid use by any player outside the BALCO investigation and no legitimate reason to hold the documents.

The judges, in San Francisco, Las Vegas and Los Angeles, accused prosecutors of misusing search warrants -- which had been approved by magistrates in uncontested proceedings -- to prevent the players and their association from challenging the searches.

The appeals court overruled all three judges in a 2-1 decision, saying the government is entitled to keep and use all computer records that were part of the same files as the BALCO material obtained from private drug-testing laboratories.

"We see no evidence of bad faith or pretext," said Judge Diarmuid O'Scannlain in the majority opinion. He said prosecutors have legal grounds for retaining not only the BALCO-related records but also the "intermingled information" of positive tests of other athletes.

Dissenting Judge Sidney Thomas said the ruling "puts Americans' most basic privacy rights in jeopardy." By the same rationale, he said, the government could seize the medical records of any patient that a hospital kept in the same computer file as a patient who was the target of a search warrant.

Ruling Erases Players' Victories In A Steroids Case (NYT)

By Murray Chass

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

The federal court system and Major League Baseball have different ways of operating. In baseball, if Tom Glavine shuts out Atlanta for the Mets on Monday and the Braves come back the next day and knock John Maine out of the game in the first inning and go on to rout the Mets, Glavine's shutout isn't wiped out. It still counts.

In the court system, however, victories, even shutouts, can be wiped out with the signature of a judge or two.

Lawyers for the Players Association understand that difference, but the decision they were handed yesterday in a steroids-related case in federal court rocked them nonetheless.

Lawyers representing the union pitched a two-state, three-case shutout in 2004, but yesterday the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in San Francisco wiped out their sweeping victory, ruling in favor of the government in the matter of steroid-test samples that authorities seized in 2004.

By a vote of 2 to 1, the three-judge panel overturned lower court decisions in Los Angeles, San Francisco and Nevada. The union had no immediate public reaction to the decision, preferring to take time to digest the 120-page opinion before commenting. However, the union is certain to go further with the case.

It could ask the Ninth Circuit to re-hear the case with the entire 12-judge court, or it could appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Whichever route the union takes, the case will not have a final outcome until very likely sometime in 2008.

One thought some people had upon hearing the outcome of the government's appeal was that it could have an adverse effect on Barry Bonds's status, but that will probably not be so.

The Bonds speculation stems from the possibility that he tested positive for steroids use in 2003, the year baseball conducted survey testing of all players to determine if testing for disciplinary purposes would ensue in 2004.

However, even if Bonds tested positive, he would not have known it because the testing was supposed to have been done anonymously. Furthermore, he reportedly told the grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative for steroids distribution that he didn't knowingly use steroids. Bonds thought one of the substances was flaxseed oil, he reportedly testified.

If Bonds tested positive in 2003, the result might make him look worse than he already does, but it wouldn't help the government prove that he perjured himself with his answers under oath to the grand jury.

DOJ_NMG_0109809

It was the samples and records from the 2003 testing that the government seized from Comprehensive Drug Testing of Long Beach, Calif., and Quest Diagnostics, Inc. of Las Vegas. The testing had been done under terms of the 2002 labor agreement between the owners and the players, and the results were supposed to remain anonymous.

But the authorities threw a clever, if questionable, one-two punch. They issued subpoenas to the two companies seeking test results of 11 players, presumably those who had testified before the Balco grand jury.

When the companies balked at supplying the requested information and indicated their intent to challenge the subpoenas in court, the government secured search warrants and raided Comprehensive and Quest.

They seized the urine samples in Long Beach and the list of codes assigned to players' names in Las Vegas. Put them together and the government would have the names of all of the players who tested positive. Federal agents did not take only the 11 results they sought. They had the results of all of the tests — more than 1,000 players. Included were 104 positive results, presumably all of the positives from the entire testing procedure.

The Players Association contended that, among other transgressions, the government violated the players' Fourth Amendment rights, their right to privacy.

Indeed, the dissenting judge in yesterday's decision, Sidney Thomas: began his dissent by writing, "One of the three extremely able district court judges who rejected the government's argument summarized it best, stating, 'What happened to the Fourth Amendment? Was it repealed somehow?' "

His two colleagues on the panel, Diarmuid O'Scannlain and Richard Tallman, did not suggest the Fourth Amendment had been repealed, but in the majority opinion Judge O'Scannlain wrote that the "district courts erred in finding callous disregard of Fourth Amendment rights."

Furthermore, he wrote, "The district court erred in finding the issuance of subpoenas and the contemporaneous execution of search warrants to be unreasonable."

And the district court "abused its discretion in granting the motion to quash" a subpoena.

But Judge Thomas adamantly disagreed. "In discussions of the alleged use of steroids by baseball players," he wrote in his lengthy dissent, "much is made about 'the integrity of the game.' Even more important is the integrity of our legal system.

"The district judges were entirely right. To order the government to return the thousands of private medical records it wrongfully seized by use of pretext and artifice."

The United States attorney for Northern California, Kevin Ryan, was naturally pleased with the outcome. He said in a statement that his office will review the opinion "to determine what the next investigative step may be."

The 2-1 decision wasn't like a baseball game that ends 2-1. In a 2-1 game, the losing team usually has a chance to score the tying run. The players had no chance of as tie in this legal game.

Nearly three years ago the union had the right under the steroids testing agreement to destroy all of the 2003 test results. Inexplicably the union lawyers didn't take that step. They have never explained why. Had they exercised their right then, they would not have to be fighting three or four years later over their players' Fourth Amendment rights.

Court: Investigators Can Keep Positive Test Results (WP)

By Amy Shipley

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

Federal investigators can keep the positive drug test results for more than 100 Major League Baseball players -- who have not been publicly identified -- that they seized during raids of baseball's testing laboratories two years ago, a federal appeals court in San Francisco ruled yesterday, overturning in part a lower court ruling.

The decision means additional major league players could get swept up in the probe into sports doping that began in 2003 when a raid of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative (BALCO) in Burlingame, Calif., yielded information that tied dozens of elite and professional athletes to steroids and other drugs.

San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds is already the subject of a perjury investigation in connection with the investigation, and the home of former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher Jason Grimsley was searched for drugs by BALCO investigators last summer after Grimsley admitted using human growth hormone and other drugs.

Lower courts had sided with the Major League Baseball Players Association, which cited privacy concerns in arguing that investigators were entitled only to the drug test results for 10 players with ties to the BALCO lab and should return the others.

The positive test results came during the 2003 season, when a program of confidential testing was undertaken jointly by Major League Baseball and the MLBPA to determine whether the sport had a problem with steroid abuse. No players who tested positive were identified, and none received penalties.

In a 100-plus page opinion, the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in San Francisco ruled investigators did not necessarily have to return information about other major league players that was found intermingled with computer data on the 10 players who were the subject of the search, and it also ruled that a subpoena for all of the positive drug test results from 2003 should not have been quashed by a lower court judge.

The opinion from Diarmuid F. O'Scannlain, Sidney R. Thomas, and Richard C. Tallman included a partial dissent from Thomas.

Elliot R. Peters, a San Francisco-based attorney for the players' association, could not immediately be reached for comment. A spokesman in the players' association's New York office said the agency would have no comment until today.

Feds Can Use Baseball Drug Test Names (USAT)

By Jorge L. Ortiz

USA Today, December 28, 2006

More than 100 Major League Baseball players can have their names and positive drug tests used by federal authorities in their ongoing steroid investigation as a result of a decision by a federal appeals court.

Wednesday's ruling, which overturned decisions by three lower courts, by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco could enhance the government's investigation into whether Barry Bonds committed perjury when he told a grand jury he never knowingly used steroids.

However, Bonds' lawyer said he's not concerned.

"If he had tested positive, boy, that would have leaked out already," Michael Rains said. "But they didn't bother to leak anything out because they knew it was negative."

The tests were conducted in 2003 as part of baseball's survey to determine whether to implement a stricter policy, which began in 2004 after more than 100 of the approximately 1,200 players had positive results.

Federal investigators raided testing labs in California and Nevada, seeking the results of 10 players — among them Bonds, Jason Giambi and Gary Sheffield— who were subpoenaed to testify in front of the grand jury probing BALCO.

Wednesday's ruling revealed eight of those players tested positive in 2003, though they were not identified.

The raid also produced information on all the tests, which were supposed to be kept confidential. The players association sued to have the records returned, arguing their seizure violated the players' Fourth Amendment rights.

The 9th Circuit Court disagreed in a 2-1 vote, leaving the union with no recourse other than requesting the full court review the case or taking it to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"We are pleased" with the ruling, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said in a statement. "We will continue to review the 125-page opinion to determine what the next investigative step may be."

The case is United States v. Comprehensive Drug Testing Inc., 05-10067.

Court Says Investigators May Use Baseball Players' Steroid Test Data (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, December 27, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. - In a legal development that could further fuel the ongoing perjury probe of San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds, a federal appeals court Wednesday ruled that federal investigators can use the names and urine samples of about 100 Major League Baseball players who tested positive for steroids three years ago.

A divided panel of the San Francisco-based 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected the privacy arguments of the players' union, raising the possibility the names of baseball players who tested positive for steroids in the league's 2003 anonymous testing program could become public as the government continues to probe the fallout from the Balco steroids case.

If the ruling holds up, it also could significantly impact a federal grand jury probe into whether Bonds committed perjury. Bonds has been the target of the perjury investigation since testifying more than two years ago in the Balco case that he never knowingly took steroids.

Bonds' lawyer, Michael Rains insisted Wednesday that his client is not one of the players who tested positive and therefore the ruling and the union's fight to keep the government from using the test results will have little bearing on the slugger's case. It isn't known if any of the test data seized involved Bonds' specimen.

"I don't think things change for Barry," Rains said. "They've had the test results since `04. If they had a positive test, they could have used it to obtain an indictment of Barry. I think the deal is they don't have a positive test of Barry from `03."

Federal investigators connected to the Balco case seized computer files in 2004 that contained the results of baseball's 2003 testing program, which was designed to evaluate the scope of steroid use in the sport. Because between 5 and 7 percent came back positive, a clause kicked in that made identified testing mandatory. The players' union and baseball owners had agreed to keep the results of the testing confidential.

The government originally sought the test results for 10 players linked to the Balco scandal, including Bonds, New York Yankees slugger Jason Giambi and former Yankees star Gary Sheffield, now with the Detroit Tigers. However, investigators seized the records on dozens of other players, triggering a major legal battle pitting government powers to search computer databases with sensitive medical information against the privacy rights of the players.

The players' association sued to block the government from using the information, and three federal judges sided with the players in separate cases in San Francisco, Los Angeles and Nevada. But the 9th Circuit overturned all three of those decisions in Wednesday's ruling, finding that the government's seizure of the test data was "lawful and reasonable."

In nearly 70 pages of dissent, 9th Circuit Judge Sidney Thomas warned that the ruling is a threat to the "privacy of medical records" that has "profound consequences" for the constitutional right against illegal search and seizure. The judge said the government seized the testing "through pretext and artifice."

"Much is made about the "integrity of the game," Thomas wrote of steroids in baseball. "Even more important is the integrity of our legal system."

The judge's dissent could be a signal the fight over the testing results is not over in the appeals court. The players' association can ask the 9th Circuit to reconsider the case with a 15-judge panel, and such sharp dissents are often an indication the court will entertain such a request.

Elliot Peters, the lawyer for the players' association, said they were still reviewing the decision, but are considering asking the court to reconsider the ruling with the larger panel of judges.

Meanwhile, San Francisco U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, whose office is heading the Balco investigation, issued a statement saying he was "pleased" the 9th Circuit upheld the government's seizures.

"We will continue to review the 125-page opinion to determine what the next investigative step may be," Ryan said.

If the government is permitted to use the test results, it could allow investigators to question players about their source for steroids. The investigation of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, a Burlingame sports nutrition center, already has produced guilty pleas from its president, Victor Conte, and others associated with the outfit.

Greg Anderson, Bonds' personal trainer who pleaded guilty in the Balco case, is back in prison for refusing to testify in the perjury probe targeting Bonds. Anderson was previously convicted of steroid distribution.

Bonds recently signed a $16 million deal to return to the Giants next season.

Baseball Players' Failed Steroid Tests May Be Examined (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, December 28, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — A divided appeals court panel has upheld the right of federal investigators to examine positive drug testing results for more than 100 professional baseball players as part of a probe of illegal steroid use by athletes.

The 9th Circuit Court of Appeals decision issued yesterday rejected the rulings of three district court judges who found that the government acted improperly when seeking and carrying out grand jury subpoenas and search warrants in 2004 against California and Nevada laboratories that handled players' drug tests.

"We are aware of no authority that the simultaneous pursuit of search warrants and subpoenas in aid of an ongoing grand jury investigation constitutes a violation of the Fourth Amendment," Judge Diarmuid O'Scannlain wrote in the appeals court opinion, which was joined by Judge Richard Tallman. "We see no evidence of bad faith or pretext here."

After the Major League Baseball Players' Association and one of the labs objected, the government limited its subpoenas to records pertaining to 11 players the government suspected of drug use. However, after seizing some of the labs' computer records, the government claimed the authority to pursue positive results it discovered for more than 100 athletes.

U.S. Can Keep Computer Records Seized In Baseball Steroid Probe (BLOOM)

By Joel Rosenblatt

Bloomberg, December 28, 2006

Dec. 27 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. prosecutors can keep computer records seized from Major League Baseball's drug testing administrator as part of an investigation into player use of illegal steroids, a federal appeals court ruled.

The U.S. Court of Appeals in San Francisco today held that lower courts were wrong to require government investigators to return files taken from the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative, a Burlingame, California, lab known as Balco.

The files sought by prosecutors were seized in 2004 while investigating 10 unidentified athletes during the Balco probe. The Major League Baseball Players Association fought the government's request for the documents, arguing the seizure violated the players' constitutional right against unreasonable searches and seizures.

``We conclude that the government's seizures were reasonable," a three-judge panel wrote in an opinion. Evidence gathered by investigators that isn't related to players named in search warrants must be returned, the panel ruled.

Elliot Peters, a lawyer for the players association, didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

Bonds' Attorney Downplays Significance Of Court Ruling (ESPN)

By Mike Fish, ESPN.com

ESPN, December 28, 2006

The attorney for Barry Bonds downplayed the significance of a court ruling Wednesday allowing federal investigators access to confidential Major League Baseball drug-testing data from the 2003 season, suggesting that the San Francisco Giants slugger was not among the 100 or so players who tested positive for performance-enhancing drugs.

"My belief is there is nothing about these drug tests that hurts Barry."

-- Michael Rains, Barry Bonds' attorney

"According to this opinion, you got 100-plus [players] who have tested positive," Michael Rains told ESPN.com on Wednesday night. "And I'm here to tell you I don't think Barry is one of them."

Asked to expound on his belief, the Concord, Calif.-based attorney said, "I have had certain sources that were close to the government who have told me the government is probably going to be frustrated with what they see as it relates to Barry.

"My belief is there is nothing about these drug tests that hurts Barry."

It had been widely speculated that the ruling from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco might dramatically strengthen the government's perjury case against Bonds if investigators linked his name to a positive 2003 test. Bonds has been the target of a perjury probe since testifying before a grand jury in 2004 that he didn't knowingly use illegal drugs.

Rains sidestepped whether Bonds himself ever confirmed he didn't test positive in 2003, saying only that he has not discussed the latest court ruling with the star player, who was traveling with his family.

However, Rains further stated that he thought Bonds already would have been indicted by a federal grand jury had evidence of a positive drug test surfaced. Rains said the government has been aware of Bonds' test data since an April 2004 raid by Internal Revenue Service agents of three labs involved in the MLB testing program.

"I'm sure if Barry would have failed the drug test that would have already been a matter of public record," said Rains, referencing the numerous leaks in the case.

At the time of the raids, federal investigators were seeking the 2003 test results of Bonds, then New York Yankees players Gary Sheffield and Jason Giambi and seven other players tied to the Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative investigation. Investigators seized computer files containing the test results of nearly 100 other players not named in the government's subpoena and warrants.

"They've had Barry's [test results] since April or May of '04," Rains said. "From what I can tell, the players' association has never kicked up a fuss over the right of the government to use the test results of Barry or any one of the others in the BALCO case. So, of course, one thought that immediately comes to mind is if the government has not been precluded from using Barry's test results for two years, and if the grand jury was asked last July to issue an indictment against Barry, why didn't they do it? I think the answer is that the government didn't have a test result that helped them.

"So the only issue now becomes what do they do with the other 100 or so players who tested positive? What I see them doing is contacting them and leaning on them, just like they did with the guy in the desert there, [former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher] Jason Grimsley."

The ruling Wednesday by the three-judge panel overturned lower court decisions that had sided with the confidentiality issues argued by the players' association and the drug testing labs. In his dissenting opinion, Judge Sidney R. Thomas wrote, "In discussions of the alleged use of steroids by baseball players, much is made about the 'integrity of the game.' Even more important is the integrity of our legal system. Perhaps baseball has become consumed by a game of shadows, but that is no reason for the government to engage in a 'prosecution of shadows.'"

In its ruling, the court provided that the names of the players who tested positive remain sealed. It is unlikely the seal will be lifted, though the vast majority of athletes linked to the BALCO scandal ultimately were leaked.

The players' association, which sued to keep the government from accessing the records, has not decided whether to appeal the ruling. At the time, the players and owners had agreed to the 2003 as part of an MLB survey to gauge the prevalence of steroid use in the sport.

"I hope they will," Rains said when asked about a possible appeal. "For Barry, at this point, it is probably of no great issue. But for Barry and every other major league player, I think this is an outrage. It means that any contract they ever negotiate with the MLB is useless. It has no teeth. It has no meaning. And the government can willy-nilly do what it wants to undermine agreements made between a great institution and its union. It is crazy if the players union does not appeal it."

Federal Judge Rules Against Church Founders Over Marijuana Use (AP)

AP, December 28, 2006

TUCSON - A federal judge has ruled against the founders of an Arizona church that deifies marijuana and uses it as a sacrament.

U.S. District Judge Judith C. Herrera in Albuquerque, N.M., refused to dismiss charges against Dan and Mary Quaintance, saying they don't have a "sincere" religious belief.

Herrera said that evidence indicates the pair "adopted their religious' belief in cannabis as a sacrament and deity in order to justify their lifestyle choice to use marijuana."

Herrera's order means the government's criminal case against the Quaintances will proceed in the new year.

The couple is scheduled to go to trial on Jan. 16 on criminal charges of possessing more than 100 pounds of marijuana, as well as conspiracy charges.

"She doesn't fully understand our doctrine," Dan Quaintance said Tuesday of Herrera's Dec. 22 decision. "This is very upsetting to the members of our church. It was quite a holiday present."

The Quaintances face up to 40 years each in prison if they are convicted as charged. They expect to appeal the decision.

The couple was arrested with 172 pounds of marijuana on Feb. 22 in Lordsburg, N.M., just seven days before the U.S. Supreme Court ruled unanimously that a small religious group based in Santa Fe that combines Christianity and American Indian practices could use hallucinogenic tea in its ceremonies.

The tea, called hoasca, contains dimethyltryptamine, or DMT, known for its hallucinogenic properties.

The pair say they founded their Church of Cognizance in Pima, Ariz. - about 90 miles northeast of Tucson - in 1991.

Dan Quaintance, 54, said the church has 40 to 50 members in Arizona. He and Mary Quaintance, 51, stepped down as leaders of the church following their arrests.

Cocaine Ring 'supplier' Sentenced (CTPOST)

By Daniel Tepfer

Connecticut Post, December 28, 2006

BRIDGEPORT — A city man, who police said was supplying drugs to dealers in the greater New Haven area, was sentenced Wednesday to eight years in prison.

Johnny Rolon, 31, of Sherman Street, pleaded guilty to possession of narcotics with intent to sell and criminal possession of a weapon.

He was sentenced by Superior Court Judge Patrick Carroll III to 15 years, suspended after he serves eight years and followed by five years probation.

"This disposition was the culmination of a wide-ranging investigation involving federal and local law enforcement," said Assistant State's Attorney Charles Stango. "And it would not have been possible without the successes of Project Safe Neighborhoods."

According to police, in March agents of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration infiltrated a cocaine distribution ring operating in the greater New Haven area. That led to several arrests of drug dealers.

Police said they subsequently learned that Rolon was supplying the ring with cocaine.

In May, a task force of federal and local law enforcement officers raided Rolon's Sherman Street home. Police said they seized under an ounce of cocaine, drug processing equipment, $12,000 in cash and a .22-caliber rifle.

L.I. Gambling And Drug Rings Are Broken Up, Authorities Say (NYT)

By Nicole Cotroneo

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

HAUPPAUGE, N.Y., Dec. 27 — A sophisticated Long Island gambling ring that took in $8.6 million a year was broken up with the arrest of 14 people, the Suffolk County district attorney said on Wednesday.

The district attorney, Thomas J. Spota, said that the 14-month investigation also uncovered lucrative marijuana and fireworks smuggling rackets that were run by the chief bookmaker, Salvatore Gerrato, 45, of Seaford. In addition, three people were charged in the drug case.

“Surveillance of phone and computer communications established that the gambling ring took in an average of $165,000 a week in bets,” Mr. Spota said. He added that the operation, which involved betting on professional and college sports, had a wire room in Costa Rica. Mr. Spota said that a 59-year-old accountant, Stephen Tarnofsky of Merrick, was the leader of the wire room.

The gambling case eventually led investigators to the marijuana and fireworks operations. According to the authorities, Mr. Gerrato oversaw the smuggling of fireworks from Maryland and marijuana from California, and these were distributed throughout the New York metropolitan region.

In May, the Suffolk Highway Patrol seized nine tons of illegal fireworks from a vehicle returning from Maryland, according to Mr. Spota.

The authorities also confiscated more than $300,000 in cash from a recreational vehicle that the smugglers planned to use to buy 100 pounds of marijuana in California, Mr. Spota said. He added that on a typical cross-country run, the smugglers could stash the vehicle with enough marijuana to yield $1 million to $1.5 million in street sales.

In raids on Dec. 14, investigators seized $1 million in cash, including $600,000 from Mr. Tarnofsky's home, Mr. Spota said. Of the 17 people arrested, 14 have been charged with promoting gambling in the first degree, including Mr. Tarnofsky, Mr. Gerrato and Frank Lonigro, 33, of Hauppauge. Three others were charged with fourth-degree conspiracy to possess marijuana. Both charges are felonies and carry a maximum prison sentence of four years, the district attorney's office said.

Mr. Gerrato was previously convicted of promoting gambling and, in 2001, was sentenced to five years' probation, Mr. Spota said.

Detectives were still looking for Andrew Petrone, 34, of Freeport, a lawyer who, according to the authorities, participated in the marijuana operation. He was arrested in June for possession of a controlled substance in an unrelated case, Mr. Spota said. He pleaded guilty and was scheduled for sentencing next month.

All the defendants were released on desk appearance tickets, and were scheduled to appear before a judge in March, the authorities said.

Mr. Spota added that the investigation was not over. "I am sure it's a much larger operation," he said.

Gambling Ring Probe Uncovering Other Illegal Activity (NSDY)

By Alfonso A. Castillo, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, December 28, 2006

Suffolk District Attorney Thomas Spota stood Thursday before a table covered with more than $1 million in neat stacks of hundreds and several large bags of marijuana, and said that the seized loot may be just a hint of "three major criminal enterprises" uncovered by Suffolk investigators.

Spota announced the results of a yearlong investigation that began as a sports gambling sting, but grew to uncover multimillion-dollar marijuana and illegal fireworks trafficking rings operating in Nassau, Suffolk and Queens.

Police arrested 17 suspects on assorted gambling and conspiracy charges, and continue to search for one more -- a Freeport attorney charged with helping run "hundreds of pounds" of pot from California to Long Island.

All 17 suspects were given desk appearance tickets and ordered to return to court in March. Among those arrested were Salvatore Gerrato, 45, of 2337 Hampton Ave., Seaford, who authorities said ran all three rings; Frank Lonigro, 33, of 745 Terry Rd. in Hauppauge, who helped run the marijuana and gambling operations, and accountant Stephen Tarnofsky, 59, who Spota said earned $6,000 a week running a Costa Rican wire room for the gambling ring.

All suspects face a maximum of 1 1/3 to 4 years in prison if convicted. Calls to all three men were not returned Thursday.

Spota said prosecutors will convene a special grand jury "to conduct a much more extensive investigation" and likely bring more serious charges. Spota said 30 search warrants uncovered computer and paper records indicating that the criminal operations go far deeper than investigators knew.

Spota said nine tons of illegal fireworks, transported from Maryland to Long Island, were seized in May, and that the gambling ring alone took in an average of $165,000 a week in bets. During one trip, the marijuana traffickers were found on their way to California with $300,000 cash in a Winnebago recreational vehicle -- much of it in a hidden "trap" compartment.

The owner of the vehicle, Jeffrey Ackerman, 43, of 9 Trapper Lane, Levittown, was charged with conspiracy. His attorney, Edward Burke Jr. of Sag Harbor, declined to comment.

Spota said during each trip, the suspects returned with marijuana worth $1 million to $1.5 million on the street.

Gesturing to the seized money before him, Spota said, "If it's a million dollars, than you can rest assured it's many, many, many million dollars."

Investigators used phone and electronic surveillance, including a first-of-a-kind in Suffolk computer wire tap to collect data from suspects' computers that uncovered "details that we've never seen before" on a sports betting operation.

One suspect in the marijuana ring remains at large -- attorney Andrew Petrone, 34, of 725 Miller Ave., Freeport. Authorities said Petrone has already pleaded guilty, but skipped his sentencing on drug possession charges after being stopped in June 2005 with 300 Vicodin prescription pills and $54,000 in cash.

Petrone could not be reached for comment. "We will get him," Spota said.

17 Accused In NY Gambling, Drug Rings (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- Police investigating a lucrative bookmaking operation came across a related drug smuggling ring and busted both, arresting 17 and seizing $1 million, authorities said Wednesday.

Thirteen men and a woman were arrested on gambling charges, while three men were arrested on charges of conspiracy to possess marijuana, Suffolk County District Attorney Thomas Spota said.

"Surveillance ... established that the gambling ring took in an average of $165,000 a week in bets," Spota said.

The bookmaking operation focused on professional and collegiate sports and involved electronic transfers to Costa Rica, generating $8.6 million a year, he said.

While investigators were conducting surveillance on the gambling probe they discovered two of the bookmakers were also involved in transporting marijuana from California to Long Island, authorities said. Four men were trying to buy 100 pounds of pot for $300,000 in California when the plot was thwarted, investigators said.

Police started making arrests last month. All have been released and are scheduled to be arraigned in March.

One more man, an attorney, has eluded arrest on a conspiracy charge and was being sought, prosecutors said. More arrests are expected.

Feds Say Internet Drug Ring Shut Down (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, December 28, 2006

Federal agents say they have shut down an Internet pharmacy operation and arrested four people who allegedly sold millions of dollars of illegally prescribed drugs to customers across the nation.

Drug Enforcement Administration agents are still seeking four doctors from Puerto Rico who allegedly wrote the prescriptions based on Internet health questionnaires, DEA spokeswoman Erin Mulvey said Wednesday. The agency also continues to investigate other websites that might be associated with drug operation, she said.

Antonio Quinones, 46, and three associates were arrested Dec. 21 in the Miami area and charged with drug dealing, money laundering and tax fraud, according to an indictment filed in U.S. District Court in New York.

Quinones, arrested at his Miami Beach penthouse, and his associates ran 10 websites, Mulvey said. Customers could answer a few questions about their health and then order such drugs as Vicodin and amphetamines, she said.

The doctors being sought by authorities reviewed the forms and ordered the prescriptions, Mulvey said. The sites, in operation for at least three years, did about $50,000 a day in business, she said. Such prescriptions violate laws that require a physician to meet with a patient to determine whether there is a legitimate medical need before prescribing a controlled drug.

A message left at Quinones' Miami Beach home was not returned. Agents seized $817,000 from him, along with a 54-foot boat, a Ferrari and two guns. Prosecutors are seeking $42.6 million they say was laundered through various bank accounts, the indictment says.

"They had customers all over the United States, millions of orders," Mulvey said.

The indictment alleges Quinones and his associates operated businesses under several names, including The Doctor's Online, Inc., Health Rx Marketing and Brothers Pharmacy, Inc. Agents earlier closed two pharmacies in Georgia and one in Maryland that allegedly supplied the ring, Mulvey said.

Carlsbad Man Indicted On Federal Drug Charges (CARLCA)

By Dawn Bowen

Carlsbad (NM) Current-Argus, December 28, 2006

CARLSBAD — A grand jury has indicted Ricky Green of Carlsbad on federal drug and firearm charges stemming from the seizure of illegal drugs and a gun at his home on Townsend Road in August.

Green, 45, also known as Ricky Barksdale, was arrested during the early morning hours of Aug. 31, when agents of the Pecos Valley Drug Task Force served a search warrant at his home in the 4300 block of Townsend Road.

On Dec. 21, a federal grand jury indicted him on three charges possession of crack cocaine with intent to distribute, possession of methamphetamine with intent to distribute and possession of a firearm in the furtherance of a drug trafficking crime.

Green was originally charged in state court, but those charges were dismissed after authorities sought federal charges against him, hoping for a more severe, longer sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0109816

"We pushed for the indictment because he has a long history of selling narcotics and we wanted a stiffer penalty on the drug crimes," Commander David Edmondson of the Pecos Valley Drug Task Force said on Wednesday.

Edmondson said pursuing federal charges was the only way to ensure a stiffer penalty. He said because Green has at least three prior drug crime convictions he is eligible for a life sentence through the federal court system.

Green was released into the custody of U.S. Marshals on Oct. 10 at the Eddy County Detention Center, where he had been held in lieu of a $1 million cash bond since his arrest in August.

Green's arrest came after a three-month investigation into the trafficking of a variety of illegal drugs in the area, according to task force agents.

"He was distributing crack cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana in the Carlsbad area," Edmondson said.

According to documents filed in state court, agents seized a loaded Beretta 9mm semi-automatic pistol, 60.58 grams of crack cocaine, 18.8 grams of methamphetamine, .43 grams of heroin, 109.19 grams of marijuana, and $4,569 in cash from his home while executing the search warrant. They also found digital scales, spoons with cocaine residue on them, and a plastic bag containing numerous unused bindle bags consistent with those commonly used by drug traffickers.

Authorities have said that Green was involved in violent acts against people for drug debts in the months leading up to the arrest.

'Here We Are Prisoners' (SANBS)

By Sara A. Carter, Staff Writer

San Bernardino Sun, December 28, 2006

NUEVO LAREDO, Mexico - The gunfire was deafening. Street corners all over the city were darkened by smoke from grenades and light artillery.

The dead lay in pools of blood flowing into the gutters that drain into the Rio Grande.

Men with automatic assault rifles stood stoic after the carnage. Then, one by one, they picked up the bodies of their victims, threw them into the back of pickup trucks and headed out of downtown.

Bystanders hid inside shops, behind trash bins - wherever they could find refuge from the explosive showdown between members of rival drug cartels.

"(I watched as) the men threw the bodies into the back of the trucks and SUVs," whispered Manuel, who was working at a parking garage that day. "This city is controlled from the inside out by the cartels. ... They are killing anyone who gets in their way."

The April street violence, witnessed by several residents interviewed by The Sun's sister newspaper, the Inland Valley Daily Bulletin of Ontario, was but one recent example of how Mexico's cartels are fighting each other over the four major U.S. highway systems that provide transit routes into the United States.

Street violence has become a way of life for the nearly 380,000 residents of Mexico's most violent border city. According to law-enforcement officials in Mexico and U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration officials, more than 500 people were assassinated in Nuevo Laredo in 2005. Official estimates, in news reports, put the 2005 death toll at 186.

This year, there have been nearly 500 assassinations, and the death toll continues to rise. Many of the dead either belonged to the cartels or were innocent victims of the carnage.

The violence has also changed the lives of American citizens living in Laredo, on the Texas side of the border, where kidnappings, narcotics trafficking and corruption have become common.

Laredo Police Officer James Boyd, who used to travel to Nuevo Laredo on archaeological projects, is now terrified to enter the city.

This year on a trip into Nuevo Laredo, he said he was chased by four SUVs and his car shot at several times by cartel members.

"People should know that the border has been taken hostage by the cartels," Boyd said. "So many officials try to cover up what's going on. Why? I guess they don't want the public to know the truth."

The truth is tied up in trucks, trade and transcontinental smuggling.

The World Trade Bridge between Nuevo Laredo and its sister city, Laredo, as well as Interstate 35 and highways 59, 359 and 83, are like veins feeding the Mexican syndicates, running from south Texas to as far north as Canada.

For Mexico's most powerful drug lords, controlling the routes and protecting the cargo sent along them - drugs, weapons and people - is worth the cost in lives.

DOJ_NMG_0109817

It's also reason to focus U.S. border patrol efforts sharply on Nuevo Laredo, say law-enforcement officials, since the city is the largest inland port from Mexico into the United States and is a major point of origin for truck traffic into the U.S.

"Those who control Nuevo Laredo control the U.S. highways and the flow of narcotics into the United States," said Sheriff Rick Flores, whose Webb County territory runs along the Texas-Mexico border.

"This city is an open gateway for narcotics and terrorists," Flores said. "If the price is right, anyone - and I mean anyone - can move weapons of mass destruction, people and drugs into the United States."

Not one local Mexican or U.S. newspaper reported the April street violence. Reporters don't go into Nuevo Laredo's streets often, and when they do, they don't report on the cartels.

Not one Nuevo Laredo municipal police officer ever appeared at the scene, either.

It was as if the bloodbath never happened.

Cartel culture

Comandante Enrique Sanchez of the Nuevo Laredo Police Department said he couldn't recall the April shootings, although he compared the violence in Nuevo Laredo to that in Iraq.

His department has been plagued by trouble. President Vicente Fox's administration has described the city's police as corrupt, and residents said many police officers work for the Gulf Cartel, one of Mexico's most powerful narcotics-trafficking organizations.

"You never know when the bullets are going to come flying," Sanchez said during a recent tour of the city by pickup. His men, officers Roberto Zepeda, 23, and Jose Santos, 28, stood in the bed of the police vehicle, AR-15 rifles pointed toward the streets. "You never know when you're going to die."

The dead are often forgotten. The cartels dispose of bodies on the outskirts of the city in vats of acid, mutilate them in factory machines, feed them to animals or set them ablaze in gas containers until all evidence of their existence is gone.

Not one of the city's nearly 400 official murders since January 2005 has been solved.

"The attention that the assassinations have brought to the cartels has caused them to change their tactics," said Nacho, a resident who sometimes assists U.S. law enforcement with information. "The bodies are destroyed before people even realize someone's missing."

Although Colombian cartels control most of the world's production of cocaine and heroin, the most profitable part of the trade - transport to the U.S. - happens in Mexico, said Jorge Chabat, a drug expert at the Center for Economic Research and Teaching in Mexico City.

Distribution of narcotics has come under the control of various Mexican cartels, Chabat said, including Osiel Cardenas' Gulf Cartel; Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman's Sinaloa Cartel; Francisco Javier Arellano Felix's organization in Tijuana; and the Juarez Cartel, said to be led by Vicente Carrillo.

A woman who asked to be called only Lupita for her protection, and who grew up with family members of several of the city's original narcotics organizations, remembers them all.

Lupita, who works with law enforcement, also remembers a time when Nuevo Laredo was at peace, and recalled the moment everything changed.

More than 10 years ago, the city was mainly controlled by two narcotics organizations, Flores Soto and Los Chachos, Lupita said. Mario Flores Soto, the leader of Flores Soto, joined forces with the Gulf Cartel to expand his revenue and power. The Gulf Cartel wanted control of Laredo's highway systems. Flores Soto shared the city's transit routes with the cartel, pulling narcotics revenue away from Dionicio "El Chacho" Ramon Garcia, the leader of Los Chachos.

Los Chachos members were enraged, Lupita said, and kidnapped and killed Mario Flores Soto's youngest brother, Roy, and 10 of his associates.

In retaliation for the kidnappings and murders, the Gulf Cartel's paramilitary arm, Los Zetas - a group of more than 30 special-operations soldiers, deserters from the Mexican military - assassinated many of the key members of Los Chachos. It wasn't long before the surviving members of the Chachos wanted revenge, Lupita said.

"They took Dionicio, the leader, murdered him and left him in women's underwear for everyone to see," she said.

El Chacho, who was assassinated in May 2002, was on his way back from Monterrey, a city reportedly under the control of the Sinaloa Cartel, another of Mexico's most powerful narcotics organizations.

"The violence kept growing, and the methods for killing just keep getting worse," Lupita said.

Osiel Cardenas, the leader of the Gulf Cartel, was arrested on March 14, 2003, in Matamoros, Mexico. Since then, Los Zetas has been running the organization, according to sources interviewed by the Daily Bulletin.

The Sinaloa Cartel is attempting to take control of the Gulf Cartel away from Los Zetas, and is said to have the backing of many politicians and federal law-enforcement officials within Mexico.

DOJ_NMG_0109818

"The reason the government never intervened (to stop the violence) is because many of the government officials from Mexico City to Nuevo Laredo are in the pocket of the cartels," Lupita said.

"Once the killing began, it never stopped. The hatred between the narcos grew stronger and stronger."

`This used to be a good place'

Nacho, whose last name is being withheld for his safety, has lived in Nuevo Laredo most of his adult life. He is a father, husband and one of the few people willing to share the dark secrets of his city.

Although he has family in the United States, he refuses to cross the border illegally to escape the danger.

"I have applied for a visa," he said. "My family already lives in fear. We don't want to escape to live illegally as fugitives.

"People need to know the truth (about Nuevo Laredo)," he continued. "This used to be a good place. Now it is a danger to anyone who enters."

Nacho parked his car near a town square. It was once a lovers' walkway where he courted his wife. Now, only a handful of people frequent its winding sidewalks or sit on its iron benches.

"I remember it being so crowded with people, and the fresh fruit, taquitos and ice-cream vendors," Nacho recalled.

When the violence in Nuevo Laredo reached a peak in June, the Fox administration began Operation Secure Mexico, sending in Mexican military and other federal law-enforcement agencies.

"There are very clear signs of a relationship between elements of the Nuevo Laredo police and drug smuggling, hence the decisive action," government spokesman Ruben Aguilar told journalists in June.

But by the end of July, the streets were empty of military.

Comandante Sanchez chuckled when asked what happened to the Mexican military who were supposed to be protecting the city.

"That's a good question," he said, a sardonic smile creasing his face. "Where are they?"

Sanchez explained that most of the troops were as afraid for their lives as Nuevo Laredo's police and citizens. Some simply left and didn't return. Others, already in the pockets of the cartels, made an early show of enforcement, then disappeared.

Nacho said the Mexican government sent the military to appease the U.S. government, "then pulled them out of the city just as fast."

While he was speaking, a man in shabby clothes stood in the middle of the street, watching Nacho's car. A Nextel phone hung from the man's waistband.

"All over the city, there are halcones or ventanas (falcons or windows)," Nacho said. "They are the eyes and the ears of the cartels."

The man directed Nacho's car into an empty parking space.

"Never forget to tip," Nacho said as he handed a peseta to the man. "Never forget that everybody, no matter how nice they are or what they look like, could be working for the cartels.

`Nothing has changed'

"Silver or lead," said the middle- aged, white-haired man as he sipped a martini at a hotel bar in Laredo. "That's the code in Mexico. Either you pay up or you're killed."

James Kuykendall Sr., a former special agent with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration who now runs his own business in the city, knows Mexico well.

His friend and DEA partner, Enrique "Kiki" Camarena, was kidnapped, tortured and murdered by the drug cartels in 1985 while working undercover in Guadalajara. His death brought national attention to the Mexican drug war and the corruption that plagued the Mexican government.

Kuykendall's book, "O Plata O Plomo," ("Silver or Lead") published last year, focused on the events surrounding Camarena's death and how the Mexican government failed to cooperate with the DEA in the investigation.

"Nothing has changed in Mexico. If anything, it's worse," Kuykendall said.

"Kiki died a hero. He gave his life for his country. The tragedy is that the U.S. government gave up on the war on drugs decades ago. They choose to ignore the corruption that is deeply embedded in the Mexican government."

The arrests of some of Mexico's most notorious drug traffickers - the recent capture of reputed drug kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Felix being one example - are just the tip of the iceberg when it comes to cooperation, Kuykendall added.

"Every once in a while, Mexico throws us a bone," he said. "It gives the appearance of cooperation. It's a way of making everything look like it's OK. Well, it's not."

Bazookas, bullets

Nacho ran his palm over a wall in a home that had been blasted by a bazooka. Bullet holes riddled the interior of the house.

The cartels don't just use guns, he said. They have grenades, bombs and a variety of other weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0109819

"This house was rented by a group of assassins with the Sinaloa Cartel," Nacho said. The assassins were sent to the city to kill members of Los Zetas, he added.

Old mattresses, cigarette boxes and empty beer bottles were the only traces of the gunmen's presence. A brick fence running alongside the house had been blown apart with such force that the bricks were nothing but crumbled dust.

"Sometimes I just can't believe what's happened to this city," Nacho said.

Around the corner from the home, an image of Our Lady of Guadalupe, Mexico's patron saint, loomed over the neighborhood. Fresh flowers and candles stood at the base of a portrait painted on the brick wall.

"She will bring us peace," said a young girl, smiling as she walked past Nacho.

Just a few yards away, a group of young men with Nextel phones made it clear Nacho was in the wrong part of town. They only had to look at him.

"We better go," he said. "It's not good to stand around here for too long. There are many good people in this city, but you never know."

`We are prisoners'

Hector cut some cilantro and dropped it into a small bowl. He is the only vendor left at a small placita near the center of town, and his 10-year-old business is barely surviving the violence.

"I remember when I couldn't keep up with the tourists," he said as he put freshly cooked carnitas into a tortilla. The smell of cilantro, onions and pork filled the air.

"I used to have a lot of competition. Now I'm the only one left at the square, and I make less than half of what I used to make."

Nuevo Laredo once was noted for its tourism, colorful street vendors and booming border economy. But the drug violence has made this city of 400,000 a wasteland of lost businesses and lost lives.

More than 100 businesses have moved from Nuevo Laredo to Laredo over the past three years. And while its Texas sister is reaping the rewards of the World Trade Bridge and a growing economy, Nuevo Laredo residents are struggling to make ends meet.

Roll-down security shutters cover the large display windows of shops in the artisan district near the border. Dental offices and pharmacies that once thrived off American consumers have closed because the violence is keeping those customers away. For Sale and For Rent signs posted on the closed doors are pointed reminders of what the city has become.

"In Laredo, life is different," Hector said. "Here we are prisoners. In our city, we learn to live with the devil."CARTEL KINGS

Francisco Javier Arellano Felix: Was considered one of Mexico's most dangerous cartel leaders until he was captured off the coast of Baja California on Aug. 16, while on a fishing excursion. The Arellano-Felix family, which is extensive, is said to still control billions of dollars in cocaine, heroin and marijuana shipments to the United States.

Dionicio Ramon Garcia: Known as "El Chacho," Ramon Garcia was the leader of Los Chachos of Nuevo Laredo. He aligned himself with the Sinaloa Cartel, then was tortured and murdered by Sinaloa's rival, the Gulf Cartel, in May 2002. The Gulf Cartel dressed his dead body in women's undergarments to humiliate his family and the group.

Joaquin Guzman: Known as "El Chapo," he is considered one of Mexico's most powerful cartel leaders. Guzman heads the Sinaloa Cartel, which has been in a fierce battle with the Gulf Cartel for control of the Nuevo Laredo border. His organization has expanded and developed alliances with other drug lords across Mexico. Those alliances are known as the "Federation" or "Golden Triangle." Guzman is believed to have the support of corrupt Mexican government officials.

Vicente Carrillo Fuentes: Head of the Juarez Cartel, and the right-hand man to Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman of the Sinaloa Cartel. He is wanted for murder, money laundering, narcotics trafficking and a slew of other crimes. The U.S. State Department is offering a

$5 million reward for information leading to his arrest and conviction.

Osiel Cardenas Guillen: Leader of the Gulf Cartel, otherwise known as the Cardenas-Guillen family, which controls most of the Mexico-Texas border. The cartel is based in Nuevo Laredo. Cardenas Guillen was arrested on March 14, 2003. According to DEA intelligence officials, he continues to run his operation from his cell at the maximum-security Las Palmas prison outside Mexico City.

Arturo Martinez: "El Tejas" operates out of Nuevo Laredo. His cartel, Los Tejas, banded with the Gulf Cartel and forced his former partner, Dionicio "El Chacho" Garcia to align with Sinaloa. Martinez still controls large areas of Nuevo Laredo.

Gregorio Sauceda Gamboa: Part of the Gulf Cartel. Sauceda, known as "El Goyo," controls most of the Mexican border areas of Reynosa and Matamoros. Gamboa married into the Cardenas family. According to intelligence officials, a rift developed between him and Cardenas over his drug use and alcoholism. This month, he was demoted from deputy in the cartel.

Armando Valencia: Valencia, whose cartel is known as Los Valencias, was captured in 2003 in Mexico. Los Valencias still has strong ties to Colombian cocaine traffickers, and the organization has remained strong after aligning with the Sinaloa Cartel.

The cartel uses the port of Lazaro Cardenas to move cocaine and other narcotics into Mexico. Members of the organization also are suspected of selling narcotics in the United States.

Ismael "El Mayo" Zambada: El Mayo's organization is based out of the resort city of Mazatlan, but has substantial control of the Mexican border state of Sonora. El Mayo is considered a powerful cartel leader, and his alliance with "El Chapo" Guzman has extended their power all along the U.S.-Mexico border. In 2003, his organization was a target of a U.S.-Mexico drug sting, Operation Trifecta, which lasted 19 months and led to 240 arrests. "El Mayo" was never found and is a fugitive wanted by both countries.BY THE NUMBERS

Mexican Journalists Caught In The Crossfire Of City's Drug-cartel Wars (SANBS)

By Sara A. Carter, Staff Writer

San Bernardino Sun, December 28, 2006

NUEVO LAREDO, Mexico - A bulletproof barrier covers the front entrance of El Manana, one of the largest newspapers in the state of Tamaulipas, Mexico.

El Manana employees put up the barrier after three masked gunmen with grenades and assault rifles burst into the newspaper's reception area Feb. 6 and started shooting. As they fired, they shouted angrily against the paper's investigations into the growing violence and drug wars in Nuevo Laredo.

The day before, the newspaper had published the photo of a Federal Preventive Police agent injured in a gunbattle a few days earlier. The paper linked the federal agent to the Sinaloa Cartel, the main rival of the Gulf Cartel. The Gulf Cartel controls narcotics traffic along the U.S.-Mexico border in Nuevo Laredo.

Because the attack happened late in the evening, only a handful of employees were in the office. One of them was the paper's veteran crime reporter, Jaime Orozco Tey, 41.

According to sources close to the incident, Orozco Tey was dedicated to his job and fought hard to expose the growing violence in the city.

He had written numerous articles on the cartels and walked a thin line even inside his own paper, where some editors and journalists are believed to work as spies for the Gulf Cartel's military arm, Los Zetas.

The gunmen shot Orozco Tey several times in the back and abdomen. He was paralyzed. Another employee was killed.

The assassins disappeared as quickly as they came. After tossing a grenade into the building, the men jumped into waiting SUVs and sped away.

The message was clear, said employees of the paper: Don't investigate or report on the narco-wars anymore.

"If anyone knew I was talking to a reporter, they'd kill me," said an El Manana employee several months after the attack.

The employee, who spoke on condition of anonymity, pointed to two men standing by the barrier outside the front door, smoking and chatting. "They spy on everyone inside the newspaper, and almost everyone knows they get money from Los Zetas to do it," the worker said.

More than 400 journalists have been killed in Latin America over the past four decades. Since 1992, 13 journalists have been murdered in Mexico in connection with narcotics reporting, according to the U.S.-based nonprofit Committee to Protect Journalists, which offers detailed accounts of journalists killed around the globe.

"Journalists are front-line victims of the social crisis in Latin America, where official corruption, drug trafficking, unrestrained criminality, social violence and a background of political instability has made an impact in many countries," stated Gregorio Salazar, Latin American regional coordinator for the International Federation of Journalists.

Because of the growing violence in Nuevo Laredo, the Mexican federal government sent soldiers and federal and state police into the city in March 2005. In June 2005, President Vicente Fox's administration began Operation Safe Mexico, which targeted the cartels. But it couldn't stop the growing violence and ultimately was a failure, said residents interviewed by The Sun's sister newspaper, the Inland Valley Daily Bulletin of Ontario. A little more than a month after arriving, the federal soldiers were gone.

The government announced a new operation - Northern Border - in mid-March 2006. Under the program, 600 to 800 Federal Protective Police officers were deployed to Nuevo Laredo, according to the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy.

In a July interview, a Mexican police official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said many of the agents under the Northern Border initiative have either left the city or are working for the cartels.

Shortly after the new initiative, assassins gunned down four federal agents working for the intelligence unit of the Federal Protective Police. The agents had been conducting surveillance of an office building where Federal Investigative agents, similar to FBI agents, were stationed. Residents said municipal police passed through the area just minutes before a group of gunmen in SUVs opened fire on the agents.

"I don't like to remember that day," said a witness who works on Guerrero Street, where the killings occurred. "Children were still in school down the street, and the gunfire seemed to go on forever. In the end, the men were dead and the killers were gone."

Orozco Tey couldn't write that story.

He is paralyzed after suffering spinal-cord damage in the February attack. His location and that of his family are well guarded from those who still may want revenge, said a source close to the family.

"He should've died that evening," the source said. "He is a great journalist, father and husband. He was courageous and searched for the truth. But no one has ever been brought to justice - and I don't think anyone ever will."

Other Nuevo Laredo journalists who became casualties of the drug war include:

On March 10, Ramiro Tellez Contreras, a local radio reporter and police station switchboard operator, was murdered as he was leaving his home on the north side of the city. He was shot by gunmen in the early morning. Tellez worked for radio station Exa 95.7 FM. According to those who knew him, he had recently received threats.

In April 2005, radio journalist Guadalupe Garcia Escamilla was shot at least nine times outside her office and died a week later.

According to several sources inside the city, the cartels have blackmailed, threatened, killed and forced reporters to slant stories to the benefit of the drug kingpins.

"What people don't realize was that Guadalupe was under the control of the cartels as well," said a source with ties to El Manana. "She was spouting propaganda for the rival cartel. It was a planned attack to shut her up. They had already warned her with death threats in the past."

On March 14, 2004, Roberto Javier Mora Garcia, El Manana's editorial director, was stabbed more than 25 times in front of his home. Residents found him lying dead next to his car early that morning.

"I feel sick when I think about what has happened to my colleagues," said one source. "You never know if you're going to come home alive."

IMMIGRATION:

Arrests Of Illegal Migrants Drops Sharply Since U.S. National Guard Troops Sent To Border (FINDLAW/AP)

By Olga R. Rodriguez, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

(AP) - NOGALES, Mexico-Arrests of illegal migrants along the U.S.-Mexico border have dropped by more than a third since U.S. National Guard troops started helping with border security, hinting at a drop in attempted crossings, the U.S. Border Patrol said Tuesday.

U.S. Border Patrol agents arrested 149,238 fewer people from the start of July through November, down 34 percent from the same period last year, according to monthly figures provided by U.S. Border Patrol spokesman Mario Martinez.

Arrests also had dropped by 9 percent for the same period from 2004 to 2005. If the downward trend continues, it would be the first sustained decrease in illegal immigrant arrests since shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Border Patrol officials usually attribute a drop in arrests to fewer people crossing.

"We have seen some tangible results," Martinez said. "But we'll have to see over the next few months if it holds up. We are optimistic but we can't make a full analysis (yet)."

National Guard troops started arriving along the border June 15, and 6,000 were in place by August.

The troops are not allowed to detain migrants and have been limited to keeping a watch on surveillance cameras and body heat detectors, but they have freed Border Patrol agents and "have helped us tremendously to detect illegal migration traffic," Martinez said.

Victor Clark, a Mexican migration expert in Tijuana, says many migrants fear they will confront U.S. soldiers on the border.

"The presence of the National Guard has had a big impact on migrants," he told The Associated Press on Tuesday.

And border security is only going to get tougher. The United States plans to expand the Border Patrol from just over 11,000 agents to about 18,000 by 2008. The U.S. also plans to build 700 miles (1,126 kilometers) of additional border fence.

Other measures may also be deterring crossers.

In July, U.S. and Mexican officials started working together to prosecute human smugglers on both sides of the border.

U.S. immigration officials also have been raiding U.S. companies for illegal workers. Earlier this month, 1,300 people were detained in a sweep of meatpacking plants in six states.

DOJ_NMG_0109822

Added to that, smugglers have increased their fees, charging as much as US$3,000 (â‚¬2,270) to hide migrants in their cars and drive them across the border. Before the National Guard troops arrived, the price was about US$2,000 (â‚¬1,500), migrant activists say.

Still, border experts say the downturn may be temporary while smugglers search for new routes and migrants come up with the money to pay the higher fees.

Edgar Velasquez admits it's become tougher to cross. He spent three days walking in freezing temperatures through the remote mountain country west of Tucson, Arizona, and still was caught.

Agents found a body in those mountains Dec. 19. But that did not deter Velasquez, who said he planned to slip across the Arizona border during the holiday week when he hoped the U.S. patrols will be short-handed as agents take vacations.

"I imagine they also want to be with their families," said Velasquez, resting in the border city of Nogales before embarking on his illegal odyssey to reach a construction job in Florida.

Gustavo Soto, a spokesman with the U.S. Border Patrol Tucson sector, said smugglers often tell migrants there are less border agents out in the desert on holidays or when the weather is bad, "even though we have surveillance on the border 24/7 and 365 days of year."

Some migrants are simply giving up after a single try, something that was almost unheard of only a few years ago.

Esther Ardia walked for nearly three days as temperatures dropped to 14 degrees Fahrenheit (minus 10 Celsius) in the Arizona desert, trying to get back to her job at a North Carolina pine-tree farm.

Ardia, 21, couldn't keep up with the group of about 30 illegal migrants and was abandoned by her smuggler after her legs cramped up. She was picked up by the Border Patrol and returned to Mexico.

"I knew it would be hard, but I thought I could make it," said Ardia. "It's very hard. I'm not going to try (to cross) again."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Corporate Allies In Congress's Cross Hairs (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON

When Republicans expanded their majority in 2004, their first target was the trial lawyers, virtual ATM dispensers for Democratic candidates. A new law curbing class-action lawsuits was on the president's desk by mid-February.

Now, Democrats are targeting some of the GOP's strongest corporate allies - Big Oil, big pharmaceutical companies, and, in all likelihood, defense contractors.

In their first 100 legislative hours, Democrats aim to negotiate lower drug prices for seniors, roll back subsidies for oil and gas companies, and reduce the cost of student loans. They're also quickly gearing up to investigate allegations of corruption in war contracting.

"Parties reward their constituency groups, and they go after the other party's constituency groups. Parties are never stronger than in the first few days, so they do it early," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville.

Moreover, it's popular. "You can't find people supporting big drug and oil companies, except the people who work in them," Professor Sabato says. For example, some 85 percent of Americans say the government should negotiate prescription-drug prices for the Medicare program, according to a recent poll by the Kaiser Family Foundation.

When the GOP-controlled Congress passed the Medicare prescription-drug bill in 2003, it included a one-line provision that banned the government from negotiating directly with drug companies to lower prices for seniors, as it now does for veterans. Rep. Billy Tauzin (R) of Louisiana, who drafted that provision, left Congress to become the top lobbyist for the drug industry as president and CEO of the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America (PhRMA) - a controversial move that Democrats say they will make less likely with new lobby-reform legislation.

If that ban on price negotiating is lifted, House Democrats say that seniors overall could cut their drug costs by as much as $180 billion over the next 10 years. A study last year by the consumer group Families USA found that 19 of 20 drugs were priced lower through the Veterans Administration than they were for Medicare recipients.

But critics, including the White House and the Department of Health and Human Services, say that drug prices are already falling faster than expected under the 2003 law, and that mandating government to negotiate drug prices could limit the access to drugs for seniors.

Under the current prescription-drug bill, seniors are already saving an average of $1,200 a year on prescription drugs, according to the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. And the cost to the Treasury is about $30 billion, instead of $43 billion as anticipated.

The conflict sets up one of the first big battles of the 110th Congress. Since 1990, drug companies have contributed more than $134 million to national candidates, more than two-thirds of that to Republicans, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. The industry doubled its political contributions in the run-up to the 2003 legislation.

"Critics would have you believe that there are no negotiations in how prices for medicine are set. That's simply not true," said Ken Johnson, PhRMA's senior vice president, in a statement after the November elections in anticipation of the Democrats' proposal. "The negotiations are occurring - as they should be - between prescription drug plans, several of which already purchase medicines on behalf of tens of millions of Americans, and pharmaceutical companies. That's the marketplace in action and that's how America's seniors will see true savings without compromising the search for future cures."

But despite broad public support for lifting a ban, Democrats are divided on how to proceed and have yet to release specifics of their proposal. Max Baucus (D) of Montana, incoming Senate Finance Chairman, opposed a bipartisan plan in the 109th Congress that would have required the Department of Health and Human Services to get involved in negotiations between private drug plans and drug companies in some cases. If House Democrats lift the ban, as expected, Senator Baucus says he will conduct hearings on its likely impact. Meanwhile, HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt has already signaled that if given the opportunity to negotiate lower drug prices, he would not exercise it.

Similarly, Democratic calls to roll back subsidies for Big Oil are also popular, but problematic. In the first days of the new Congress, Democrats are calling for establishing a fund to promote renewable energy and conservation, which they say will be funded by money recovered from oil companies.

"Every oil subsidy will be given the highest level of scrutiny. We've been paying record energy prices at a time when Big Oil is making record profits - and record CEO compensation packages. It's unconscionable," says Drew Hammill, spokesman for incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

But even before Congress reworks subsidies provided in the Energy Policy Act of 2005, Democrats will take up proposals to recover royalties from oil and gas companies in the Gulf of Mexico. Because of a gaffe in 1998-99 oil leases, negotiated during the Clinton administration, companies have avoided some $10 billion in royalty payments. Republicans in the 109th Congress tried to go after these lost revenues; Democrats say they will push harder.

"The companies have not done anything wrong. We're a nation of law, and contract law is one of the cornerstones of our economy," says Red Cavaney, president and CEO of the American Petroleum Institute, the industry trade group. Under an agreement announced Dec. 14, five companies - BP, ConocoPhillips, Shell Oil, Marathon Oil, and Walter Oil and Gas Corp. - have already reached an agreement with the federal government to pay royalties on production that began on or after Oct. 1, 2006. "Why not let the process continue," he says.

Both the outgoing chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, Rep Thomas Davis (R) of Virginia, and incoming chairman Henry Waxman (D) of California have pledged to go after all lost royalties. Forty-one other companies are currently not paying royalties under the terms of these leases.

Still, the biggest wild card for energy companies such as Halliburton in the 110th Congress isn't energy subsidies, it's the scope of congressional investigations into wartime contracts. House Democrats are reviving an investigative subcommittee that was eliminated when Republicans took back the House in 1995. That panel will target both Defense contractors and White House officials who contracted with them, aides say.

Medicare Premiums Will Surge For Some (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

When new income-based premiums for Medicare's Part B program go into effect next month, some seniors will get an unwelcome surprise: Their monthly costs will be going up considerably more than expected because of the government's method of counting their income.

DOJ_NMG_0109824

In addition to income from investments, pensions and wages, seniors will find that big but unusual windfalls -- from house sales, for instance, or from taking cash from an individual retirement account -- will also be included in government calculations.

As a result, an advocacy group for seniors says, tens of thousands of people will be counted as wealthy even though their continuing yearly income is modest. Some will be paying as much as $800 more a year for Part B coverage because they are deemed to be "higher income beneficiaries." This will be on top of the $93.50 a month standard premium that all recipients will pay.

"We are concerned that our members are just now finding out that the government is suddenly increasing seniors' Part B premiums without adequate warning," Shannon Benton, executive director of the Senior Citizens League, said in a statement.

"Making matters worse, some seniors will have a difficult time with the appeal process, perhaps having to drive hours to appear in person -- an option many seniors simply don't have available to them," she said.

Mark Hinkle, a spokesman for the Social Security Administration, said that a small number of people will indeed have to pay more for their 2007 premiums because of large 2005 capital gains reported on their income tax returns. But he said that the premiums would go down in future years once the capital gains are no longer part of a recipient's tax return.

Congress, he said, listed a number of "life-changing events," such as divorce, death of a spouse or loss of a job, that could reduce a beneficiary's premium. But capital gains from the sale of a house or an IRA payout are not on the list, he said, and so are treated no differently than wages when calculating the premium.

On its Web site, Social Security details how Part B participants can question or challenge their new premium assessments.

Provisions for "means testing" the Medicare Part B program, starting in 2007, were included in the Medicare Prescription Drug Improvement and Modernization Act of 2003. It was a contentious issue then and remains one now -- with some arguing the extra money it will bring in is needed to keep Medicare solvent, while others say it will weaken the program and result in wealthier people opting out. Means testing was included in the bill by a Republican-dominated Senate-House conference committee, although neither body had included the provision in its bill.

The actual determination of a beneficiary's income, and how much people will have to pay in Part B premiums for 2007, is made by the Social Security Administration and based on 2005 income tax returns. Letters from Social Security have been going out to Medicare beneficiaries nationwide this month telling them whether they have to pay additional Part B premiums because of their income.

Medicare's Part B covers doctor and outpatient hospital bills. The program pays about 75 percent of an average beneficiary's costs through taxes, with the remaining quarter paid through monthly premiums.

Under the new, means-tested rules, most recipients will continue to pay 25 percent of the Part B costs through their premiums, while "higher income" beneficiaries will pay progressively, and sometimes dramatically, more over the next three years. The higher-income group is defined as individuals with an income of more than $80,000 and couples with an income of more than $160,000.

The Senior Citizens League, an advocacy group with 1.2 million members, has been getting calls from seniors complaining about their new premiums. One Tennessee member, for instance, told league officials that he sold a second home in Indiana in 2005 and paid taxes on the proceeds. Now he has learned that, based on that capital gain, his Part B premium would increase next year from $93.50 per month to $124.70.

Pelosi To Visit Baltimore Childhood Home (WT/AP)

By Kristen Wyatt

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Before Nancy Pelosi takes the reins of the U.S. House next week, the California Democrat will visit a row house in Baltimore's Little Italy neighborhood.

It was where the nation's first female House speaker grew up and learned politics long before she was old enough to vote.

The youngest of six, Mrs. Pelosi was born into a political family in a house always full of strangers asking for help.

Thirty years before going to Congress, Nancy D'Alesandro was brokering political deals for constituents of her father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., who served as Baltimore mayor from 1947 to 1959 and as a congressman from 1939 to 1947.

"She got her basic training in politics right in this room," recalled one of her older brothers, Nicholas D'Alesandro, 72, who still in lives in the Little Italy row house, now home to a health clinic on the ground floor. "We gave help to hundreds, thousands of people. It was the kind of thing she was raised to do."

The political breeding didn't convince Mrs. Pelosi's playmates that she was destined tobe second in line for the presidency.

Childhood friends said they never imagined Mrs. Pelosi's political career eclipsing those of her father and her brother, Thomas D'Alesandro III, who served one term as mayor from 1967 to 1971.

DOJ_NMG_0109825

"Nancy was a very quiet, shy young lady," said Mary Ann Campanella, 65, who played with Mrs. Pelosi as a child and still lives in Baltimore's Little Italy.

"She had no interest whatsoever in politics at the time. That's what made us so shocked -- she was a very quiet shy young lady," Miss Campanella said. "But I remember we were all in awe of her being the little princess and riding in the open-top cars in the parades. Still, we're can't believe how far she's come."

So proud is Little Italy of Mrs. Pelosi's political ascension that the city will name part of Mrs. Pelosi's childhood street for her.

Neighbors also want to see her name added to the neighborhood bocce court, now named for Mrs. Pelosi's father.

Mrs. Pelosi will attend a ceremony to name the street Tuesday to kick off four days of festivities to celebrate her becoming speaker.

Mrs. Pelosi also plans to visit her Washington alma mater, Trinity Washington University, in a tour designed to show the nation she is not a California-bred liberal, but a good Roman Catholic girl from a working-class neighborhood.

The message is not lost on the Rev. Michael Salerno, a priest at St. Leo the Great, the Catholic church Mrs. Pelosi attended as a child.

Father Salerno didn't minister to Mrs. Pelosi as a child, but he will say a few words at the street naming next week.

"Fifty, 60 years ago a woman never even got to venture out of the neighborhood. Now one of our daughters is going to be speaker. It's amazing," Father Salerno said.

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly said that visiting Little Italy and Baltimore "always has the feeling of a homecoming" for Mrs. Pelosi.

"It has always had a special place in her heart," Mr. Daly wrote of Baltimore.

Scene Change How Much Does A Neighborhood Affect The Poor? (WSJ)

By Jon E. Hilsenrath And Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

JACKSONVILLE, N.C. -- A decade ago, Lydia Grayson got as far away from her drug-addled, East Harlem housing project as she could. At the time, she was a 28-year-old mother of three, and, she says, a drug user. She took a federal housing voucher and packed her family on a Greyhound bus with one-way tickets to North Carolina.

Climbing out of poverty hasn't been as easy as getting on the bus. She says her life is now drug-free and more stable, and her children are growing up in a better environment. Yet in many ways, her struggles traveled with her.

"You really need to have a focus to get out of the ghetto," says Ms. Grayson, a New York native.

Her experience offers clues to a question society has wrestled with for years: Can a family escape poverty by getting out of the neighborhood where it takes root? It also sheds light on the government's shifting efforts to use housing policy as a solution to poverty.

A $16 billion federal infrastructure has built up around housing vouchers designed to give poor families more choices about where to live. About two million families currently use "Section 8" vouchers that allow them to move with subsidized rent. Since 1993, the government has been demolishing urban housing projects and forcing families to resettle in other places, sometimes with vouchers.

After Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, nearly 30,000 families, many extremely poor, turned to the federal government for vouchers after they were displaced, according to the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Ms. Grayson's move was part of a government test designed to study the effects of a new neighborhood on poverty in the way a researcher studies the effects of a new drug.

Beginning in 1994, the federal government offered a lottery for housing vouchers to families in five major cities. Families were randomly assigned to different groups. One group received vouchers to be used specifically to subsidize rents in neighborhoods where poverty was low. About 860 families eventually moved.

Another group, of 1,440 families, wasn't offered vouchers and, initially at least, stayed in high-poverty neighborhoods. Researchers have since tracked and compared the fortunes of the two groups.

The program, called Moving to Opportunity, was administered by HUD. A private firm called Abt Associates was contracted to track participants. Researchers at Harvard, Princeton, Northwestern and other institutions played a role in designing studies related to the program and analyzing the data.

When the program was launched, housing vouchers were seen as a promising antidote to urban poverty. Researchers had pinpointed ghettos as a culprit in the worsening fortunes of many poor, minority families. Free them from the poisonous cocktail of drugs and crime brewing in city ghettos, scholars reasoned, and the families would have a chance to leave poverty behind.

But results show that may only partially be true. "It would have been wonderful to have discovered the magic bullet," says Jeffrey Liebman, a Harvard economist who has studied the program.

Findings, he says, were more complicated. Among them: boys whose families moved actually fared worse than boys who stayed in bad neighborhoods. Girls, however, fared significantly better. Adults felt better, physically and mentally, than those who stayed behind, but didn't do better financially.

The Moving to Opportunity program, started in 1994, was a mix of liberal and conservative policy: hatched by Republican Jack Kemp and implemented by the Clinton administration. But later that year, in Baltimore -- one of the five cities participating -- suburbanites rebelled against the idea that poor families from troubled environments would be flocking to their neighborhoods. Plans to move additional families were canceled.

Over time, researchers followed the families who moved, comparing them with those who stayed. The fortunes of the families involved were surprising: Earnings of families who relocated to low-poverty areas averaged just $9,376 in 2001, a half-decade after they moved. That's just 3% higher than the $9,108 earned by those in the control group, a statistically insignificant difference.

Other measures improved. In a 2002 survey of 3,521 adults in the program -- most of them women -- 18.5% of people who moved to low-poverty neighborhoods suffered bouts of major depression, significantly lower than the 26.3% who felt depressed in the control group. Mr. Liebman, the Harvard economist, says that's roughly the same effect that's seen when depressed people are put on a regimen of antidepressant drugs.

Among nearly 800 teenage girls, 83% of those who relocated to low-poverty neighborhoods had either graduated from high school or were still in school five years after the move, compared with 71% in the control group. Alcohol use was lower. Arrest rates were lower. And mental-health measures improved. Away from the violence of the ghetto, girls seemed to flourish.

Teenage boys didn't. School participation deteriorated and property-crime rates, mental distress, and smoking all increased among those who moved with the vouchers, compared with teenage boys in families who didn't move. For property crime, there were 58 arrests for every 100 boys who moved to low-poverty neighborhoods, compared with 22 arrests for every 100 boys in the control group.

Because boys hang out more in their neighborhoods, researchers expected they would respond well to safer, more-affluent environments. Instead, many seemed to feel isolated in the new places, or harassed by police, and they acted out.

"It seems like the boys were less able to make social connections to their new areas," says Jeffrey Kling, a Brookings Institution economist who designed many of the Moving to Opportunity studies and interviewed participants. (See more on Dr. Kling's work.11)

The results ring true to Zack Sanders, 20. Last year, as part of a similar housing-mobility program, he moved with his grandmother to a quiet suburban home in Mesquite, Texas, away from the rough neighborhoods in and around Dallas where he was raised. His grandmother, Diana Sanders, 61, says she relishes the tranquility of her new home. Her voucher covers $875 of the $1,325 rent. But Mr. Sanders says he misses his old friends and neighborhood, where he walked to hamburger joints, played basketball and dominoes, and could make quick trips to the mall to talk to girls.

"I feel like I'm on Mars," he says. Most evenings he borrows his sister's car and drives to his old neighborhood, where he hangs out until midnight.

Yet Mr. Sanders's 9-year-old niece, Desiree Griggs, whom his grandmother is also raising, is thriving. She spends hours a day in her quiet room, reading and playing with dolls.

"When she goes into her room, nobody bothers her. She can relax," Ms. Sanders says. Desiree made the school honor roll, she adds. Ms. Sanders, who has a history of high-blood pressure and heart disease, says the move has helped her health. In a safer environment, she feels less tense and walks 30 minutes a day.

Harvard sociologist William Julius Wilson, who diagnosed the social isolation of the inner-city poor in the 1980s, says some families didn't thrive in mobility experiments because they didn't move far enough from their old neighborhoods. Some stayed so close that they didn't even switch school districts. "If they had been able to move children to better school districts," he says, "you might have had better outcomes."

Researchers agree that relocating people to combat poverty is a complex strategy at best. "What do you do with a program that helps some people a lot, and doesn't help others or hurts them?" says Todd Richardson, deputy director of HUD's Program Evaluation Division.

Overall, he says, it's better to move people than leave them in giant housing projects with high concentrations of poverty, one reason HUD has been demolishing public housing. But to make moves successful, scholars say, more counseling and support of those uprooted might help. Some of the families in the test are still being tracked and HUD is about to undertake a study to look at the impacts 10 years after a move.

The experience of Ms. Grayson, the Harlem transplant, shows the kind of mixed results they seem likely to find.

DOJ_NMG_0109827

She was living on the 15th floor of a housing project when she heard about the Moving to Opportunity program in 1996. At the time, she says she was on welfare, trying to overcome a crack addiction. Her three children were underfed, poorly clothed and surrounded by cocaine users.

When she was selected for the housing voucher, she and her children moved to Jacksonville, N.C., where she had a cousin.

Ms. Grayson wanted a different environment for her children. She recalls scenes of drug use in her childhood home and drinking malt liquor at the age of 11. "She was a pretty tough kid," says John Goehring, a retired teacher at the Lakeside School, a Spring Valley, N.Y., school for troubled teens she attended. But she was bright, he recalls. After she earned a high-school equivalency diploma, he received a card from her that read: "I'm so happy. Tears are coming to my eyes. I won't let you down."

"I didn't really have a lot of positive people in my life," says Ms. Grayson. She started college in New York, but became pregnant with her first child, Stanley, and dropped out.

Her move to North Carolina was an almost immediate struggle. The Moving to Opportunity program provided some counseling, but it tended to focus on those who didn't move far away. Because Ms. Grayson moved so far, she was effectively on her own.

On advice from her cousin, she moved to a remote spot about 15 miles outside of Jacksonville. She couldn't afford gas to heat her home. In the winter, she sat up late shivering and crying. She says she walked about two miles to work at a school cafeteria, where she earned $5.15 an hour. She also got back into drugs, she says. Before her first year in North Carolina was up, she left her place and moved with her children into a homeless shelter, closer to town.

"That's where the trouble started," says her son, Stanley Grayson, now 19. Other children at school started teasing him. He responded by skipping school and getting into fights. "That was the worst part of my life," he says.

For the next few years, Ms. Grayson moved around Jacksonville, trying to find a place to settle with her voucher. She says one neighborhood, near a mall, was populated by the kind of drug users who made her want to leave New York. A quiet area with one-story homes and small yards was too far from work since she didn't have a car.

As they moved, Stanley struggled. When he was 14, his mother sent him to Florida where his father lived. He eventually was sent to a youth-detention facility on gun-possession charges, he and his mother say.

Stanley says if he had stayed in New York, other family members might have kept him out of trouble. In North Carolina, "I felt really lonely," he says. "There was nobody I could talk to."

At the same time, Ms. Grayson has changed her life for the better. She says she is drug-free, and her two younger children seem to have settled into life in North Carolina. Kevin, 16, became involved in sports and has a job at a KFC restaurant. His mother says he's involved in his school's Junior Reserve Officer Training Corps program. Khadijah, 12, is being home-schooled by her mother.

Ms. Grayson says her faith has been a stabilizing force. "If it weren't for God, I wouldn't make it," she says. She cites the influence of Venice Cross, a preacher who she says helped her overcome her drug addiction.

"You can move a person out of the ghetto and into the suburb," says Ms. Cross. "But if their brain is still thinking ghetto-thinking, they're going to bring the ghetto out to the suburb. You've got to change a person's thinking." Ms. Cross, a follower of the World Harvest Church, an Ohio-based evangelical group, doesn't have a church, so she preaches to a small group in homes and at local parks.

While following Ms. Cross, Ms. Grayson got to know the preacher's brother, Joseph, a retired New York City maintenance worker. She married him last year.

Earlier this year, they found a small apartment in a two-story building. A sign in the parking lot warns visitors against carrying handguns. By then, Ms. Grayson had landed a $9.74-an-hour job as a record keeper at a nearby hospital. "I never really held down a real job" before then, she says.

Ten years after leaving New York, however, challenges remain. In July, Ms. Grayson lost her job. She says she missed too much work taking care of her son Kevin after he was in a car accident. Her son Stanley was released from the correctional facility earlier this year and stayed with her for a few months. Stanley, who now lives in Florida, has hopes of becoming a rap-music artist.

The family has been helped by her husband's income doing construction work, Ms. Grayson says, but it hasn't been enough. In August, she started collecting federal unemployment benefits. They will expire early in 2007.

Ms. Grayson says she's applied for a few jobs, but hasn't landed anything. "Sometimes I get discouraged," she says. "I'd be lying if I said I didn't. But you gotta live."

Charity For Charities (WSJ)

By Arthur C. Brooks

Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Many nonprofit leaders in America could not be more pleased at the Democratic takeover of Congress in a few days. For years, they have complained (justifiably or not) that Congress has underfunded critical nonprofit services. They look forward expectantly to an environment in which Congress -- they imagine -- will tap the keg of cash for nonprofits, from symphony orchestras to soup kitchens.

It remains to be seen whether the Democratic Congress will actually be more profligate than the Republicans were; after all, part of the reason the Republicans lost substantial conservative support in the 2006 midterm election was the fiscal bender Congress has been on for the past few years. But even less clear is whether greater government subsidies are in the interest of the charities themselves.

One large nonprofit organization that helps the poor in New York state illustrates this point. The agency was relatively small a few years ago, but provided a critical service in several cities. The state, taking notice of the organization's good work, began pouring money into operations, doubling and tripling its budget. The staff was focused on managing and spending the public dollars, and allocated less and less of its time to private fundraising -- which, predictably, vanished. When the state, facing budget cutbacks, began to reduce the organization's subsidy, it led to service cuts and layoffs because there were no private funds to fill the gap. Ironically, the organization and its clients were worse off than they would have been had the nonprofit received no government "help" in the first place.

This experience is hardly unique -- indeed, nonprofits and their communities all across America are exposed in the same way when government funding grows as a source of support. According to the National Center for Charitable Statistics, a quarter of human service charities in 2002 received at least 50% of their income from the government. This represents a lot of risk, because public funding is pro-cyclical: It increases or decreases more than changes in the economy, and thus can destabilize nonprofits. In contrast, charitable donations stabilize charities because they fluctuate less than the economy as a whole. For a charitable organization, relying on government funding as the main income source is like investing your 401(k) entirely in biotech stocks: You might do great -- for awhile.

But the problem with government money goes beyond just its volatility: Studies by economists over the past decade have demonstrated that government spending on nonprofit activities actually lowers private charitable giving. In the case of social welfare services, a dollar in government funding to nonprofits generally suppresses private giving by 25 cents or more. Part of this is due to a lower perception of need among charities when they get public money. There is also evidence, however, that charities spend less effort fundraising after governments give them money.

The bottom line is that there is nothing free about cash from the government. Perhaps this should come as no surprise, given what we know about the effects of public subsidies to individuals, such as welfare recipients. I would not argue that the destabilizing effects of government subsidies and the downward pressure on giving are reasons to eliminate public funding to nonprofits. But these effects do represent serious unintended consequences of nonprofit reliance on the government. Charities and policy makers should remember this in the new congressional regime.

Trump Cards (WSJ)

By Thomas J. Bray

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

DETROIT -- It hasn't been the merriest of holiday seasons in Michigan. Recently Ford Motor Co. offered modest buyouts to 38,000 hourly employees, more than half its unionized work force in the U.S. General Motors Corp. and its former parts division, the now-bankrupt Delphi Co., did the same for 40,000 hourly workers, about a quarter of their union work forces. There is talk that Daimler will dump its Chrysler division.

All of which is another massive blow to what used to be called the "union movement." The United Auto Workers is down to slightly more than 500,000 members, compared to 1.5 million only two decades ago. Nor is it just a Michigan problem. Including public sector workers, unions now represent only about 12.5% of the U.S. work force, down from 20% in 1983 and about 35% 50 years ago.

The decline in union membership leveled off last year. "The good news is that the annual hemorrhaging of union membership slowed last year," confessed James P. Hoffa, president of the Teamsters. "And that's not really good news."

Thus not-so-Big Labor, which has dumped millions into organizing campaigns without much success, is scrambling for new ways to beef up its membership rolls. The latest hot idea is "card check," in which unions demand to be recognized as the bargaining unit for a workplace if a majority of the workers merely sign a card indicating their support. Under current law, companies are required to recognize a union only after a secret ballot of the workers -- and unions have been losing an increasing number of those elections.

Now that Congress is back under Democratic control, unions sniff a win. Card-check bills sponsored by Democratic Rep. George Miller and Sen. Ted Kennedy last year had 215 co-sponsors in the House, just shy of a majority, and 42 co-sponsors in the Senate. Union political operatives made it clear during the recent election campaign that any Democrat who opposed card check could forget about campaign backing in the future.

Republicans still have the strength to filibuster such a measure to death, and President Bush might veto it. But a weakened GOP and president might be tempted to let it through, particularly if it's attached to something they want. If so, it is likely to be seen as a fundamental reversal of the anti-union trend unleashed by Ronald Reagan's crushing of the Air Traffic Controllers strike in 1981.

The card-check tactic already is being used with some success. More than half the workers who joined unions last year did so in card-check sign-ups to which companies had "voluntarily" agreed, according to the AFL-CIO. Congressional action would make the card-check procedure routine.

Sen. Kennedy, whose bill is titled the Employee Free Choice Act, claims federal card check legislation "would level the playing field" by removing "large loopholes" in existing labor laws that supposedly allow employers to fire union organizers and intimidate workers prior to organizing elections. Union officials like Stewart Acuff, the AFL-CIO's organizing director, complain that elections "just don't work."

But it's more than a bit odd for union leaders, long proponents of what they are pleased to call "industrial democracy," to object to the secret ballot. As for Sen. Kennedy's claim that he merely seeks a choice for workers between card-check and a traditional ballot, imagine you are Joe Lunch Bucket on your way to work. A beefy organizer greets you at the plant gate and asks you to sign a card in favor of representation by a union. Are you really going to say no?

The fact that unions now call card-check their No. 1 legislative priority should be seen as a sign of weakness rather than strength. Labor's far more ambitious schemes to insulate themselves from international competition, such as trade barriers, haven't gotten very far. And labor's ability to use mandatory worker dues for political purposes -- which amounted to more than a quarter of the AFL-CIO budget in 2005 and probably far more in 2006 -- is under legal pressure at the U.S. Supreme Court.

Even card check might not produce the desired results. Dana Corp., a major auto supplier, several years ago agreed to a card check campaign at two Virginia plants, which were duly organized by the UAW. But both plants are now scheduled to be closed because of mounting competitive pressures both from abroad and non-union plants in the U.S.

True, public sector unions have been growing. But even there voter sympathy may be limited. In November, voters in Michigan by a wide margin voted down a ballot proposal backed by teachers unions that would have guaranteed annual wage hikes at least equal to inflation (as well as a state bailout of pension and health care benefits). And that was even before the true bill for piling unionism on top of civil service status for government employees is made clear by new accounting standards that begin taking effect this year.

Unfunded pension and health-care liabilities for state and local employees, the new figures are likely to show, could top $1 trillion nationwide, a huge potential tax liability. Will voters -- even in union households -- really be in a mood to make it easier for an entrenched interest to deliver dubious services at high prices?

In short, Republicans could be making a serious miscalculation if they bow to union demands for card check. Many workers themselves would view it as a sellout of their basic rights -- trading away the secret ballot, which gives them some leverage over union bosses with whom they might disagree, for short-term political gain. It will be interesting to see whether today's GOP will stick to a principle that ought to be an easy sell with most Americans.

New-home Sales Rise For Third Time In 4 Months (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

USA Today, December 28, 2006

Sales of newly built homes rose a surprising 3.4% from October to November, the Commerce Department said Wednesday, as more builders offered special deals to attract buyers, and buyers took advantage of declining interest rates and mild weather to visit model homes.

This is the third increase in four months and a sign that the housing correction may be ending. Builder confidence levels, which hit bottom in September, are also slowly beginning to rise, according to December's Housing Market Index.

The sales gains haven't been easy. About half of home builders say they are cutting prices or paying the buyers' closing costs, and almost 60% are offering free upgrades such as granite kitchen counters, according to a survey by the National Association of Home Builders.

Compared with November last year, sales were off 15%. And while December results are not yet in, sales of new homes for the year are expected to be down about 18% from 2005. Sales of existing homes should be off by almost 9% this year. The National Association of Realtors will release November's existing home sales today.

"This is very much like what we saw at the time of the 1990-91 recession, even though this is not a recession in economic terms," says David Seiders, chief economist for the NAHB. "It shows to what extent this market got overheated in 2004 and particularly 2005. We knew we had soared to unsustainable levels … and knew we had one heck of a correction coming."

There are still signals that home sales could continue to slide. Applications for mortgage loans last week fell 14% from the week before to their lowest level in nearly five months, the Mortgage Bankers Association said Wednesday.

Nevertheless, sales of new homes were stronger last month in every region of the country except the South.

The supply of new homes for sale dipped to 6.3 months, down from 6.7 months in October. "Inventories fell again for a fourth-consecutive month," Wachovia analyst Phillip Neuhart says. "As long as they continue to fall, I'm going to feel better and better about the new home market."

The median price for a new home was $251,700, up 3% from October and 6% from last November. But Seiders dismissed the increase, saying it was probably because sales were strongest in the Northeast and the West, where median prices for homes are the highest.

End Of Housing Slump Seems To Be Drawing Near (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Recent firmness in mortgage applications and an increase in new-home sales suggest the housing slump may be nearly over, limiting the risk of wider damage to the overall economy.

One indication that home-buying demand has leveled off after a yearlong decline comes from the Mortgage Bankers Association, which conducts a weekly mortgage-application survey.

Yesterday, the group said mortgage applications fell sharply last week from the week before. Even so, its indexes of applications for home purchases and refinancings have been rising steadily since summer. The four-week moving average for the MBA's purchase index, which offers a less-volatile picture of the trend, has risen 12% since August, while the four-week average for the group's refinancing index has soared more than 41% since July.

A recent pickup in new-home sales also points to stabilizing demand. The Commerce Department said yesterday that new-home sales rose 3.4% in November to an annual rate of 1.05 million units. While that pace is down more than 15% from a year earlier, it has risen since July and has held fairly steady in recent months.

Despite some continued uncertainty, economists view the recent data as an early indication that the worst of the housing market's downturn may be over. "The net of all the numbers we've gotten is that it looks like the housing market and home sales appear to have stabilized, at least temporarily, in the latter part of the year," said Thomas Lawler, a former economist for Fannie Mae who now runs a consulting firm in Vienna, Va.

If this turns out to be the case, and the housing market begins to rebound next year, the economy would be likely to benefit. The slump has been one of the biggest dampers on the nation's economic growth. In the third quarter, for example, the decline in home building and residential investment shaved more than one percentage point off the annual rate of economic growth. Many economists expect a similar reduction in the fourth quarter but expect some improvement next year.

The chances of a pickup in 2007 partly depend on whether home builders can trim their inventories of unsold homes. Last month, there were 545,000 new homes on the market, or the equivalent of a 6.3-month supply at current sales rates, according to the Commerce data, down from a recent high mark of a 7.2-month supply in July.

Home-buying activity could wane, however, if interest rates rise or other factors, such as employment or the stock market, deteriorate. Economists expect the normally quiet winter months to produce volatile readings and say the best gauge of the housing market will be whether buyers come out in force as usual in the spring.

The median price of a new home -- or the price at which half sold for more and half sold for less -- was $251,700 last month, up from $237,900 a year earlier, the Commerce Department said. The figures aren't adjusted to account for the changing mix of sales. Thus, the November reading may have been distorted by the fact that sales in the higher-priced Northeast rose last month, while sales in lower-priced South fell.

Home Sales Rose 3.4% Last Month (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

Builders sold new homes at a faster rate last month than they did in October, shrinking the backlog of unsold homes on the market, the Commerce Department reported yesterday.

But many economists said the report, rather than foreshadowing a quick rebound, highlighted how fragile residential construction remained and suggested that the downturn now rattling the housing market had not yet run its course.

The report showed that sales of new single-family homes rose 3.4 percent in November, seasonally adjusted, to an annual rate of 1.05 million. That followed a 3.8 percent decline in October.

The news helped propel stocks on Wall Street to another record high — its 22nd so far this year — with the Dow Jones industrial average rising more than 100 points to finish the day above 12,500 for the first time.

It was a session typical of the often-buoyant final trading days of the year in which stocks gain on light volume as investors seek to polish their portfolios. [Page C13.]

Shares of homebuilders like Pulte Homes, Toll Brothers and Lennar all gained more than 1.5 percent as investors interpreted the home sales numbers as a sign that the slowdown in the housing market may have bottomed out.

Economists typically do not use November figures to make generalizations about trends in the housing market because the month is shortened by the Thanksgiving holiday. In fact, when the numbers are not seasonally adjusted, the number of new homes sold in November — 72,000 — was the lowest in almost four years. Inventories, a 7.7-month supply unadjusted, were the highest since December 1995.

"There's a relatively large adjustment factor here," said Michael Carliner, an economist with the National Association of Home Builders. "I wouldn't read too much into those numbers."

At first glance, many numbers in the report seemed to hint at a recovery in new-home sales. The median price of a new home in November rose, for example, and sales in the Northeast, Midwest and West all grew by double digits for the month. Beyond the numbers for November, however, few signs in the report pointed toward a reversal of the overall downward trajectory in residential housing.

Despite the November advance, sales of new homes are off 15.3 percent compared with a year earlier.

"Although the rebound in sales is consistent with the housing slowdown bottoming out, it seems too early to rejoice," said Dimitry Fleming, an economist with ING Financial Markets. "Supply is still high."

Many economists do not expect the market to stabilize until mid-2007.

When the statistics are adjusted for seasonal variations, the backlog of unsold new homes on the market declined to a 6.3-month supply in November, down from a 6.7-month supply in October. But that is still far higher than November 2005, when there was a 4.9-month supply.

The median price of a home rose 5.8 percent from November 2005, to $251,700. But economists said the increase was most likely the result of a rise in sales for the month in the Northeast and the West, where homes are more expensive. In November, sales in the Northeast climbed 22.5 percent compared with October, while the West saw a 19 percent jump.

The sales data from the last year, however, is more sobering. The Northeast was hit particularly hard; sales fell 42.4 percent from a year ago. Sales in the South declined 19.2 percent, and they fell 9 percent in the West. In the Midwest, however, sales rose 1.2 percent.

Despite the rise in the national median price, economists said the jump in sales during November suggested that buyers were still enjoying a market tilted to their advantage. Builders continue to offer incentives like upgraded kitchen appliances, landscaping and mortgage points at no additional charge. Incentives are not reflected in home price data.

Julia Coronado, chief United States economist with Barclays Capital, said buyers were still shopping in a market that was highly favorable to them. "We do know that it's more of a buyer's market, and builders are not eager to sit around with excess inventory on their books. It's extremely expensive to do that, so they move it quickly."

Peter E. Kretzmer, senior economist with the Bank of America, said, "Despite a monthly rise in the median new home price in November, prices remain on a flattening trend."

While the housing market has been in the midst of a sharp slowdown in recent months — some economists are calling it a full-blown housing recession — the damage to the broader economy has been limited so far. The decline in residential construction during the summer months knocked more than a full percentage point off the nation's gross domestic product growth, pulling it down to 2 percent in the third quarter.

But strength in other areas of the economy — consumer spending and commercial construction, for example — has helped to keep growth from stalling.

DOJ_NMG_0109832

In another sign of distress in housing, the Mortgage Bankers Association said yesterday that its index of applications to buy a home or refinance a loan dropped to the lowest level in four months.

Dow Hits New High As Sales Of New Homes Pick Up (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

Sales of new homes picked up last month after a big drop in October, while the backlog of unsold homes on the market became somewhat smaller, the Commerce Department reported today.

The news helped propel stocks on Wall Street to another all-time high, with the Dow Jones industrial average rising more than 100 points to finish the day above 12,500 for the first time. Shares of homebuilders like Pulte Homes, Toll Brothers and Lennar all rose considerably.

Still, sales are 15 percent lower than they were a year earlier, suggesting that the correction taking place in the housing market has not yet run its course.

The Commerce Department reported this morning that sales of new homes rose 3.4 percent in November to an annual rate of 1.05 million. That followed a 3.8 percent decline in October.

While the housing market has been in the midst of a sharp slowdown in recent months — some economists are calling it a full-blown housing recession — the damage to the economy has been limited so far. The decline in residential construction during the summer months knocked more than a full percentage point off of the nation's gross domestic product growth, pulling it down to 2 percent in the third quarter.

But strength in other areas of the economy — consumer spending and commercial construction, for example — has helped to keep growth from stalling.

"Although the rebound in sales is consistent with the housing slowdown bottoming out, it seems too early to rejoice," said Dimitry Fleming, an economist with ING Financial Markets. "Supply is still high."

The backlog of unsold new homes on the market declined to a 6.3-month supply in November, down from a 6.7-month supply in October. But that is still far higher than November 2005, when it would have taken 4.9 months to sell all the unsold homes on the market.

The median price of a home rose 5.8 percent from November 2005 to $251,700. But rather than reversing the recent downward momentum of new home prices, economists said the uptick was likely the result of a rise in sales for the month in the Northeast and the West, where homes are more expensive. In November, sales in the Northeast climbed 22.5 percent compared with October, while the West saw a 19 percent jump.

Despite the rise in the national median price, economists said the jump in sales during November suggests that buyers are still enjoying a market tilted to their advantage. Builders continue to offer incentives like upgraded kitchen appliances and landscaping at no additional charge, which are not reflected in home price data.

"We do know that it's more of a buyer's market, and builders are not eager to sit around with excess inventory on their books," said Julia Coronado, chief United States economist with Barclay's Capital. "It's extremely expensive to do that, so they move it quickly."

Peter Kretzmer, senior economist with the Bank of America, said, "Despite a monthly rise in the median new home price in November, prices remain on a flattening trend."

The sales data from the last year is more sobering. The Northeast was particularly hard-hit, with sales falling 42.4 percent from a year ago. Sales in the South declined 19.2 percent, and they fell 9 percent in the West. In the Midwest, however, sales rose 1.2 percent.

Dow Industrials Soar Past 12500 To Latest Record (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

The holiday cheer continued to flow, as upbeat housing data helped push the Dow Jones Industrial Average above 12500 for the first time.

It was the 22nd record finish for the Dow since October began, and left the blue-chip average up 16.7% this year -- poised for its strongest gain since 2003, when it rose 25.3%. The Dow finished the day ahead 102.94 points, or 0.83%, at 12510.57.

Support came from a Commerce Department report that new-home sales rose more than expected in November. The data backed hopes that the worst of the housing slump may be over.

DOJ_NMG_0109833

But the majority of the rally actually occurred before the housing news was announced at 10 a.m. EST. Many short-term investors appear to be betting that the market will finish the year with a bang. Stocks often do well in the trading days from Christmas into early January.

"The economic data pushed the market into full buy mode," said stock trader Brian Williamson of Boston Company Asset Management. "It just started feeding on itself and feeding on itself."

Small stocks, which often do well late in December and in January and also are more economically sensitive than larger ones, outpaced their larger siblings. The Russell 2000 small-stock index rose 1.21% to a record close of 797.73.

As is often the case in the year's waning days, trading volume was below average, which meant that it took less buying than usual to push the indexes higher.

The euphoria also was fed by news that crude-oil futures were falling back toward the $60 mark. The futures finished the day down 76 cents, or 1.24%, at $60.34 a barrel, amid forecasts of a warm January, which would further limit demand.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.70%, or 9.94 points, to 1426.84, up 14.3% in 2006 and just short of a six-year high.

The Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 0.73%, or 17.71 points, to 2431.22, up 10.2% this year.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.91%, or 2.19 points, to 242.49, a record.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1; bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 13/32, or $4.0625 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.656%. The 30-year bond was down 25/32 to yield 4.785%.

The dollar eased3. Late in New York, it traded at 118.78 yen, down from 119.15, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.3125 from $1.3096.

Strong Housing Report Helps Send Dow Industrial Average Over 12,500 (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

NEW YORK, Dec. 27 -- Stocks rose Wednesday, sending the Dow Jones industrial average past 12,500 for the first time as year-end bargain hunters bought shares across many sectors.

Home builders did well on the strength of a Commerce Department report that showed new home sales rose more than expected in November.

Bonds were lower. Many investors hope that signs of economic weakness will motivate the Federal Reserve to lower interest rates, so the sign of strength in the housing industry was troublesome for bondholders. The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose to 4.65 percent, from 4.60 percent late Tuesday.

Ford Motor and Toyota Motor shares rose after a meeting between executives of the companies sparked hope for an alliance between the two rivals. General Motors, meanwhile rose sharply.

Increased Home Sales Give Stocks A Leg Up (USAT/BLOOM)

USA Today, December 28, 2006

NEW YORK — The stock market rallied a second-consecutive day and propelled the Dow Jones industrial average to a new high Wednesday as a bigger-than-expected increase in November home sales stoked optimism that the worst of the housing slump may be over.

"If people start to see real estate prices stabilize, that's going to create a better consumer outlook," says Charles Stamey, who helps manage $14 billion at Manning & Napier Advisors. "That is very good news for people who look at overall market sentiment."

The Dow gained 102.94 points, or 0.8%, to 12,510.57, topping its Dec. 19 close of 12,471.32. The Dow is up 16.7% for 2006. The Standard & Poor's 500 index added 9.94 points, or 0.7%, to 1426.84 for a 2006 gain of 14.3%. The Nasdaq composite rose 17.71 points, or 0.7%, to 2431.22. It is up 10.2% in 2006.

Ryland gained $1.82 to $54.35 and led a rally for home builders as the November sales report eased concern that a glut of unsold homes would depress prices and make owners less inclined to spend money. Home Depot, the largest home-improvement retailer, climbed 50 cents to $39.56, while Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold rose $1.59 to $56.13, pacing gains for companies whose products are used in houses.

Sales of new homes in the USA benefited last month as lower mortgage rates and more incentives helped builders reduce inventory (story, 1B). Consumer spending, which is influenced by home values, makes up two-thirds of the U.S. economy and may play a bigger role in driving growth amid signs manufacturing is slowing.

Stocks are poised to complete their fourth annual rise in a row, partly due to hopes the Federal Reserve will cut its target for short-term interest rates.

A one-month low in oil prices Wednesday may help the inflation outlook, allowing the Fed to ease borrowing costs. Oil fell 76 cents to $60.34 a barrel, the lowest since Nov. 27. It is down 22% from July's record close of $77.03. "Any move down in oil can be viewed positively for stocks," says Michael Malone, trading analyst at Cowen & Co. "It removes inflationary pressure."

The New York Stock Exchange and Nasdaq Stock Market each held a period of silence to honor former president Gerald Ford, who died late Tuesday. However, 16,200 shares of Semiconductor HOLDRs Trust traded on the NYSE during its two-minute observance starting at 9:30 a.m. ET, while about 5.2 million shares traded on the Nasdaq during its pause, which started at 11 a.m.

Mall Retailers' Numbers Seen At Low End Of Forecasts (WSJ)

By James Covert

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- Retailers posted a disappointing 1.7% increase in comparable sales for the week ended Dec. 23, putting holiday sales on track to hit the low end of expectations, according to the International Council of Shopping Centers.

A surge of last-minute purchases by consumers fueled a 2% rise in same-store sales, or sales at stores open at least a year, from the previous week's levels, with sales on Friday and Saturday particularly strong. But the 1.7% same-store increase from year-ago spending was the weakest such gain recorded by the New York-based trade group since the week ended Feb. 12, 2005.

THE YEAR'S IMAGES

While there's still a week left in the December period on the retail calendar, same-store sales for the month now appear on track to hit the low end of the trade group's estimate for a 2.5% to 3.5% increase, said chief economist Michael Niemira. That also puts same-store sales for the combined November-December holiday period on track to hit the low end of its estimate for a 2.5% to 3% gain.

"The last week of the fiscal month might exceed modest expectations as consumers redeem those holiday gift cards and shop for the bargains on clearance," Mr. Niemira said. About 18% of consumers surveyed said they planned to shop on the day after Christmas, in line with 19% who reported doing so last year.

Nevertheless, Mr. Niemira called the results of the final, crucial week of the pre-Christmas shopping season "a very mixed performance," noting pockets of strength and weakness among retailers that made it difficult to gauge overall results. Some consumers shifted more purchases online, while others bought more gift cards. Discounts were steep, although "largely planned," Mr. Niemira said. Unusual bouts of warm weather and shifts in the industry calendar also made it tricky to assess the numbers, he said.

Prior to the week ended Dec. 23, the slimmest year-over-year holiday gain had been posted on the week ended Nov. 11, when same-store sales rose 2.1%. The strongest such gain was recorded the week ended Dec. 11, when same-store sales rose 3.2% from year-earlier levels. Same-store sales are a closely watched measure of retail performance.

The International Council of Shopping Centers currently tracks same-store sales at 59 major retail chains in the U.S. The trade group's next weekly update is slated for Jan. 3.

Separately, ShopperTrak RCT Corp., which tracks total sales at more than 45,000 retail outlets, reported that sales for the week ended Saturday increased 5.2% over the year-ago period. Foot traffic fell a slight 1.3 percent during that same period, indicating that shoppers were making bigger purchases with fewer trips, according to Bill Martin, co-founder of ShopperTrak.

Much of last week's strength was from Friday and Saturday, though the finale wasn't as strong as hoped for. As a result, Mr. Martin believes that total holiday sales will probably not meet the 5% growth forecast, though holiday sales growth will be at least 4.5%.

The National Retail Federation, the industry trade association, is sticking to its holiday growth forecast of 5%. The figure excludes business from auto dealers, gas stations and restaurants.

Cyberspace Sex Scandal Heads Toward Trial (USAT/AP)

USA Today, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — When Robert Steinbuch discovered his girlfriend had discussed intimate details about their sex life in her online diary, the Capitol Hill staffer didn't just get mad. He got a lawyer.

DOJ_NMG_0109835

Soon, though, the racy tidbits about the sex lives of the two Senate aides faded from the front pages and the gossip pages. Steinbuch accepted a teaching job in Arkansas, leaving Washington and Jessica Cutler's Washingtonienne Web log behind.

While sex scandals turn over quickly in this city, lawsuits do not. Steinbuch's case over the embarrassing, sexually charged blog appears headed for an embarrassing, sexually charged trial.

Lurid testimony about spanking, handcuffs and prostitution aside, the Washingtonienne case could help establish whether people who keep online diaries are obligated to protect the privacy of the people they interact with offline.

Cutler, a former aide to Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, says she created the blog in 2004 to keep a few friends up to date on her social life. Like a digital version of the sex-themed banter from a Sex and the City episode, Cutler described the thrill and tribulations of juggling sexual relationships with six men.

One of those men was Steinbuch, a counsel to DeWine on the Judiciary Committee. Cutler called him the "current favorite" and said he resembled George Clooney, liked spanking and disliked condoms.

"He's very upfront about sex," she wrote. "He likes talking dirty and stuff, and he told me that he likes submissive women."

When Ana Marie Cox, then the editor of the popular gossip website Wonkette.com, discovered and linked to Cutler's blog, the story spun out of control. Cutler was fired and Steinbuch says he was publicly humiliated. He went to court seeking more than $20 million in damages.

The case is embroiled in thorny pretrial issues, with each side demanding personal information from the other. Steinbuch wants to know how much money Cutler received from the man she called her "sugar daddy." Cutler demanded Steinbuch's student evaluations from the University of Arkansas at Little Rock Law School, where he teaches.

Steinbuch also recently added Cox as a defendant in the case, though he has not served her with court papers. A trial date has not been set, but Matthew Billips, Cutler's attorney, said there are no settlement talks that might head off a trial.

"I have no idea what he wants," Billips said. "He's never said, 'This is what I think should be done.'"

Neither Steinbuch nor his attorney returned phone calls seeking comment. In court, attorney Jonathan Rosen said Steinbuch wants to restore his good name. Students in his legal ethics class all search the Internet and learn about the blog, Rosen said.

"It's not funny and it's damaging," Rosen told a judge. "It's horrible, absolutely horrible."

To win, Steinbuch will have to prove that the details of their sexual relationship were private and publishing them was highly offensive. Billips argues that Cutler never intended to make the blog public but, in the information age, data is easily copied and distributed beyond its intended audience.

If the case goes to trial, its outcome will be important both to bloggers and to people who chronicle their lives on social-networking sites such as MySpace and Facebook. Marc Rotenberg, director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, said he may teach the Washingtonienne case this spring during his class at Georgetown Law School.

"Anybody who wants to reveal their own private life has a right to do that. It's a different question when you reveal someone else's private life," he said, adding that simply calling something a diary doesn't make it one. "It's not sitting in a nice, leather-bound book under a pillow. It's online where a million people can find it."

Rotenberg asked, what if Cutler had secretly videotaped the encounters and sold the videos without Steinbuch's consent? There has to be a line somewhere, he said.

Since being fired, Cutler moved back to New York, wrote a novel based on the scandal, posed nude for Playboy and started a new website, where she solicits donations "for slutty clothes and drugs."

She wouldn't discuss the case but said she's amazed by what has happened.

"The fact that anyone was interested in the first place was a surprise," she said. "The fact that there was a lawsuit in the first place was a surprise. That it's still going on is a surprise."

U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman was surprised, too.

"I don't know why we're here in federal court to begin with," Friedman told attorneys for both sides in April. "I don't know why this guy thought it was smart to file a lawsuit and lay out all of his private, intimate details."

In that sense, the Washingtonienne lawsuit has become a study into when to make a federal case out of something and when to just let it go away. It's a question lawyers wrestle with all the time.

Lanny Davis, the former special counsel to President Clinton who now advises companies during times of crisis, tells clients to decide whether they want justice or simply to set the record straight and get a message across.

"If you're looking for justice, the court system is the only thing you have," Davis said. "If you're looking to get the full story, good and bad, into one coherent narrative, the court system is perhaps the worst possible forum."

Ford Disagreed With Bush About Invading Iraq (WP)

By Bob Woodward

DOJ_NMG_0109836

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Former president Gerald R. Ford said in an embargoed interview in July 2004 that the Iraq war was not justified. "I don't think I would have gone to war," he said a little more than a year after President Bush launched the invasion advocated and carried out by prominent veterans of Ford's own administration.

In a four-hour conversation at his house in Beaver Creek, Colo., Ford "very strongly" disagreed with the current president's justifications for invading Iraq and said he would have pushed alternatives, such as sanctions, much more vigorously. In the tape-recorded interview, Ford was critical not only of Bush but also of Vice President Cheney -- Ford's White House chief of staff -- and then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who served as Ford's chief of staff and then his Pentagon chief.

"Rumsfeld and Cheney and the president made a big mistake in justifying going into the war in Iraq. They put the emphasis on weapons of mass destruction," Ford said. "And now, I've never publicly said I thought they made a mistake, but I felt very strongly it was an error in how they should justify what they were going to do."

In a conversation that veered between the current realities of a war in the Middle East and the old complexities of the war in Vietnam whose bitter end he presided over as president, Ford took issue with the notion of the United States entering a conflict in service of the idea of spreading democracy.

"Well, I can understand the theory of wanting to free people," Ford said, referring to Bush's assertion that the United States has a "duty to free people." But the former president said he was skeptical "whether you can detach that from the obligation number one, of what's in our national interest." He added: "And I just don't think we should go hellfire damnation around the globe freeing people, unless it is directly related to our own national security."

The Ford interview -- and a subsequent lengthy conversation in 2005 -- took place for a future book project, though he said his comments could be published at any time after his death. In the sessions, Ford fondly recalled his close working relationship with key Bush advisers Cheney and Rumsfeld while expressing concern about the policies they pursued in more recent years.

"He was an excellent chief of staff. First class," Ford said. "But I think Cheney has become much more pugnacious" as vice president. He said he agreed with former secretary of state Colin L. Powell's assertion that Cheney developed a "fever" about the threat of terrorism and Iraq. "I think that's probably true."

Describing his own preferred policy toward Saddam Hussein's Iraq, Ford said he would not have gone to war, based on the publicly available information at the time, and would have worked harder to find an alternative. "I don't think, if I had been president, on the basis of the facts as I saw them publicly," he said, "I don't think I would have ordered the Iraq war. I would have maximized our effort through sanctions, through restrictions, whatever, to find another answer."

Ford had faced his own military crisis -- not a war he started like Bush, but one he had to figure out how to end. In many ways those decisions framed his short presidency -- in the difficult calculations about how to pull out of Vietnam and the challenging players who shaped policy on the war. Most challenging of all, as Ford recalled, was Henry A. Kissinger, who was both secretary of state and national security adviser and had what Ford said was "the thinnest skin of any public figure I ever knew."

"I think he was a super secretary of state," Ford said, "but Henry in his mind never made a mistake, so whatever policies there were that he implemented, in retrospect he would defend."

In 1975, Ford decided to relieve Kissinger of his national security title. "Why Nixon gave Henry both secretary of state and head of the NSC, I never understood," Ford said. "Except he was a great supporter of Kissinger. Period." But Ford viewed Kissinger's dual roles as a conflict of interest that weakened the administration's ability to fully air policy debates. "They were supposed to check on one another."

That same year, Ford also decided to fire Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger and replace him with Rumsfeld, who was then Ford's White House chief of staff. Ford recalled that he then used that decision to go to Kissinger and say, "I'm making a change at the secretary of defense, and I expect you to be a team player and work with me on this" by giving up the post of security adviser.

Kissinger was not happy. "Mr. President, the press will misunderstand this," Ford recalled Kissinger telling him. "They'll write that I'm being demoted by taking away half of my job." But Ford made the changes, elevating the deputy national security adviser, Brent Scowcroft, to take Kissinger's White House post.

Throughout this maneuvering, Ford said, he kept his White House chief of staff in the dark. "I didn't consult with Rumsfeld. And knowing Don, he probably resented the fact that I didn't get his advice, which I didn't," Ford said. "I made the decision on my own."

Kissinger remained a challenge for Ford. He regularly threatened to resign, the former president recalled. "Over the weekend, any one of 50 weekends, the press would be all over him, giving him unshirted hell. Monday morning he would come in and say, 'I'm offering my resignation.' Just between Henry and me. And I would literally hold his hand. 'Now, Henry, you've got the nation's future in your hands and you can't leave us now.' Henry publicly was a gruff, hard-nosed, German-born diplomat, but he had the thinnest skin of any public figure I ever knew."

Ford added, "Any criticism in the press drove him crazy." Kissinger would come in and say: "I've got to resign. I can't stand this kind of unfair criticism." Such threats were routine, Ford said. "I often thought, maybe I should say: 'Okay, Henry. Goodbye,' " Ford said, laughing. "But I never got around to that."

At one point, Ford recalled Kissinger, his chief Vietnam policymaker, as "coy." Then he added, Kissinger is a "wonderful person. Dear friend. First-class secretary of state. But Henry always protected his own flanks."

Ford was also critical of his own actions during the interviews. He recalled, for example, his unsuccessful 1976 campaign to remain in office, when he was under enormous pressure to dump Vice President Nelson A. Rockefeller from the Republican ticket. Some polls at the time showed that up to 25 percent of Republicans, especially those from the South, would not vote for Ford if Rockefeller, a New Yorker from the liberal wing of the Republican Party, was on the ticket.

When Rockefeller offered to be dropped from the ticket, Ford took him up on it. But he later regretted it. The decision to dump the loyal Rockefeller, he said, was "an act of cowardice on my part."

In the end, though, it was Vietnam and the legacy of the retreat he presided over that troubled Ford. After Saigon fell in 1975 and the United States evacuated from Vietnam, Ford was often labeled the only American president to lose a war. The label always rankled.

"Well," he said, "I was mad as hell, to be honest with you, but I never publicly admitted it."

Christine Parthemore contributed to this report.

Ford Aides Shape Bush Tenure (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Gerald Ford took office in a presidency weakened by Vietnam and Watergate -- a situation that some top aides set out to reverse upon returning to power in the Bush administration. Their effort to undo the damage done to the presidency during the Nixon-Ford years has the Bush White House on a collision course with the coming Democratic Congress.

Mr. Ford, who died Tuesday, held office for 2½ years and was the only person to hold the position without being elected president or vice president. But his tenure is felt through the ranks of aides -- most notably Vice President Dick Cheney -- who became pivotal figures in the Bush administration. They have used their years in office to restore powers of the presidency they felt were lost after Mr. Nixon's resignation and the Vietnam War. The Bush White House's assertion of presidential power in areas such as the war on terror may be Mr. Ford's most surprising legacy.

Mr. Ford became president when the balance of power between the legislative and executive branches had swung strongly toward Congress. Sparked by policy battles with President Nixon, a Democratic-controlled Congress tried to set new limits on the workings of the American intelligence community and defense establishment. Many Ford aides left office believing that Congress had usurped powers that belonged to the executive branch.

"With the arrival of Watergate and Vietnam, the president's authority was considerably weakened, and that of Congress got much stronger," says Brent Scowcroft, who was Mr. Ford's national security adviser. "We were too weakened, and had too many problems, to really push back."

When Ford aides such as Mr. Cheney and former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld joined the Bush administration, they worked to swing the pendulum back toward the executive branch, in effort to restore powers that aides felt Mr. Ford had forfeited during his tenure. For some Ford veterans, the Bush years represented an opportunity to re-empower the White House at the expense of Congress.

"Cheney and others from the Ford group were in the White House during an unprecedented assault on the power and prerogatives of the presidency, and they came away from that thinking that restoring strength to the presidency was an important institutional obligation," says Vin Weber, a lobbyist and former Republican congressman from Minnesota. "They've spent years trying to do just that."

Reversal Of Fortune (NYT)

By Barry Werth

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

Northampton, Mass.

AMERICA got its first real impression of Gerald Ford on the steamy August morning 33 years ago when he took office as president, and most people instantly liked what they saw. Mr. Ford stood in the driveway of his suburban split-level house, hours before assuming a post he never sought and hoped to avoid having to fill. One of the questions he took was about Harry

DOJ_NMG_0109838

Truman's comment when he had the office abruptly thrust upon him. Mr. Truman said he felt that the moon, the stars and the planets had fallen on him.

"I think that's an apt description," Mr. Ford said. "I can tell you better this afternoon after it actually happens."

"Mrs. Ford hoped you would get out of politics. What is her response?"

"Well," Mr. Ford shook his head. "She's just doing her best and we'll wait and see about the other."

Like Mr. Truman, President Ford was a seemingly ordinary Midwesterner, a career politician and party man dogged by low expectations and doubts — suitable "standby equipment," as Nelson Rockefeller called the vice presidency, but no one's idea of a commanding leader.

Still worse, he came into office not as Harry Truman and Lyndon Johnson had, inheriting the mantle of a popular fallen leader and with a supportive Congress, but replacing a disgraced and reviled figure and facing Democratic majorities in both houses, as well as right-wing rumblings about Richard Nixon's foreign and economic policies. By the time Mr. Nixon departed, Mr. Ford wrote, "he had no mantle left."

Of necessity, President Ford devised a new one — "the mantle of the presidential center," The Washington Post's Lou Cannon called it. For a month, Mr. Ford set out not just to heal America's divisions but to expunge them. He moved hard to the center, determined, he wrote, "to leave the right sputtering."

He chose Nelson Rockefeller as his vice president (over George H. W. Bush and Donald Rumsfeld, who both campaigned vigorously for the job), met with blacks and women, proposed partial amnesty for Vietnam-era draft resisters, and hewed to Mr. Nixon's realism in foreign affairs. The press corps extended him the benefit of the doubt, finding him refreshingly open and honest after Mr. Nixon, and his approval ratings soared — literally, from nowhere — to 70 percent.

Then, one Sunday morning a month after moving into the Oval Office, he pardoned Mr. Nixon before the former president was indicted. With a pen stroke, a very different Ford presidency emerged. Though he said he was forgiving Mr. Nixon because the televised spectacle of a former president in the criminal dock would stir up "ugly passions," the pardon instantly and inevitably looked like the last cynical act of the Watergate cover-up — Mr. Nixon's hand-chosen successor giving him a free pass.

The pardon was a political disaster for President Ford. His approval ratings plummeted, inviting attacks from not only the Democrats, but also the Republican right, which rallied around Ronald Reagan.

President Ford spent the remainder of his presidency trying to stave off the intraparty challenge that had suddenly emerged. Two weeks after the pardon, he appointed Mr. Rumsfeld as White House chief of staff, and Mr. Rumsfeld chose Dick Cheney, then 33, as his deputy. A year later, President Ford fired Defense Secretary James Schlesinger and replaced him with Mr. Rumsfeld, put Mr. Bush in charge of the C.I.A., forced Nelson Rockefeller off the 1976 ticket, and promoted Mr. Cheney to chief of staff. In that role, Mr. Cheney instituted a more centralized, secretive, Nixonian approach to presidential power, as he and Mr. Rumsfeld moved to replace President Ford's restraint and realism with a swaggering, messianic view of American might. If it all sounds familiar, it is.

Unlike those he elevated to power, President Ford accepted accountability and showed uncommon political and personal courage. He announced his amnesty plan before the annual convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars — the toughest audience he could find — telling reporters it would be "a little cowardice" to roll it out before a hand-picked crowd.

When it came out that Gen. Alexander Haig, President Nixon's chief of staff, went to Mr. Ford a week before the president's resignation proposing that he pardon him, Mr. Ford volunteered to testify before Congress, where he swore under oath, "There was no deal, period, under no circumstances." Suspicion still lingers that President Ford telegraphed Mr. Nixon that he wouldn't face jail — after the pardon discussion, according to a close Ford aide, he told General Haig to "do whatever they decided to do" to convince Mr. Nixon to step down. But he never complained publicly about his reversal of fortune in office.

President Ford believed that by pardoning Mr. Nixon, he was putting Watergate and the imperial presidency in the past. But by sacrificing his popularity, he also lost much of his mandate to address the aftermath of Watergate and Vietnam with moderation, bipartisanship and national humility — the very goals he set out to achieve. Forced to the right, his administration spawned many of the core attitudes and key players of the George W. Bush White House.

Mr. Ford didn't struggle for the presidency, didn't win it, but he was determined not to fail at it. His candor and decency helped restore America's faith in its institutions. It's regrettable that the pardon — shadowed by ambiguity, politically catastrophic, and with a long tail extending to the heart of today's White House — weighs so heavily on his legacy.

How Ford's Legacy Still Serves (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

The standard tribute to Gerald R. Ford is that he served the nation best simply by stepping into the presidency for the disgraced and banished Richard M. Nixon.

DOJ_NMG_0109839

But to those who served with the man from Michigan, his achievements did not begin or end with his being available to help "heal our land" from the wounds of the Nixon presidency, as his successor, Jimmy Carter, said on the day he took over from Ford.

The alumni of the Ford administration -- a notable group -- insist that though he had never particularly aimed for the presidency, the "accidental president" developed a considerable mastery of the job and was on his way to building a legacy when the voters sent him into early retirement.

Instead of great deeds, they say, he left behind a great model of decency and integrity in office -- and a generous gift of friendship that has endured for many of them for the three decades since they served under him. The annual gatherings of Ford administration alumni are unique in the modern presidency and offer evidence of the loyalty he commanded.

Many of those alumni who first exercised real power under Ford remained active in government. For all that he has borrowed from Ronald Reagan, President Bush owes the greatest debt to three stalwarts of economic and national security policy inherited from Ford -- Vice President Cheney and former defense secretary Don Rumsfeld, both former chiefs of staff to Ford, and former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan, Ford's chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

In all his years, Greenspan observed, he has never been part of a more talented administration. Henry Kissinger was secretary of state, and Brent Scowcroft headed the National Security Council staff. Kissinger's personal staff included Lawrence Eagleburger, later secretary of state himself, and L. Paul Bremer. William Colby headed the CIA, and Daniel Patrick Moynihan was U.N. ambassador.

When Rumsfeld served as Ford's defense secretary, his deputy was William P. Clements Jr., later governor of Texas. The economic policy team included James Lynn and Paul O'Neill at the Office of Management and Budget, William Simon at Treasury, L. William Seidman and Greenspan at the White House, John Dunlop at the Labor Department, Carla Hills at Housing and Urban Development, Rogers C.B. Morton at Commerce, Clayton Yeutter at the Office of the Special Trade Representative, and Russell Train at the Environmental Protection Agency.

The Justice Department was headed by Edward H. Levi, a former University of Chicago president and perhaps the most nonpolitical attorney general in modern times. Serving under him, in various high staff positions, were such people as Rudolph Giuliani, Robert Bork and Antonin Scalia. And Nelson Rockefeller was vice president.

It took a while for Ford to replace some of the key players he had inherited from Nixon, but when he was finished, he had a remarkably cohesive, competent group. The overall tone of the Ford Cabinet and White House reflected the moderate conservatism of Ford's own Grand Rapids, Mich., background -- with more than a tinge of the progressivism embodied in the term "Rockefeller Republicanism."

In terms of the subsequent development of the Republican Party -- and the character of later Republican administrations -- it is difficult to say that Ford left a lasting imprint. He was challenged for the 1976 nomination by Reagan, whose ambitions nearly thwarted the incumbent at the Kansas City convention. When Ford lost to Carter, Reagan was perfectly positioned to inherit the party leadership and, ultimately, the presidency.

So Ford's legacy lies more in his personal character than in his political inheritance. That character was epitomized by the strength of his friendships, which were far deeper than any partisan or ideological lines. Only days before Nixon resigned under threat of impeachment, Ford traveled to the home state of his political rival but friend, Democratic Rep. Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill of Massachusetts, to play with him in a golf tournament.

In the final days of the Nixon presidency, Ford made a memorable visit to The Post. As vice president, he had defended Nixon against the Watergate charges, but he recognized in our meeting that he had a responsibility larger than any further claims of personal loyalty from Nixon. "I want you to know I am someone who enjoys having adversaries who are not enemies," he told reporters and editors.

It was a signal, understood by everyone in the room, that a new -- and welcome -- era was about to begin. It turned out to be a shorter period in office than Ford expected, but the standard of civility and good will he set for himself is an example that endures.

Similar Personnel, Different Approaches (WP)

Gerald R. Ford's administration passed from the scene relatively quickly in the 1970s, but, like much of the decade's popular culture, it left an imprint that would be felt for years to come. In fact, when George W. Bush arrived at the Oval Office 24 years later, it felt at first as if he were shooting a remake of the Ford White House.

Ford's White House chief of staff, Dick Cheney, was now vice president. Ford's defense secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld, was again the master of the Pentagon. Young aides who had learned the Washington game under the 38th president -- such as

Paul H. O'Neill, John W. Snow and Stephen J. Hadley -- were to head the Treasury Department or National Security Council for the 43rd chief executive.

There were other familiar faces as well. James A. Baker III, who as Ford's campaign manager saved his nomination from an insurgent Ronald Reagan in 1976, had come to the rescue when Bush's election headed into recount overtime. And Alan Greenspan, a Ford economic adviser, was the incumbent Federal Reserve chairman who would help Bush sell his signature $1.35 trillion tax-cut program, a far cry from the $10 billion in tax cuts promised by Greenspan's onetime mentor, Ford.

"It's quite amazing how many people from his administration have gone on to big things," said retired Air Force Lt. Gen. Brent Scowcroft, who was national security adviser for both Ford and President George H.W. Bush, then served as chairman of the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board under George W. Bush.

But if the Ford administration proved an incubator for future Republican talent after the demise of Richard M. Nixon's presidency, it turned out not to be much of a model for the current Bush administration in terms of style and ideology. Where Ford governed close to the political center, working with congressional Democrats and presenting a pragmatic, cautious domestic and foreign policy agenda, Bush has styled himself as more of a crusader for change at home and abroad -- bold in the eyes of his admirers but reckless in the view of his critics.

Bush has led the nation in a more polarized time and more polarized fashion, largely eschewing Democrats and focusing on keeping his GOP base behind him. Initially at least, his administration excited conservatives, while moderates who found his approach too radical were cast out, including O'Neill, who was pressured to resign as treasury secretary, and Scowcroft, who was dumped from the intelligence board.

Ford, who spent years in the Republican minority in Congress, put a premium on collaboration to make the system work. "He was just great at that," said Scowcroft. "And as you can see, this administration doesn't believe in that and doesn't practice it. And not just this administration -- the whole town of Washington has changed."

Not that Ford had it easy. He assumed office amid the trauma of Watergate and Vietnam without being elected and, unlike Bush till now, had an opposition party running Capitol Hill. "He had a hostile Congress to deal with and, to a certain extent, a large segment of his own party that was at odds with him in the Reagan wing," said David Horrocks, a historian at the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library and Museum.

And just as Bush's team has at times been riven by deep disagreements over issues such as the Iraq war, Ford's circle had its share of internal competition. Rumsfeld was Ford's first White House chief of staff but later turned over the office to his young aide, Cheney, so that he could join the Cabinet, a possible launching pad to becoming the vice presidential nominee in 1976. George H.W. Bush, meanwhile, was made CIA director in what some colleagues saw as a move by Rumsfeld to get rid of a potential rival for the nomination.

But none of that compared to the political divisions of the current era, and Ford in his last years found the changes in the capital culture disheartening. When Time magazine journalist Hugh Sidey, who covered the Ford White House, died in 2005, the former president wrote a piece in The Washington Post lamenting the passing of a Washington where politicians and journalists could respect and even be friends with one another despite disagreements.

"It's hard to imagine how different Washington was in those days," said Ron Nessen, who was Ford's press secretary. "It's so nasty and polarized these days, and everything's political. Ford had a lot of friends in the other party."

In an interview before Ford's death, Nessen said the former president was "not happy" about the polarization of politics. "He has been definitely put off by the tone and mood in Washington, because he does come from that different era when Republicans and Democrats . . . would have a drink together."

Bush also has rued the partisanship of his tenure, though he and his aides generally place the blame on Democrats. Some of his advisers see no virtue in the sort of accommodation they associate with the Ford administration, dismissing it as an approach that would not work in an era that demands more daring leadership.

Whether Cheney sees it that way is uncertain, but of all the Ford veterans inside the Bush White House, no one appears to have changed more. Scowcroft, among others, has said he no longer recognizes the man he knew as a laid-back, good-humored pragmatist who was the nation's youngest White House chief of staff. As Bush's grim-faced vice president more than a quarter-century later, Cheney has articulated a dark view of the world and the threats to the United States while advocating preemptive war in Iraq and a free hand for interrogators grilling prisoners.

Cheney does not explain the seeming evolution, but he continued to pay homage to his former boss throughout his career. "We were at a reunion dinner . . . and Cheney told my husband and me informally, 'I owe everything to Ford,' " said Elaine K. Didier, director of the Ford library.

In a speech to the Wyoming legislature in February, Cheney seemed wistful for his days in the Ford White House. "In Gerald Ford, I had yet another fine role model," he said, "and I still look up to the man for his steadiness, for his kindness and complete lack of pretense, for the way he conducted himself during one of the most serious constitutional crises in the nation's history."

38th President Leaves A Legacy Of Healing (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

A nation deeply polarized by war and partisanship came together yesterday to mourn Gerald Rudolph Ford as a healer during a previous era of division, while Washington began preparing an elaborate, pageantry-filled farewell for the most modest of presidents.

Ford, who died at his California home Tuesday night at age 93, will lie in state at the U.S. Capitol for two days starting Saturday and will be memorialized at a service at Washington National Cathedral on Tuesday, following the pattern set by Ronald Reagan's death two years ago.

With presidents and lawmakers of both parties assembling in the nation's capital for the occasion, the ceremonies marking Ford's passage promise to set a bipartisan tone to begin a week in which power will change hands in Washington. Two days after the service at the cathedral, Democrats will assume control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years, opening a period of divided government for the remainder of President Bush's time in office.

Ford's legacy as a bridge builder before, during and after his short presidency dominated the discussion in Washington and across the country yesterday, standing in contrast to a time when leaders in both parties often seem unable to join hands on the big issues of the day. During his final years, mostly privately but sometimes publicly, Ford often expressed regret at what he saw as a coarsening political environment that personalizes policy differences and undermines national unity.

Bush has stocked his administration with veterans of the Ford White House, and he paid tribute yesterday to the 38th president's ability to work across the aisle. "He assumed power in a period of great division and turmoil," Bush told reporters at his ranch in Crawford, Tex., where he is spending the week. "For a nation that needed healing and for an office that needed a calm and steady hand, Gerald Ford came along when we needed him most."

Jimmy Carter, who ousted Ford in 1976 but became friends with him after leaving office, called him "one of the most admirable public servants and human beings I have ever known." In a statement, he said Ford "wisely chose the path of healing during a deeply divisive time in our nation's history" and "frequently rose above politics by emphasizing the need for bipartisanship and seeking common ground on issues critical to our nation."

Ford had been in declining health for months and underwent heart procedures in August. Still, in November, he surpassed Reagan to become the longest-living president. He died at 9:45 p.m. Eastern time Tuesday at his Rancho Mirage home, according to a statement issued on behalf of the family. It did not give a cause of death. White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten notified Bush, who then called Betty Ford about 11 p.m. to offer condolences.

Under plans announced last night, Ford's funeral will mirror Reagan's June 2004 services. A service will be held in California tomorrow, and his body will be flown to Washington on Saturday, where it will be brought to the Capitol for a formal state funeral that evening. His casket will lie in state in the Rotunda and will be open to the public through Monday. After the service at the Washington National Cathedral, Ford's remains will be taken to Grand Rapids, Mich., where he will be interred Wednesday in a hillside tomb on the grounds of his presidential museum.

Ford was the accidental president, the only one never elected on a national ticket, yet he served as an important transitional figure in a time of profound cynicism. An Eagle Scout, football player, lawyer, Navy officer and congressman, he never aspired to the White House but had it thrust upon him when he was chosen to succeed first Spiro T. Agnew, driven from the vice presidency by corruption charges, and then Richard M. Nixon, who resigned amid the Watergate scandal on Aug. 9, 1974.

Ford's first major act in office probably guaranteed that he would not keep it, as his decision to pardon Nixon triggered a political backlash and widespread suspicion that he had cut a deal to take over the presidency. He denied the allegation and insisted that the pardon was the only way to move the country beyond Watergate.

It took many years, even decades, but even some of his fiercest critics came to agree. Roger Wilkins, then a New York Times editorial writer who repeatedly condemned Ford over the pardon, wrote a letter to the former president just last month to say he had changed his mind. Then Wilkins delivered a speech at the Ford museum earlier this month saying the same thing.

"Ford was right," Wilkins said in an interview. "The country really needed to move on. The picture of a president in the dock with these motley Democrats hounding him, it would have made the country -- we'd gone through some ugly times, but it would have been uglier. . . . If Ford hadn't done a thing else in his presidency, that would have been a great service to the country."

DOJ_NMG_0109842

Other Democrats have come around to the same conclusion. At the time, Rep. David Obey (Wis.) said yesterday, he thought the pardon was "the absolutely wrong thing to do." But now, Obey said, he realizes Ford "served as a healing agent for the country."

Gracious if not always graceful, Ford by the time he died had achieved stature and respect that eluded him in office. The amiable klutz lampooned on "Saturday Night Live" had become transformed into a symbol of decency and moderation, a throwback to a time when Republicans and Democrats would fight by day and share cocktails and war stories by night.

"He was a man who was willing to work with Democrats when and where and how he could," said Rep. John D. Dingell, a Democrat who served in the Michigan delegation with Ford. "He played golf with Tip O'Neill. After he was elevated to the presidency, we worked very closely together on energy matters -- we had huge fights, but worked together. He was a man who was very careful in his personal conduct and so his fights lent respect to him."

Ford never forgot his humble roots, famously presenting himself as "a Ford, not a Lincoln." He was not even born a Ford. His original name was Leslie Lynch King Jr., but his parents divorced and he was renamed Gerald R. Ford Jr. for his mother's second husband. After attending the University of Michigan and starring on its football team, he turned down offers from the Green Bay Packers and Chicago Bears and eventually graduated from Yale Law School. Ford served nearly four years in the Navy during World War II before returning to Michigan to run for the House.

Ford worked his way up to House minority leader, making him an easily confirmable choice as the first vice president appointed under the 25th Amendment, which set rules for filling vacancies.

Upon taking over the Oval Office, he declared, "Our long national nightmare is over." But Watergate was not the only crisis awaiting him.

"When Nixon resigned, Congress was in session, the fighting was going on in Vietnam. He had to form a government with no transition time," said Robert A. Goldwin, who worked for Ford as a special consultant and is now an American Enterprise Institute scholar. "So it wasn't a situation where you could be thinking of long-term plans with so many urgent matters not under your control."

Ford ended U.S. involvement in Vietnam, brokered a cease-fire between Israel and Egypt, signed the Helsinki human rights convention and an arms-control treaty with the Soviet Union, and dispatched Marines to free the crew of a merchant vessel captured by Cambodian communists. He survived two assassination attempts. But he could never pull the country out of the economic troubles he inherited.

"He left a fine example of a president who did what he felt was right whatever the political consequences," said James Cannon, his biographer and former aide. "What he inherited was a series of problems. He inherited a recession, the worst since the Great Depression. He inherited Vietnam, which four presidents had been unable to end, and he ended it -- raggedly, but he ended it. Most of all, he restored the integrity of the presidency."

At a time of high inflation and rising unemployment, Ford saw the economy as "job one," said John Robert Greene, a historian at Cazenovia College in Upstate New York who has written five books on Ford. "It defined his domestic agenda." By his first winter in office, Ford had proposed an end to Nixon-era price controls, combined with tax cuts, a policy of no new spending and caps on federal salaries.

In dealing with an overwhelmingly Democratic Congress, Ford relied on his veto pen as a legislative strategy, rejecting an astonishing number of bills -- 66 in all -- many of which were economic and tax measures he viewed as fiscally irresponsible. "He was the most prolific vetoer in our history," said Rebecca Deen, a political scientist at the University of Texas at Arlington.

The energy crisis of the 1970s also consumed his attention. Ford's energy policy was part of his broad faith in the deregulation that was coming into fashion in conservative circles. And he was a believer in states' rights, Greene said, ordering federal officials not to intervene in Boston's crisis over school desegregation or New York City's fiscal emergency.

Ford, who always said his greatest ambition was to be speaker of the House, waged a vigorous campaign in 1976 to hold on to the White House, barely beating back a nomination challenge from the right in the form of Reagan. But he could not overcome the travails of his tenure to beat Carter in the fall.

Reagan briefly explored the idea of making Ford his vice presidential running mate in 1980. Ford settled into a long post-presidency serving on corporate boards, playing in charity golf tournaments and occasionally teaming up with onetime rival Carter for bipartisan statements.

The tributes poured in yesterday. Vice President Cheney, who served as his chief of staff, saluted Ford's "strength, wisdom, and good judgment" and said, "He was a dear friend and mentor to me until this very day."

Former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who served Ford in the same capacity, hailed his "great decency and towering integrity." Former president George H.W. Bush, who served as Ford's CIA director and envoy to China, called him "one of the most decent and capable men I ever met."

DOJ_NMG_0109843

But the words Ford might have appreciated most came from former senator Robert J. Dole, his 1976 running mate. "He was a friend to everyone who met him," Dole said. "He had no enemies."

He Led By Listening (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — After Gerald R. Ford became president in 1974, he assembled a staff of strong, brilliant and highly opinionated personalities. Ford's most enduring legacy, some have argued, is the people he brought into power, including Donald H. Rumsfeld, Dick Cheney, Brent Scowcroft and James A. Baker III.

Under three Republican presidents, it is a group that has shaped U.S. foreign policy through the end of the Cold War and its aftermath, nowhere more than during the presidency of George W. Bush, where Rumsfeld and Cheney helped set the course for a war on terrorism and the invasion of Iraq.

"I've talked to people over and over again, and if there is such a thing as a Republican national security apparatus in personnel, they're all Gerald Ford's people," said Scowcroft, who replaced Henry Kissinger as national security advisor in the Ford years. "That's pretty remarkable."

Despite the continuity of the personnel, the way they made policy under Ford and the current president could not be more different, say officials familiar with both administrations. And that contrast has drawn attention as critics have probed the judgments that led to an Iraq war that is increasingly troubled.

In seeking answers to problems, Ford — a veteran of more than two decades of debate in the House of Representatives — relished the give-and-take of open and sometimes heated debate. He would force the strong egos that surrounded him to make their case in person during lengthy White House sessions, where he would constantly question the most minute details.

James T. Lynn, Ford's budget director, recalled one particularly heated discussion among Cabinet members in front of Ford, which ended with the president thanking both sides and retreating to the Oval Office: "I had to go back into the president's office with him, and he turned to me and said, 'Wasn't that fun?' "

Said L. William Seidman, a top Ford economic advisor, "I worked for three or four presidents, and I think more than any other president, [Ford] was determined that all views be presented to him before he made a decision. I think it's very clear in the early days of the Bush administration, they did not have a process like that, and you had people like [Secretary of State Colin L.] Powell saying the State Department never had a chance to present to the president what would happen after the war started."

Critics have cited the Bush team's strong ideological position on Iraq from its earliest days, and questioned why faulty assumptions about that nation's unconventional weapons program and its reaction to a U.S. military occupation were not more vigorously challenged before an invasion was launched.

Presidential historians and former Ford aides warn that too much can be made of the comparison in White House management styles. Bush, they contend, appears to be listening to more outside voices, particularly in his recent rethinking of Iraq policy. And Ford's White House in his early months as president was a place of contention between holdovers from the Nixon administration and former House aides who moved down Pennsylvania Avenue.

In building his administration, Ford aides said, the former president brought in skilled advisors of varied ideological backgrounds. In addition to up-and-comers like Cheney and Rumsfeld — who worked closely with Ford when they were fellow congressmen — Ford tapped for his Cabinet leading intellects such as University of Chicago president Edward H. Levi, who became Ford's attorney general, and William T. Coleman Jr., a distinguished civil rights lawyer who became Transportation secretary.

Ford, they said, was comfortable with being less knowledgeable than his advisors and was unthreatened by strongly voiced disagreements. Unlike almost any subsequent president, Ford was able to create a White House that was open to dissent. To this day, Ford alumni meet annually.

"I know that my friends in the Carter administration said they could never do anything like this, and the Reagan people didn't because there were such rivalries and contests," said James Cannon, a domestic policy advisor to Ford who went on to write one of the few biographies of the former president.

The comparisons with Bush's style first broke into the public debate two years ago. Paul O'Neill, a senior official in the Ford White House's budget office who three decades later became Bush's Treasury secretary, cooperated with author Ron Suskind on a book that made critical contrasts between the two presidents.

DOJ_NMG_0109844

In Suskind's book "The Price of Loyalty," O'Neill described Ford as a man comfortable around strong personalities, like Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and James R. Schlesinger, his first Defense secretary — a trait O'Neill attributed to a quiet self-confidence mixed with a non-ideological approach to finding solutions.

In one passage, O'Neill recalled a meeting with Bush in the Oval Office in which he recounted to the president an economic conference he helped set up shortly after Ford took office, a forum featuring economists, business executives and labor leaders with widely differing views on fiscal policy.

"Ford was really good at the meeting," O'Neill recalled telling Bush. "He showed that he was attentive and really knowledgeable about all competing positions." Bush agreed to hold an economic conference of his own, but instead of opposing experts, attendees would almost universally be Bush supporters, and many were political donors. "It'll just be a lot of people reading from a script that says, 'I love the president,' " O'Neill told his staff when he saw the invitation list, according to Suskind's account. "Where, exactly, does that fit in the grand American ideal of free and honest inquiry?"

Stephen Hess, a presidential scholar at the Brookings Institution, argued that O'Neill's view of Ford's presidency is somewhat idealized, and that Ford's White House did not become well functioning until the last months of his presidency.

Bush administration officials have dismissed O'Neill's criticism as the result of bitterness over his dismissal. "Paul has had his say," said Cheney in 2004. "I disagree with his analysis, obviously…. I feel badly for him, to some extent, that he has ended his career on this note."

Other Ford White House veterans, many of whom asked not to be named because they did not want to appear critical of Bush, say they share O'Neill's view of the contrasts.

"The difference is, Ford was looking for answers to questions; he was looking for a way to formulate policy and what policies would work," said one Ford alumnus who has discussed the issue with counterparts in the Bush administration. "These guys came in, and they knew what they wanted to do. They wanted people just to execute. They didn't want to debate."

To the Ford veterans, rigorous internal debates were a model that Bush was ignoring.

According to Suskind, what troubled O'Neill, along with then-Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, who had been chairman of Ford's Council of Economic Advisors, and some other Ford alumni, "was how the order was reversed, how discussions of desired messages seemed to come first and real policy debates came later as justification, or never. That made them fearful."

Ford's Touch As A Mentor Is Part Of Legacy As Leader (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The public's most vivid memories of the late president Gerald Ford may well be his pardon of his predecessor, Richard Nixon, and the gleeful imitations of Ford that comedian Chevy Chase used to do on Saturday Night Live.

But the nation's 38th president, who will lie in state this weekend in the U.S. Capitol where he served most of his political career, left a less heralded but far more enduring legacy in the form of the people he attracted to public service.

Ford's "flair for finding really good people," in the words of Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, has extended his influence far beyond the day his three-year tenure ended in 1977.

Many whose careers Ford launched or nurtured are still in government and shaping policy today. Several Ford advisers played key roles in the administration of President Bush; other protégés will be leaders in the Congress that convenes next month.

Vice President Cheney, a former colleague from the U.S. House, served as White House chief of staff to Ford. In a statement Wednesday, Cheney alluded to the time after Ford replaced President Nixon in the wake of revelations about the Watergate scandal.

Ford "assumed the nation's highest office during the greatest constitutional crisis since the Civil War," Cheney said about the man he called his mentor. "In that troubled era, America needed strength, wisdom and good judgment, and those qualities came to us in the person of Gerald R. Ford."

Recently retired Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld was another congressional colleague who served as Defense secretary for Ford. In Congress, Rumsfeld had managed the campaign that resulted in Ford ousting the more conservative Charles Halleck of Indiana as House Republican leader in 1965.

Ford launched James Baker on a career that would see him serve as an adviser to three presidents. Baker, an undersecretary of Commerce in Ford's administration, later became later secretary of Treasury for Ronald Reagan and secretary of State for George H.W. Bush. Now, he's advising the current president on Iraq.

Another Ford find: Alan Greenspan, who retired this year after 18 years as chairman of the Federal Reserve. "Ford really brought Alan into government," said Hutchison, a friend of both men. Greenspan, who served as chairman of Ford's council of economic advisers, called the former president "the most decent man I have ever encountered."

Ford got one appointment to the Supreme Court, in 1975, and he is still there. John Paul Stevens, 86, is now the oldest justice. In a statement, Stevens said Ford "was a wise president who had the courage to make unpopular decisions that would serve the country's best interests in the long run. Time has proven that his decision to pardon Richard Nixon was such a decision."

The fact that Ford alumni include Cheney and Rumsfeld, now viewed as arch-conservatives, as well as Stevens, one of the court's most liberal members, speaks volumes about the former president, according to those who knew him.

"That's Jerry Ford," said former senator Alan Simpson, a friend of nearly 50 years. "He has a big wingspan. There are a lot of people who fly under the spread of that eagle."

It was Ford who, as Republican House leader, urged George H.W. Bush to run for Congress. Later, as president, he appointed him head the CIA. "I owe much of my life in politics to Jerry Ford," Bush, the father of the current president, said Wednesday. "He campaigned for me in '66, and I won. Then he gave me the great assignment of being equivalent of ambassador in China."

Two relatively junior Ford appointees, Paul O'Neill and John Snow, both served as Treasury secretary for the current president.

"He's got the most magnificent set of alumni, in my opinion, of any president since George Washington," said James Cannon, who served as Ford's domestic policy adviser and later wrote a book about his administration, Time and Chance.

Ford's influence spanned generations. Hutchison, who now holds a Senate GOP leadership position, says Ford was a trailblazer when it came to promoting the careers of women. "He gave me my first real major federal appointment," said the senator, who served as vice chair of the National Transportation Safety Board under Ford.

Ford battled other forms of discrimination. Rod Hills, who served as Ford's chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, said the former president excoriated U.S. bankers and Saudi officials when he learned they were excluding financial services firms with historic ties to Jewish families from participating in Saudi loan issues.

Ford appointed William Coleman, an African-American, to head the Transportation Department and backed him when Coleman insisted that half of the stations on Atlanta's MARTA commuter rail systems be designed by black architects. "The president was very effective in that," Coleman said.

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., said Ford, the Republican House leader, took an interest in him when Lott was working for Rep. William Colmer, D-Miss.

When Colmer died in office in 1980, Ford called Lott and urged him to run to succeed his boss — as a Republican. He also sent him a campaign contribution.

It was a classic example not only of Ford's ability to spot political talent — Lott will serve as the deputy Republican leader of the Senate next year — but of his ability to reach across the divides of party and social status. "I was 28 years old," Lott said. "He took the time to be friendly to me; he didn't just ignore me as a piece of furniture which often happens up here with staffers."

Ford's remains will lie this weekend on the Lincoln catafalque, the velvet-covered bier that was built to hold Abraham Lincoln's coffin. It has been used ever since as a resting place for those honored in the Rotunda of the Capitol. It's a lofty end for a man who endeared himself to members of Congress when he told them, moments after being sworn in as president, "I'm a Ford, not a Lincoln."

That lack of pretentiousness was one of the qualities that drew people to him, those who worked for Ford said. Frank Zarb, who served as Ford's energy czar and later went on to chair NASDAQ, the nation's largest electronic stock market, remembered when Ford realized he had forgotten his cufflinks moments before a TV appearance. He coolly paper-clipped his cuffs together, and told his aides: "Let's go," Zarb said.

Former Defense secretary Melvin Laird, another former House colleague and longtime Ford friend, was with him the night Ford learned that he would become president. Laird says Ford spent the evening sitting on the floor of his suburban Virginia home explaining the situation to his children.

When Nixon was about to fire Agnew as his vice president, Laird enlisted members of Congress to convince the president to replace him with Ford, Laird said in an interview. The main reason: Laird knew that the vice president soon might replace Nixon himself.

"I loved Jerry. I respected him. I admired him. I knew he was a straight shooter," Laird said.

Those feelings reflected Ford's own management style. Robert Hartmann, a counselor in Ford's White House, said his old boss had two rules: "Never look down on anybody and always be good to your friends."

DOJ_NMG_0109846

Some of those friends included Democrats. "He loved Tip O'Neill," said Simpson, referring to the late Democratic speaker of the House.

Both Lott and Bob Michel, who served in the House Republican leadership after Ford, said they modeled their own efforts to reach bipartisan compromise after Ford. "I learned a lot from his stewardship," Michel said.

The most senior member of the House, Democrat John Dingell, served 17 years with Ford in the Michigan delegation and considered him a friend and a tough competitor. As president, Ford vetoed bills passed by the Democratic-controlled Congress 66 times, Dingell said, but added: "We could work with him."

Ford served as "a balance point between the increasingly conservative wing of the Republican Party and the more liberal wing," said presidential historian Carl Sferrazza Anthony. "He was always seeking middle ground."

Ford's White House was free of the "leaks and internal bickering" that have characterized many administrations, Zarb said. "He's a man who had the extraordinary confidence to surround himself with excellent people," Zarb said. "Those persons became a team with an extraordinary chemistry."

That loyalty was evident at the annual reunions that Ford staffers held to fete the former president.

At the last one, the former president and his wife, Betty, unable to stand for the entire receiving line, gamely propped themselves on barstools so they could pose with their guests for photos, Michel said.

Ford even won over another up-and-comer whose career he inadvertently advanced. "He was a really sweet man," said Chevy Chase, a self-described liberal who became friends with the former president because of his SNL imitations.

To the end, Laird said, Ford never failed in his concern for others. Laird, who had his last conversation with the ailing former president a week ago, said that Ford told him: "Mel, I've got to hang on to Christmas. The whole family is going to be here."

Praise Pours In For Ford; State Funeral Plans Underway (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman And Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The funeral of Gerald R. Ford will begin Friday in California, then move here for a state funeral before the 38th president of the United States is buried in his home state of Michigan, a family spokesman said today.

Ford, who died in his home at Rancho Mirage on Tuesday, will begin his final trip from St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in nearby Palm Desert, family spokesman Gregory D. Willard told an afternoon news conference.

President Bush led the tributes and praise from government leaders and California neighbors that poured in to the family throughout the day.

"My family and I are touched beyond words by the outpouring of affection and the many wonderful tributes we have received following the death of my husband," said Ford's widow, Betty, in a prepared statement read at an afternoon news conference by family representative Gregory D. Willard.

"The nation's appreciation for the contributions that President Ford made throughout his long and well lived life are more than we could have ever anticipated. These kindnesses have made this difficult time more bearable. On behalf of all of the Ford family, we are deeply grateful," she stated.

According to Willard, the casket carrying Ford's body will arrive at St. Margaret's after noon at Friday. At 12:30 p.m., there will be a private prayer service.

Public repose will begin at about 4:20 p.m.

On Saturday, the casket will be moved to Washington. The motorcade from the airport will pause at the World War II memorial in tribute to former Navy officer.

The state funeral will be conducted in the Capitol Rotunda that evening and after that, the public will be able to pay its respects.

Ford will be the 11th president to lie in state in the Capitol Rotunda. The Rotunda has been used for public viewing since Henry Clay died in 1852. Last year civil rights pioneer Rosa Parks was honored there – the first woman and only second African American to lie in state at the Capitol.

Ford's body will lie in repose outside the House of Representatives where he served for 25 years and outside the main entrance to the Senate chamber, a nod to his legislative career that led to his appointment as vice president and his promotion to president when Richard Nixon left office in disgrace.

Ford was expected to lie in state until Tuesday morning when the body will be taken for a service at the National Cathedral. From there it will be flown to the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum in Grand Rapids, Mich.

Burial will be the following day at hillside near the museum, Willard said.

DOJ_NMG_0109847

President Bush earlier ordered that American flags fly at half-staff at the White House and on all U.S. buildings in honor of Ford as politicians on both sides of the aisle praised the 38th president as the leader who tried to ease the country past a troubled period.

"As a congressman from Michigan, and then as Vice President, he commanded the respect and earned the good will of all who had the privilege of knowing him," President Bush said this morning of Ford in Crawford, Texas.

"On August 9, 1974, he stepped into the presidency without ever having sought the office. He assumed power in a period of great division and turmoil. For a nation that needed healing and for an office that needed a calm and steady hand, Gerald Ford came along when we needed him most."

In Grand Rapids, the Gerald R. Ford Museum opened its lobby for 24 hours, so that well wishers could offer condolences. And in New York, the Stock Exchange held two minutes of silence before the start of trading and Nasdaq asked traders to refrain from making trades during that time.

Both Republicans and Democrats praised Ford.

"An outstanding statesman," said former President Jimmy Carter, who defeated Ford in 1976. "One of the kindest, most sincere elected officials whom I have known," said Sen. Robert Byrd of West Virginia.

"Made Michigan proud as he led our nation through one of the most challenging times in our history," said Sen. Debbie Stabenow of Michigan.

"No man could have been better suited to the task of healing our nation and restoring faith in our government," said California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger.

"When he left office, he had restored public trust in the presidency," said Vice President Cheney, who served as Ford's White House chief of staff.

"A good man who became the respected leader of the free world in unique times," said Patricia Nixon Cox, daughter of the man Ford succeeded. "An American hero whose integrity and honesty helped lead our nation through times of uncertainty and skepticism."

Many praised Ford for his moderate views and consensus approach to governance.

Log Cabin Republicans, the nation's largest gay GOP organization, said that Ford always believe in inclusiveness in welcoming gays into the party and advocating equal rights for them. "President Ford recognized that all Americans deserve to be treated with dignity and fairness," said Log Cabin Republican President Patrick Sammon. "Throughout his presidency, President Ford served with integrity as a leader for all Americans."

And former first lady Nancy Reagan, in a statement, said that Ford's support for stem cell research his early support of stem cell research was important "in getting the U.S. Congress to debate the potential lifesaving cures and treatments that may result."

A creature of Capitol Hill – Ford served in Congress for 25 years – he was also the last of the moderate Republicans who, like his Vice President Nelson Rockefeller, aimed for the center. As a result, fond memories and warm tributes came from both Republicans and Democrats today.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said "Gerald Ford did not seek the presidency, but it was thrust upon him. And as he said, he did not 'shirk' those responsibilities. He helped heal the nation and close the wounds of the past. President Ford will be remembered for putting the good of the nation above his own personal, political fortunes. It is this type of public service that should be a model for all who follow."

Sen. Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) said: "President Ford restored transparency to the White House. He did what he thought was right and explained his actions without spin. By showing himself as a regular guy who happened to achieve great things, he brought renewed respect to the presidency when the country really needed it. I was a freshman in Congress when he was president. During his presidency and many times afterward, whenever I talked to him, he was an all-American, regular guy."

The Michigan delegation also praised their former colleague. Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), put out a statement saying, "Gerald Ford and I came from different sides of the aisle, but we forged a wonderful friendship as we served Michigan together in the House of Representatives. When his nation called on him to serve this country in the most difficult of times, he rose up and held the country together. It will certainly be his legacy. I will remember him fondly and I will miss him dearly."

Another Michigan colleague, Democratic Sen. Carl Levin said, "Gerald Ford was deeply respected on both sides of the political aisle for his fairness, his bipartisanship, and his integrity. He helped smooth out the rough edges of politics. Over time, we will honor his memory in many ways, but one immediate way is to return the Gerald Ford quality of civility to the nation's capital."

Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson also issued a statement, noting that "before the world knew him as president, vice president or congressman, Gerald Ford served our nation proudly in the Navy during World War II. Even after ascending to the highest office in the land, President Ford kept a military man's perspective and never forgot what it meant to serve his nation.

DOJ_NMG_0109848

Aptly, he once said, 'The presidency and the vice-presidency were not prizes to be won, but a duty to be done.' President Ford spent a lifetime answering the call to duty.'"

Gerald Ford, Reconciler-in-chief (CSM)

The Christian Science Monitor, December 28, 2006

It was a time of deep division and political uncertainty in America. Gerald Ford tried to bridge the chasm of enmity with a plain-spoken reminder: The Constitution works; the US is a nation of law, not men. As he delivered his remarks, several of the listeners teared up.

This could have been from his inaugural address in 1974, when President Ford declared the "long national nightmare" of the Watergate scandal over, and spoke of "truth" as "the glue that holds government together." But the occasion was more recent: the 200th-anniversary celebration of the first White House. The event just happened to fall as Al Gore was calling for a hand recount in Florida in an unresolved presidential election that was turning into its own nightmare.

The formal dinner party in the White House East Room on Nov. 9, 2000, was "providential," Mr. Ford stated calmly. The anniversary brought together four presidents who had been bitter rivals, but who joined amicably that evening in honoring something bigger than individuals and their campaigns.

Gerald Ford, who died on Tuesday, led a political life of conscience and comity. These qualities helped heal a nation after President Nixon resigned for covering up a 1972 break-in at Democratic headquarters. Ford pardoned his disgraced predecessor early on, explaining that his "conscience" told him that he could not "prolong the bad dreams that continue to reopen a chapter that is closed."

The pardon brought howls of criticism from all sides, but as the years passed, it has come to be viewed as the right thing to do. Ford himself believed that his greatest achievement was the healing of national division caused by Watergate.

Ford's candor and amicability are sorely needed in Washington politics today, given the steadily rising shrill, partisan tone. One might be tempted to think that the Ford way was unique to his situation - a president never elected to the Oval Office, and as a result, freer to be his own man. But his life shows a consistency of approach from his earliest days in politics.

In 1948, he successfully ran for the US House as an "internationalist," seeking the best role for America in the world. That played out later in his controversial presidential decision to back the Helsinki Accords with the Soviet Union - a move that again proved wise in the long run, because it encouraged dissidents to demand that Moscow live up to its Helsinki human rights commitments.

As the House Republican minority leader, he refused to discipline party members who crossed the leadership. Punishment is "counterproductive," he said. "That person knows that he disappointed you. To rub it in makes it, the next time,... impossible to get his cooperation."

Ford had a rough time as president. He was unable to tame nearly 12 percent inflation, and he presided over the fall of Saigon. He lost narrowly to Democrat Jimmy Carter in the bitterly contested election of 1976, in part because of the Nixon pardon.

And yet Ford and Carter later became friends. With his typical offbeat humor, he brought a little levity to the White House party in 2000: "Take it from someone who knows all about losing a close election," Ford quipped. "There is life after [leaving office]."

Certainly his was a full and exemplary life.

Unassuming Ford Was Perfect Salve For A Wounded Nation (USAT)

USA Today, December 28, 2006

It's hard to imagine an English muffin being an important part of governing. But it was for Gerald Ford.

In 1974, after the trauma of Watergate, the nation yearned for a less imperial presence in the White House, and Ford was determined to fill that role. Taking office after the resignation of Richard M. Nixon, he re-established a sense of normalcy in part by being an everyman president. On his first day he made his own breakfast and announced he would do so in future.

Over the years, it has been easy to dismiss this as a trivial photo opportunity. It has also been easy to dismiss the Ford presidency as merely adequate, if that. Both assessments have been proven wrong.

Ford, who died Tuesday at 93, was a fine president who returned integrity to the White House and restored faith in government at a time when both were desperately needed. He was the right man at the right time to lead the nation. He was the perfect antidote to the corruption and paranoia of the Nixon White House. And for that, the nation owes him much.

His abrupt yet courageous pardon of Nixon, while clearly damaging to his political career, is increasingly seen as having been in the country's best interest. It spared the nation years more of wallowing in Watergate and the likely spectacle of an ex-president going to prison. Only one-third of the public supported the decision at the time but, by 2002, that number had risen to three-fifths in an ABC News poll.

Ford's largest accomplishment, however, was in being the embodiment of a phrase he used in his speech after he took the oath of office: "A government of laws, not of men."

Ford's style was understated, unglamorous. Though an accomplished athlete, by 1975 he had even developed an underserved reputation for clumsiness, and was lampooned weekly on Saturday Night Live by actor Chevy Chase. Combined with the Nixon pardon, an inflationary economy not of his making and weariness with Republican rule, it is perhaps inevitable he would lose when he ran for the office in his own right in 1976 against Jimmy Carter.

But in hindsight, his down-to-earth ways look good. In the weeks after taking office, they were a salve on the open wound left by the Nixon presidency. And they stack up well against some of the more ego-driven and polished presidencies that preceded and followed his.

Sadly, it's unlikely we will have another president like Ford any time soon. Today's presidential candidates are ruthless in their pursuit of the office and possess a willingness to spend years campaigning and raising millions of dollars.

Ford, who never even aspired to be anything higher than Speaker of the House, lacked these traits. Nor did he have a particular talent at being rigidly partisan or vindictive.

He was only an outstanding public servant. Wise yet humble, he possessed a keen sense of what America needed after Watergate. That included a president who didn't require a bevy of servants to make his breakfast.

After Ford's Death, Tributes Are Set For Capital (NYT)

By David Stout And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 27 — The body of former President Gerald R. Ford will lie in the Capitol this weekend amid tributes marked by considerably less pageantry than the funeral of former President Ronald Reagan in 2004, Congressional officials said Wednesday.

Services for Mr. Ford, the 38th president, who died late Tuesday, will begin Friday in Palm Desert, Calif., with private prayers for the family at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church, Gregory D. Willard, a Ford family spokesman, said at a news conference.

The next day, his body will be flown to Washington. The hearse is to pause at the World War II Memorial on the National Mall in recognition of Mr. Ford's naval service in the Pacific. His state funeral is to be conducted on Saturday evening in the Capitol Rotunda, after which the public will be allowed to file by the coffin.

A service will be held next Tuesday in the Washington National Cathedral.

After the cathedral service, Mr. Ford's body will be flown to Grand Rapids, Mich., where he got his start in national politics. The next day, after services at Grace Episcopal Church there, he will be interred on a hillside near his presidential museum. (Mr. Ford's presidential library is at Ann Arbor, Mich.)

Two senior Congressional officials familiar with the plans for the services said these would include the full military honors that accompany a state funeral. But the officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said the plans called for a less elaborate ceremony inside the Capitol and leading up to the service than the proceedings for Reagan.

In an unusual feature meant to highlight Mr. Ford's long service in Congress, his body is to lie in repose outside the main door of the House of Representatives and, later, outside the main door of the Senate, said Mr. Willard, the family spokesman.

"I know personally how much those two tributes themselves meant to President Ford," Mr. Willard said. Mr. Willard and Terry O'Donnell, who both worked in the Ford White House and remained close to the former president, are organizing the services.

More than most presidents, Gerald Ford was a man of the Congress. He was Republican leader in the House, denied his dream of being speaker by his party's long minority status decades ago. As vice president, he was the president of the Senate.

Like Reagan, who never served in Congress, Mr. Ford was a son of the Midwest. But by personal inclination and design, Mr. Ford was less a performer than Reagan, and he seemed far more comfortable with plain language and a minimum of trappings.

Public officials and politicians of all persuasions were united Wednesday in praising Mr. Ford as a man who could be partisan without being polarizing and as a throwback, in a way, to a time when Republicans and Democrats battled during the day and afterward enjoyed one another's friendship.

"The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character and the honorable conduct of his administration," President Bush said at his ranch in Crawford, Tex., as he ordered American flags at the White House and "all buildings, grounds, and naval vessels of the United States" flown at half-staff for 30 days.

DOJ_NMG_0109850

It was not clear Wednesday evening whether Mr. Bush intended to fly to Washington from his Texas ranch to attend the Saturday evening service at the Capitol. The president's schedule was to be announced Thursday.

Democrats, too, remembered Mr. Ford with affection.

"To his great credit, he was the same hard-working, down-to-earth person the day he left the White House as he was when he first entered Congress almost 30 years earlier," former President Bill Clinton and his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, said in a joint statement.

Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, called Mr. Ford "a healer" who unified the nation after the ordeal of Watergate. "But we in Michigan hold Jerry Ford in affection and esteem for his lifetime of service, including 13 terms in the House of Representatives," Mr. Levin said. "We take particular pride in this son of Michigan and the manner in which he always treasured his West Michigan roots."

"Over time," Mr. Levin added, "we will honor his memory in many ways, but one immediate way is to return the Gerald Ford quality of civility to the nation's capital."

The state funeral for Mr. Ford, details of which were still being worked out, will be only the third in 34 years. Reagan's state funeral in Washington was the first since former President Lyndon B. Johnson's in January 1973.

And Harry S. Truman was laid to rest in his native Missouri in 1972 after a minimum of pomp. For those who like presidential trivia, Truman also died on Dec. 26. Like Mr. Ford, Truman was a man of Middle America who inherited the presidency, was unpopular for a time and was willing to let history be the final judge.

Presidents, former presidents and presidents-elect are entitled to a state funeral, which include military pallbearers, military music, gun salutes, a flag-covered coffin and other embellishments. They are typically attended by kings, queens, prime ministers and other high foreign officials. Perhaps the most famous state funeral in United States history — and an indelible memory for those of a certain age — was that for President John F. Kennedy in 1963.

Some presidents and their families have chosen less elaborate farewells. Richard M. Nixon, driven from office by the scandals that vaulted Mr. Ford to the White House, was buried in a simple ceremony at his presidential library in Yorba Linda, Calif., in 1994. The rites for Franklin D. Roosevelt were held at the family home in Hyde Park, N.Y.

Justice John Paul Stevens, whom Mr. Ford nominated for the Supreme Court in 1975, called him "a wise president who had the courage to make unpopular decisions that would serve the country's best interests in the long run."

"Time has proved that his decision to pardon Richard Nixon was such a decision," Justice Stevens said in a statement issued by the court. "We mourn his passing but remember his all-American career with admiration, affection and total respect."

Justice Stevens's "all-American" allusion was to Gerald Ford's football prowess at the University of Michigan. Mr. Ford was the frequent butt of jokes about his supposed clumsiness, even though he was among the most athletically gifted of presidents.

Justice Stevens is the only member of the Supreme Court to be chosen by Mr. Ford, and he is now the longest serving. Vice President Dick Cheney and former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld both served as chief of staff to President Ford.

"President Ford was a man of great decency and towering integrity," Mr. Rumsfeld said Wednesday. "He was a patriot who left a budding law career to join the United States Navy in World War II. I was privileged to serve with him in the Congress and saw firsthand his pride in our country and his deep respect for our system of government."

Ford's State Funeral Begins Friday (AP)

By Calvin Woodward

AP, December 28, 2006

Gerald R. Ford's state funeral will begin Friday in his beloved California, with the late president then to lie in state in the U.S. Capitol over the weekend, a family representative said Wednesday.

Giving the first details of funeral arrangements for the 38th president, family representative Gregory D. Willard said events will last until Wednesday, when Ford will be interred in a hillside tomb near his presidential museum in his home state of Michigan.

Ceremonies begin Friday, with a private prayer service for the family at St. Margaret's Church in Palm Desert, Calif., visitation by friends and a period of public repose.

On Saturday, Ford's body will be flown to Washington in late afternoon, his hearse pausing at the World War II memorial in joint tribute to the wartime Navy reserve veteran and his comrades in uniform, Willard said.

The state funeral will be conducted in the Capitol Rotunda that evening and after that, the public will be able to file in to pay last respects. Ford was expected to lie in state until Tuesday morning.

In a departure from tradition meant to highlight Ford's long service in Congress, his body will lie in repose outside the main door of the House and, later, outside the main doors of the Senate chamber.

"I know personally how much those two tributes themselves meant to President Ford," Willard said.

A Cross-country Goodbye For The 38th President (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, December 28, 2006

President Gerald Ford will lie in state this weekend in the U.S. Capitol Rotunda and have a state funeral Tuesday at Washington National Cathedral, a family spokesman said.

His final place of rest will be a hillside tomb in Grand Rapids, Mich., the city he lived in as a boy within the district he represented in Congress for a quarter-century, said family spokesman Gregory Willard.

President Bush will be among many dignitaries to attend the Washington service for Ford, who died Tuesday at age 93.

A cause of death was not disclosed, but Ford had been in declining health in recent years. In January, he was hospitalized for 12 days for pneumonia. In August, he underwent angioplasty at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn.

Speaking to reporters Wednesday before sunrise from his ranch in Crawford, Texas, Bush described Ford as "a man of complete integrity who led our country with common sense and kind instincts.

"Our 38th president will always have a special place in our nation's history," Bush said.

On Friday, a small, private ceremony will be held at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, Calif., near the Fords' home. The Rev. Robert Certain, the family's pastor, said the public would be invited to pay respects to Ford at the church later in the day.

On Saturday, Ford will be flown to Washington and lie in state through Tuesday morning. In a departure from tradition meant to highlight his long congressional service, Ford's remains will lie in repose outside the doors of both the House and Senate for short periods.

DOJ_NMG_0109852

Following services at the cathedral, Ford's casket will be returned to Grand Rapids. There, Ford will be buried on Wednesday in a tomb on the grounds of the Gerald R. Ford Museum. Ford represented Grand Rapids in Congress from 1949 until he was tapped as President Nixon's vice president in 1973.

Ford's grace and bipartisanship became the theme of the many tributes offered to him by Bush, former presidents Clinton, Carter and George H.W. Bush, and congressional leaders.

Ford will be the 11th president to lie in state. His funeral will not feature as much pageantry as that of President Reagan in 2004. Reagan's funeral was the first state funeral since Lyndon Johnson's in 1973, and his casket was carried in a funeral procession down Pennsylvania Avenue — an honor granted to only eight presidents. Funeral processions were held for all four presidents who were assassinated: Abraham Lincoln, James Garfield, William McKinley and John F. Kennedy.

Presidential funerals are painstakingly planned years in advance, with presidents typically participating in the decision-making. After a president dies, the U.S. Army Military District of Washington and the family handle the details.

Former Republican Senate majority leader Robert Dole of Kansas told CNN that he would be one of the honorary pallbearers.

In Michigan, mourners paid their respects at the Ford museum Wednesday. The museum said its lobby would remain open 24 hours a day until the burial.

Low-Key Services Planned In D.C. And Michigan For Modest President (WP)

By Steve Vogel

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

The body of Gerald R. Ford will arrive Saturday in Washington and lie in repose in the Capitol Rotunda, but in keeping with the unassuming former president's style, his state funeral will be as modest as such an affair can be.

Unlike the 2004 state funeral for Ronald Reagan, the funeral for Ford will include no horse-drawn caisson, no caparisoned horse and no grand military parade down Constitution Avenue. Instead, at the request of the family, the body of the nation's 38th president will be whisked by motorcade around town in a hearse.

"That's the decision of the family," said Army Col. James Yonts, a military spokesman for the command overseeing funeral arrangements.

Ford's death at 93 nonetheless triggered preparations both intricate and massive in and around Washington yesterday, with plans culminating in a funeral Tuesday morning at Washington National Cathedral.

After a private prayer service tomorrow in Palm Desert, Calif., Ford's body will be flown Saturday to Andrews Air Force Base in Prince George's County, with arrival expected about 5:20 p.m. A motorcade will take the former president's body to the Capitol via the Mall, pausing in tribute at the National World War II Memorial.

After arriving at the Capitol, the former president's casket will be carried up the east steps to the door of the House of Representatives, where Ford represented Michigan from 1949 to 1973.

At 7 p.m. Saturday, a service will be held in the Capitol Rotunda. Ford's body will continue to lie in state until Tuesday morning, allowing the public to pay last respects. The hours of visitation have not been announced.

On Tuesday morning, the casket will be moved from the Rotunda to the U.S. Senate, and following a departure ceremony on the east steps, taken by motorcade to Washington National Cathedral for a 10:30 a.m. funeral.

Ford's casket will be taken afterward to Andrews and flown to Grand Rapids, Mich., site of the Gerald R. Ford presidential museum. Services will be held Wednesday, followed by burial in a tomb on a hillside near the museum.

A special military task force created for the funeral began assembling key personnel at Fort McNair in Washington early in the morning yesterday, soon after Ford's death was reported.

The commander of the Joint Force Headquarters for the National Capital Region, Army Maj. Gen. Guy C. Swan III, departed from Andrews about 6 a.m. aboard a military aircraft with dozens of personnel on a flight to Palm Springs, Calif., near the Ford family home in Rancho Mirage. A second planeload left later in the morning.

"This is really the Super Bowl for the command, so these soldiers are ready," said Yonts, spokesman for the command.

About 3,000 to 4,000 service members in the Washington area are expected to be involved in the funeral.

Swan met with members of the Ford family beginning late in the morning yesterday to review existing plans that had been prepared with the involvement of the family, including the former president.

Ford was known for his consideration for others, and the funeral preparations reflect that, officials said. "The family is very sensitive to the approaching holiday weekend and a lot of key members of the leadership being out," Yonts said.

The military party sent to California includes an honor guard, chaplain and band members. They are preparing formal ceremonies to mark the casket's departure from Palm Springs and to greet it at Andrews.

DOJ_NMG_0109853

The task force, known as Joint Force Headquarters-National Capital Region, has established an operations center at Fort McNair that will be operating 24 hours a day for more than a week. The command has recalled some military personnel from holiday leave to begin the preparations. "We've asked them to cut leave short," Yonts said.

Military officials began coordinating road closings and security with National Park Service, U.S. Capitol and District police. The Capitol and Washington National Cathedral were showing signs of bustle and dash. "All those sites are starting to take on the look of activity," Yonts said.

The funeral plans prompted D.C. officials to push back the time of Tuesday's inauguration of Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty. Fenty decided to delay all inaugural ceremonies until after Ford's body leaves Washington.

The inauguration, and the swearing-in of D.C. Council members, had been set for 10 a.m. It now is tentatively set for 2 p.m. Fenty plans to go ahead with plans for an inaugural ball Tuesday night.

Ford Assassination Attempts Recalled (AP)

AP, December 28, 2006

In the fall of 1975, Gerald Ford's presidency was rocked by two assassination attempts within less than three weeks. The first took place on Sept. 5, 1975, in Sacramento, Calif., where Ford had spent the night at the Senator Hotel. The president arose early that day to address a group of about 1,000 California businessmen gathered at the hotel.

Ford then set out to walk across a broad expanse of lawn to the California statehouse to address the Legislature in a speech on crime.

"It was a nice, sunny morning and a crowd of about 500, many of them state employees, had gathered along the way to greet him," recalled The Associated Press' Howard Benedict, who was in the White House press pool that day.

"About five minutes after Ford left the hotel, all hell broke loose as several news people burst into the press room (on the first floor of the hotel) shouting things like, 'Someone pulled a gun on the president!' "

Walter Rodgers of AP Radio was among the first through the door, and he started dictating a story to his desk, Benedict said.

"I immediately relayed what he said to the San Francisco bureau, something like: 'A woman in a red dress pulled a gun on President Ford today, but she was wrestled to the ground by a Secret Service agent,'" Bennedict said.

Bennedict then ran out to the scene. The Secret Service had already hustled Ford into the statehouse, but agents "had the young woman pinned up against a tree, her hands behind her in handcuffs. I was struck by the fact that she was completely in red: long red dress, red bandanna and red shoes," Benedict said.

"The Secret Service said she had pulled a .45 caliber pistol while standing in the crowd about 4 feet from Ford and that her name was Lynette Fromme. She muttered something like: 'The gun didn't go off, it didn't go off. Can you believe it?' "

It was later determined that though the automatic pistol was loaded with five bullets, the slide had not been pulled to place a bullet in the firing chamber, making it impossible for the gun to fire.

Several women who witnessed the incident described it to Benedict:

"Ford was shaking hands with everyone and smiling when suddenly he turned ashen and froze as he saw the gun being raised only a few feet away. Then a Secret Service agent grabbed the woman with the gun and another hit Ford from behind, buckling his knees and knocking him to the ground. They got him on his feet and ran him to the Statehouse."

While relaying this information to AP's San Francisco bureau, Benedict mentioned the name Lynette Fromme.

"It brought an immediate response: 'Yeah, Squeaky. We've had run-ins with her before. She's a follower of Charles Manson, the one serving a life term for murder in San Quentin.' "

Meanwhile, reporters waited outside Gov. Jerry Brown's office with Secret Service agents while Ford and the governor conversed.

"Strangely, we learned later, Brown had not heard about the assassination attempt, and Ford did not mention it until one of his aides in the room brought it up about a half hour into the conversation," Benedict said.

But the legislators had heard, Benedict recalled, and they gave Ford a rousing reception when he walked into the chamber. Ford delivered his address on crime, but did not mention the Fromme incident.

In Washington, when Ford stepped off the helicopter from Andrews Air Force Base, the entire White House staff was on the lawn to give him a cheering return, Benedict said.

Fromme was convicted of attempted assassination of the president and is serving a life sentence.

The second assassination attempt occurred just 17 days later on Sept. 22, 1975 in San Francisco.

Ford had made a luncheon speech to a foreign affairs group at the St. Francis Hotel. The president then left the hotel to take the motorcade to the airport for the flight back to Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0109854

Benedict was in the press room inside the hotel, while AP's Frank Cormier was in the pool that was to accompany the president. Cormier was standing outside his motorcade car when Ford emerged from the hotel with the hotel manager.

"Suddenly, Bob Pierpoint of CBS rushed into the press room, shouting something like, 'You won't believe this, but somebody just took a shot at the president and they have rushed him off to Air Force One,' " Benedict said.

"I quickly dictated what Pierpoint had said, and the initial bulletin on the shooting quoted him.

"Meanwhile, Frank heard the shot and saw Secret Service agents push the president down. He quickly jumped into the motorcade car, grabbed his phone and dialed Washington, reaching the bureau just after the Pierpoint bulletin cleared. A swift ride to the airport and a quick boarding of Air Force One got the president safely away from San Francisco."

Later, Benedict learned from press briefings and interviews that the shooter was Sara Jane Moore, a middle-aged radical turned FBI informant who had been standing in a crowd about 40 feet from Ford as he emerged from the hotel.

As she raised her .38 caliber revolver to fire, Oliver Sipple, a disabled former U.S. Marine who was standing next to her. He quickly pushed up her arm as the gun discharged. The bullet flew over Ford's head by several feet, ricocheted off the side of the hotel and slightly wounded a cab driver in the crowd.

Moore pleaded guilty to attempted assassination of the president and was sentenced to life in prison. She escaped prison in 1989, but turned herself in two days later.

Infamous 'Drop Dead' Was Never Said By Ford (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

Gerald R. Ford and Marie Antoinette did not have much in common, but being misquoted cost both of them their jobs.

In Hollywood's latest biography of the French queen, she denies having callously suggested that breadless peasants eat cake instead. "I never said that," the actress Kirsten Dunst pouts. "I wonder why people keep saying I did."

Mr. Ford, on Oct. 29, 1975, gave a speech denying federal assistance to spare New York from bankruptcy. The front page of The Daily News the next day read: "FORD TO CITY: DROP DEAD."

Mr. Ford never explicitly said "drop dead." Yet those two words, arguably the essence of his remarks as encapsulated in the immortal headline, would, as he later acknowledged, cost him the presidency the following year, after Jimmy Carter, nominated by the Democrats in New York, narrowly carried the state.

"It more than annoyed me because it wasn't accurate," he recalled years later. "It was very unfair."

That view is echoed in an evolving version of historical revisionism. Only two months after saying or meaning or merely implying "drop dead" — or, perhaps, resorting to tough love by holding the city's feet to the fire — Mr. Ford signed legislation to provide federal loans to the city, which were repaid with interest.

Gov. Hugh L. Carey, among others, argues that Mr. Ford's public recalcitrance bought time for the city to make its case to an even more reluctant Congress. ("He told me he didn't have the votes," Mr. Carey recalled Mr. Ford saying.)

Moreover, the speech spurred New York's civic, business and labor leaders to rally bankers in the United States and abroad, who feared their own investments would be harmed if New York defaulted on its debt.

Mr. Ford was also an unlikely whipping boy. His resolve against profligacy was stiffened by more inviting villains, especially his treasury secretary, William E. Simon, whom even the president referred to as "hard-nosed."

Mr. Simon warned that bailing out the city would amount to nationalizing municipal debt and rewarding local officials who lacked the will to stanch the inevitable hemorrhaging inflicted by bankrupt liberalism. (The investment banker Felix G. Rohatyn, recruited by Mr. Carey to rescue the city, would liken default to "someone stepping into a tepid bath and slashing his wrists — you might not feel yourself dying, but that's what would happen").

The Ford administration's politically suicidal demands to city officials — raise transit fares, abolish rent control, scrap free tuition at the City University — prompted Victor Gotbaum, the municipal labor leader, to complain that Mr. Simon barely believed in government at all, except for police and fire protection, "and he's not sure about fire."

David R. Gergen, an assistant to Mr. Simon at the time and later a presidential adviser, recalled that Mr. Ford himself "was one of those moderate Republicans who actually liked New York" — he chose Nelson A. Rockefeller as his vice president — but that "he was offended by the city's profligate spending."

"The president's speechwriters whipped up one draft, and I was asked by the White House chief of staff to write an alternative version," Mr. Gergen said. "I wrote a hard-hitting piece, assuming that if it ever saw the light of day, the White House would, in the normal course, invite me to smooth the rough edges. Instead, someone plopped a few of my rough, unedited paragraphs into the final text."

In the speech, the president said: "The people of this country will not be stampeded. They will not panic when a few desperate New York officials and bankers try to scare New York's mortgage payments out of them."

DOJ_NMG_0109855

The speech had a powerful impact, Mr. Gergen said. “It was a doozy of a speech, but events caught both sides by surprise,” Mr. Gergen remembered. “New Yorkers had not foreseen how tough the president would be, and Republicans in Washington had not anticipated how angry the response would be.”

Howard J. Rubenstein, the public relations executive who was an adviser to Mayor Abraham D. Beame, recalled that the speech “galvanized New York like I’ve never seen before.” Mr. Rubenstein still has a framed copy of the headline on his office wall.

With 30 years’ hindsight, some of the players say that if Mr. Ford had acquiesced to the city’s appeals months or even weeks earlier, New York might never have recovered.

“Ford was good for New York, because he made us clean up our act,” said Henry J. Stern, a former parks commissioner and city councilman.

On balance, Mr. Rohatyn said, “I think he was a plus,” he said. “Ford did change his mind, and you can’t say that about every president.”

Edward I. Koch, who succeeded Mr. Beame, said of Mr. Ford: “Obviously he was persuaded his original position was wrong, and that shows a great man open to change. I hold nothing against him. And there are very few people, even when they’re dead, that I hold nothing against.”

Not long ago, Mr. Ford was interviewed for a tribute to Lewis Rudin, the New York real estate magnate and civic booster who fought mightily for federal help from the Ford administration in 1975. Praising Mr. Rudin’s relentless lobbying, Mr. Ford once again returned to the famous headline that had haunted him for decades.

“It was totally untrue,” he said, adding with a weak smile, “We burned all those papers.”

Ford's Economic Record Belies His Reputation (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

The economic policies of Gerald R. Ford are usually remembered as a joke. Soon after he took over as president, in August 1974, he tried to tame runaway price increases by urging Americans to wear round red lapel pins emblazoned with the initials WIN, for "whip inflation now."

That didn't work, of course, and the pins soon disappeared amid public ridicule.

But Ford didn't give up the fight against what was then called stagflation: a debilitating mix of rapid inflation, high unemployment and slow economic growth. In fact, before his 30-month administration ended, he discarded his original plans and cobbled together an unconventional set of programs that succeeded, at least for a while, in slowing the country's financial slide.

Among his economic policies, "what President Ford is most remembered for is the inflation campaign, which was kind of silly," said Alice M. Rivlin, a former vice chairman of the Federal Reserve Board and a director of The Washington Post Co. "But in the end, I think, he did quite well."

The U.S. economy was in sad shape when Ford replaced the disgraced Richard M. Nixon to become the nation's 38th president. Then it got worse. The economy fell into the steepest recession since World War II, coupled with an upward price spiral that was faster than at any time in modern memory.

Unemployment approached 9 percent, inflation ran at a 12 percent annual rate, and the gross domestic product was flat or declining. Energy prices, in particular, soared due to an oil shortage.

"The '70s were probably the most difficult decade in which to formulate economic policy," Rivlin recalled. "Economists don't know how to cope with inflation, slow growth and unemployment at the same time."

Initially, Ford believed that fiscal austerity, a tenet of his Republican Party, would solve the country's woes. He convened a summit called the Conference on Inflation, with economists and leaders of business and labor focusing on recommendations to slow price increases. He then proposed to cut federal spending and raise taxes and, for a short period, he embraced the idea of a voluntary wage-price freeze.

Ford also hoped to jawbone his way out of the crisis by going on national television in October 1974 and urging citizens to "make up a list of 10 ways you can save energy and fight inflation." In a separate speech to Congress, Ford declared that inflation was "public enemy number one" and asked Americans to wear the anti-inflation pins.

WIN was laughed into oblivion as a hollow gimmick, and Ford was forced to regroup. Under the tutelage of Alan Greenspan, then chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers and later Federal Reserve chairman, Ford was persuaded that the most pressing problems were unemployment and sluggish economic growth, not inflation.

As a result, Ford decided to accept exactly the opposite remedy that he prescribed at first. Under pressure from the Democratic-controlled Congress, he endorsed measures that increased spending and cut taxes rather than the other way around. The goal: to stimulate economic growth despite the danger, which he continued to battle with dozens of vetoes, that those actions might widen the federal budget deficit.

"When the chips were down, in the interest of providing stimulus, he agreed to a tax cut and other measures that helped the economy recover from the 1975 recession," said Charles L. Schultze, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Jimmy Carter. "He came around to realize that the economy would be better off with a stimulus than without one."

In March 1975, Ford signed into law a bill that provided individuals with a 10 percent rebate on their 1974 tax liability, a fattened standard deduction, and a temporary $30 tax credit for each taxpayer and dependent. For companies, the investment tax credit was temporarily increased to 10 percent.

Ford also accepted spending increases that he originally opposed. When, early on, Congress passed an anti-recessionary spending package, Ford was urged by his economic advisers to veto it. But he solicited other advice, including from his political staffers and Democratic economists such as Walter Heller and Arthur Okun. They told him the economy needed a boost. So Ford executed what his press secretary Ron Nessen termed a "179-degree" turn and signed the measure.

By 1976, these controversial efforts to rev up the economy had begun to pay off. When Ford ran for president, the economy was showing signs of recovery. Unemployment had dipped to about 7 percent, inflation had abated to 4.8 percent, and the gross national product was humming along at a robust rate of growth.

"We were headed in the right direction," Ford later boasted.

Ford offered other ideas that might have benefited the economy even further. He proposed a long list of deregulatory measures, for industries ranging from trucking to airlines, as a way to make the economy more efficient. They didn't come to fruition until after he left the White House, however. His efforts to increase energy supplies also foundered on Capitol Hill.

The economy faced tough times after Ford left office. An oil embargo further fueled inflation until Paul A. Volcker, the new chairman of the Federal Reserve appointed by Ford's successor, Carter, began a painful increase in interest rates that finally squeezed rapid inflation out of the system but also threw the economy into recession and caused unemployment to skyrocket.

Finally, under President Ronald Reagan in the 1980s, a full-fledged recovery got underway -- and it is that recovery that has stuck in the public mind as the real end of the disastrous economy of the 1970s. Ford's own temporary economic uptick had been so uneven and came so late in his short stay at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave. that it went largely unheralded.

Voters focused instead on a non-economic issue: Ford's unconditional pardon of Nixon. After issuing that pardon, "he could not convince the American people that he deserved another shot at the presidency," said Bernard Firestone, a political science professor at Hofstra University and an organizer of a Ford retrospective.

Nevertheless, Firestone predicted that historians will eventually see Ford "as a much more capable president than the public gave him credit for," in large measure because of his economic policies.

The 38th President (WT)

By Alvin S. Felzenber

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

On the morning Gerald R. Ford was sworn in as the nation's 38th president of the United States, I received a call from a close friend, Katherine Neuberger, the then-Republican National Committeewoman for New Jersey. Of the new president, Mrs. Neuberger, said, "Well this proves once again the truth of that old adage that 'the Good Lord watches over drunks, orphans and the United States of America.' " Mrs. Neuberger knew her presidents. She certainly knew Gerald Ford.

Her one-liner said all about Mr. Ford that anyone needed to know. It conveyed a sense of those wholesome, middle-American Western values that also characterized and guided two presidents who Mr. Ford greatly admired, whose pictures he would place in the Cabinet Room, Harry S. Truman and Dwight D. Eisenhower.

As the nation pauses to mark the passing of a former president who is revered more for who he was than for what he was able to achieve in office (he was president for too short a time to have enacted much of a program, assuming he could have gotten it through the heavily lop-sided Congress the voters sent him in 1974), public affairs shows are certain to show footage of Mr. Ford's hasty swearing-in. They are bound to replay again and again the most famous line he delivered as president, "My fellow Americans, our great national nightmare is over."

Hopefully, they will also show Mr. Ford, in a State of the Union address, repeating a favorite quote of his own; one he lifted from Ike. Of the nation he now headed, Mr. Ford proclaimed that "America is not good because she is great. She is great because she is good." This Ford believed with every fiber in him. The "hipsters" of the era dismissed both this sentiment and the new president as "corny." They saw both as remnants of the bygone era of "Leave it to Beaver" and "Father Knows Best." Mr. Ford seemed not to mind. He also seemed not to mind when they mocked his tailoring (especially the shortness of his trousers), his clumsiness in descending airplanes, his supposed awkwardness on the slopes, his penchant for toasting his own English muffins or television's insistence on showing movers placing a large double bed into the bedroom Mr. and Mrs. Ford were to occupy in the White House.

What his tormentors saw as "uncool," Mr. Ford regarded as a "golden age" when neighbors helped neighbors, crime was low, jobs were plentiful, and, of yes, when the president said something, he was believed. Coming from the "heart" of his country (as his hero Ike once said of his own Kansan roots) Mr. Ford embodied a kind of conservatism that, if it has not fallen entirely out of fashion, at least has been eclipsed by a different kind. Mr. Ford believed in balanced budgets, a strong national defense, and, cognizant of his party and its Lincolnian roots, civil rights. One area in which he challenged the once-prevailing political culture of his native region was on foreign policy. A World War II naval veteran and political acolyte of Michigan Sen. Arthur Vandenberg, the man who guided Truman's containment policies through the supposedly "do nothing" Republican Congress, Mr. Ford drew the line at isolationism. (He catapulted himself into Congress by besting, with Mr. Vandenberg's help, an old-line isolationist dinosaur.)

On most other measures, save for civil rights and voting rights, Mr. Ford's votes in Congress placed him in opposition to virtually all of Lyndon Johnson's "Great Society" programs. For his troubles, Johnson dubbed upon Mr. Ford two insults liberals would furl upon him for the rest of his career: 1) that Mr. Ford could not chew gum and walk at the same time; and 2) that Mr. Ford had played football too long with out the benefit of a helmet. (History records both that Mr. Ford, unlike Johnson, left the nation in better shape than he found it and that, as Ike, Ronald Reagan and George W. Bush can attest, dismissing Republican and conservative presidents as dumb had become the liberal elite's most favored mechanism. Perhaps it all started with Calvin Coolidge.)

Through a combination of the circumstances of Mr. Ford's elevation to the presidency, his status as the first vice president becoming the first non-elected president, his stated preference for competence over ideology in his selection, of Nelson Rockefeller as vice president, double-digit inflation, soaring unemployment, energy shortages and his steadfast pursuit of his predecessor's detente polities toward the Soviet Union, conservatives of the era misjudged Mr. Ford as much as had the liberals. As they rallied behind the rising star of Mr. Reagan, who personified bold color conservatism as opposed to one shaped in pastels, they overlooked the 50 vetoes Mr. Ford unfurled against spending bills the Democrats sent him, his resistance to the Humphrey-Hawking full employment act, his refusal to provide a federal bail out to New York City without guarantees of accountability (second to the Nixon pardon, nothing cost Mr. Ford more votes than the famous "Ford to City: Drop Dead" headline the Daily News put on its front page) and the portions of the Helsinki accords that would help the West prevail in the Cold War.

That Mr. Reagan had a case to make, which proved essential to his own ascendancy, and conservatism's future triumphs have long clear. That Mr. Ford provided service to his country in ways that went beyond his cleaning up for his predecessor is becoming increasingly apparent with the passage of time.

How Lieutenant Ford Saved His Ship (NYT)

By Robert Drury And Tom Clavin

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

East Hampton, N.Y.

FOR Americans under a certain age, Gerald Ford is best remembered for his contribution to Bartlett's — "Our long national nightmare is over" — or, more likely, for the comedian Chevy Chase's stumbling, bumbling impersonations of him on "Saturday Night Live." But there's a different label we can attach to this former president, one that has been overlooked for 62 years: war hero.

In 1944, Lt. j.g. Jerry Ford — a lawyer from Grand Rapids, Mich., blond and broad-shouldered, with the lantern jaw of a young Johnny Weissmuller — was a 31-year-old gunnery officer on the aircraft carrier Monterey. The Monterey was a member of Adm. William Halsey's Third Fleet, and in mid-December, Lieutenant Ford was sailing off the Philippines as Admiral Halsey's ships provided air cover for the second phase of Gen. Douglas MacArthur's "I shall return" Philippine invasions.

The Monterey had earned more than half a dozen battle stars for actions in World War II; during the battle of Leyte Gulf, Lieutenant Ford, in charge of a 40-millimeter antiaircraft gun crew on the fantail deck, had watched as a torpedo narrowly missed the Monterey and tore out the hull of the nearby Australian cruiser Canberra. Two months later, in the early morning hours of Dec. 18, the Japanese were the least of the Monterey's worries, as it found itself trapped in a vicious Pacific cyclone later designated Typhoon Cobra.

Lieutenant Ford had served as the Monterey's officer of the deck on the ship's midnight-to-4-a.m. watch, and had witnessed the lashing rains and 60-knot winds whip the ocean into waves that resembled liquid mountain ranges. The waves reeled in from starboard, gigantic sets of dark water that appeared to defy gravity, cresting at 40 to 70 feet. In his 18 months at sea, Lieutenant Ford had never seen waves so big. As breakers crashed over the carrier's wheelhouse, he could just barely make out the distress whistles sounding about him — the deep beeps of the battleships, the shrill whoops of the destroyers.

After his watch Lieutenant Ford had strapped himself into his bunk below decks, and it seemed that his head had barely hit the pillow when the Monterey's skipper, Capt. Stuart H. Ingersoll, sounded general quarters, calling all hands to their stations. Lieutenant Ford bolted upright in his dark sea cabin. He thought he smelled smoke amidships. Racing through a rolling companionway dimly lighted by red battle lights, he reached the outside skipper's ladder leading to the pilothouse and began to climb. At that precise moment a 70-foot wave broke over the Monterey. The carrier pitched 25 degrees to port, and Lieutenant Ford was knocked flat on his back. He began skimming the flight deck as if he were on a toboggan.

Just as he was about to be hurled overboard, Lieutenant Ford managed to slow his slide, twist like an acrobat, and fling himself onto the catwalk. He got to his knees, made his way below deck, and started back up again.

By the time he reached the Monterey's pilothouse, the fighter planes in its hangar deck had begun slamming into one another as well as the bulkheads — "like pinballs," Mr. Ford recalled 60 years later — and the collisions had ignited their gas tanks. The hangar deck of the Monterey had become a cauldron of aircraft fuel, and because of a quirk in its construction, the flames from the burning aircraft were sucked into the air intakes of the lower decks. As fires broke out below, Lieutenant Ford remembered the smoke he smelled when he'd bolted from his bunk.

Admiral Halsey had ordered Captain Ingersoll to abandon ship, and the Monterey was ablaze from stem to stern as Lieutenant Ford stood near the helm, awaiting his orders. "We can fix this," Captain Ingersoll said, and with a nod from his skipper, Lieutenant Ford donned a gas mask and led a fire brigade below.

Aircraft-gas tanks exploded as hose handlers slid across the burning decks. Into this furnace Lieutenant Ford led his men, his first order of business to carry out the dead and injured. Hours later he and his team emerged burned and exhausted, but they had put out the fire.

Three destroyers were eventually capsized by Typhoon Cobra, a dozen more ships were seriously damaged, more than 150 planes were destroyed, and 793 men lost their lives. It was the Navy's worst "defeat" of World War II. But the Monterey and nearly all of its men survived to take part in the battle of Okinawa, and the future president ended his Navy stint in 1946 with the rank of lieutenant commander.

Like his fellow World War II veterans, Mr. Ford returned home and resumed his life, rarely speaking publicly of his heroism. But in contrast to the public's image of him as a clumsy nonentity, Mr. Ford was a man whose grace under pressure saved his ship and hundreds of men on it.

Gerald R. Ford (NYT)

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

Gerald R. Ford was an accidental president, his tenure brief, his legacy limited. Yet he was the right man summoned at the right time to begin the necessary process of healing a country exhausted by war abroad and scandal at home. Elevated to the nation's top job when Richard Nixon was forced by threat of impeachment to resign, he was everything his predecessor was not — transparent and largely content with life as he found it. His many friends saw him as plain old "Jerry," a get-along, go-along product of the House of Representatives whose self-assurance and modest ambitions perfectly suited a country that wanted little more than a few months' rest.

Mr. Ford's unplanned and largely unsought rise up the American political ladder was assisted not once but twice by scandal. In 1973, when Spiro Agnew resigned the vice presidency after a scandal unrelated to Watergate, Mr. Nixon sought advice from senior Congressional leaders about a replacement. The advice was unanimous. "We gave Nixon no choice but Ford," House Speaker Carl Albert recalled later.

Which was fitting, because Mr. Ford was in essence a creature of Congress — more precisely, of the House of Representatives, a place of perpetual compromise that encourages neither the vision that sometimes attaches to the Senate nor the managerial skills that come with being a governor. Michigan voters elected Mr. Ford 13 times, and of his 25 years in the House, he served eight as minority leader. He saw himself as a negotiator and a reconciler, and the record shows it: he did not write a single piece of major legislation in his entire career.

As president, Mr. Ford would have had little room in which to pursue lofty ambitions even if he had them. Domestically, he was bedeviled by inflation and then recession, and his effort to cure both embroiled him in constant combat with his old friends in Congress. Abroad, he had his hands full maintaining American power and sustaining détente with the Soviet Union, in the aftermath of the collapse of Vietnam and Cambodia.

But he judged, correctly, that his primary mission was to quiet national passions inflamed by war and Watergate — to end, as he put it, "our long national nightmare" — and in so doing to restore a measure of respect to the presidency itself. To that end he made several small gestures largely forgotten now but symbolically important at the time. He announced that he would be lenient to draft resisters, he opened the White House to people on Mr. Nixon's "enemies list," and he crisscrossed the country endlessly, speaking to groups large and small in an effort to open up an office that Mr. Nixon had all but closed to public inspection.

Yet his wish to heal led him to do something that reopened the very wounds he was trying hard to close. On Sept. 8, 1974, barely 30 days into his presidency, Mr. Ford announced his decision to give Mr. Nixon a "full, free and absolute pardon." The reaction was immediate, intense and largely negative. Mr. Ford had expected criticism, but not the outrage that erupted in Congress, in many newspapers and among the public at large.

This page, for example, condemned the pardon as "a profoundly unwise, divisive and unjust act" that in a stroke had destroyed the new president's "credibility as a man of judgment, candor and competence." The critics' fundamental point was that a nation in which the law applies equally to rich and poor, the meek and the powerful, cannot exempt anyone, least of all a president, from the requirements of justice.

History has been more sympathetic to Mr. Ford's argument that to allow Mr. Nixon's prosecution to go forward, perhaps all the way to a trial, would have been profoundly destabilizing to a nation that was already in shaky health. In 2001, the trustees of the John F. Kennedy Library honored Mr. Ford with its Profile in Courage Award for the decision, which Senator Edward Kennedy, a onetime critic, described as essential to the restoration of national unity. When Senate and House leaders bestowed on Mr. Ford and his wife, Betty, a Congressional Gold Medal in 1999, President Clinton — who had his own experiences with prosecutors — said the critics had been "caught up in the moment," and that Mr. Ford's decision had helped "keep the country together."

Our own bottom line continues to be the same: that the nation is strong enough to endure almost anything but burying the truth. Still, Mr. Ford deserves to be remembered for more than the pardon. Marking the end of a national nightmare is no small thing.

Gerald R. Ford (WP)

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

"OUR LONG national nightmare is over," Gerald Ford declared when he took office as president a little over 32 years ago. Those words were to prove the most memorable of his brief administration and also the most apposite. The feverish dream of Watergate, with its byzantine intrigues, Borgia-like treachery, and months of hearings and trials, was suddenly gone: The country awoke to a new president who lived in Northern Virginia and toasted his own English muffins before commuting to work in Washington.

The image of suburban simplicity was quickly seized on by the media and conveyed to a national audience eager for the return of that condition for which President Warren G. Harding had invented a new word many years before: "normalcy." As always, there was quite a bit of bunk to the image. Mr. Ford had been deeply involved in practical politics for more than a quarter-century. He soon acclimated himself to the White House, and before long decided he liked it enough to set his sights on a full term. He didn't achieve that goal, but in the period between Richard M. Nixon's resignation and Jimmy Carter's inauguration -- just under 2 1/2 years -- Gerald R. Ford did the main thing that needed doing, even though there were some in the Nixon White House who had thought him unqualified for the presidency: He reassured the people about the nature and quality of their government.

It was said of Franklin D. Roosevelt that he had a second-class intellect but a first-rate temperament. Something of the same might be said of Jerry Ford, although he was no Roosevelt and, as far as intellect goes, he took some unfair hits for a fellow who was in the top quarter of his class at Yale Law. On assuming office, he presented himself as what he was: open, friendly, honest (at least in comparison to what had gone before) and above all "decent," as people never tired of saying. That last adjective can, of course, be both high praise when speaking of someone's personal integrity and a somewhat fainter commendation when applied to the sort of job he's done. Mr. Ford felt both sides of it.

Thirty years ago, as Mr. Ford was departing office, we wrote on this page of him: "In his first days and months, it was as if he had liberated Washington -- from its personal fears and hostilities and suspicions, from the dark and squalid assumptions that people had come reflexively to make about one another and about the way things 'really' worked. God knows who was (and is) still listening on whose line or who is plotting what gruesome revenge against what political foe. Our point is merely that Gerald Ford brought to the White House an open, unsinister and -- yes -- decent style of doing things that altered the life of the city and ultimately of the country."

He was the last of the traditional Midwestern Republicans to occupy the White House: internationalist, fiscally conservative, supportive of civil rights legislation -- a throwback to the pre-Goldwater era. His odd route to the presidency -- he was chosen to replace the disgraced and departed Spiro T. Agnew as vice president, then elevated by Mr. Nixon's resignation -- was undoubtedly the only one that would have gotten him there, given the direction his party was going. Indeed, when he ran for election in 1976, he had to jettison the vice president he'd chosen, Nelson A. Rockefeller (too liberal), and fight off a formidable challenge from the avatar of the Republican future, Ronald Reagan.

That battle didn't help him in the general election. But Mr. Ford was also the victim of a series of misfortunes that he'd done nothing to precipitate: economic troubles that included both inflation and stagnation; the fall of South Vietnam and Cambodia; the new and explosive problem of volatile energy prices; even the rising popularity of a Saturday night comedy show that portrayed Mr. Ford, onetime college football hero and probably the most athletic president in the country's history, as a stumbling klutz.

But what hurt him most was an act of his own, taken one month into his presidency: the pardoning of Richard Nixon for whatever the former president had done or might have done. Today, with the passions of the period greatly diminished, it's hard to recall how much discord that decision created, even among those who believed Mr. Ford to be a trustworthy successor to Mr. Nixon. It's also hard, from today's vantage point, to see how an indictment and trial would have done the country much good. The pardon may have come too soon and been too broad, but it was basically the right thing to do. It hurt Mr. Ford politically, however, probably costing him the 1976 election.

In the spring of 2001, Mr. Ford received a John F. Kennedy Profile in Courage award for that decision. The late Mary McGrory recalled in her column in The Post the uproar that had followed the pardon, and noted: "I myself contributed to the din with a series of screeds about unequal justice. But almost 27 years later, it looks a little different. What seemed then to be cynicism now looks more like courage. A most dubious decision has acquired the patina of the only one possible."

In January 1977, Jimmy Carter began his inaugural address: "I want to thank my predecessor for all he has done to heal our land." That still stands, both as a tribute to Gerald Ford and as a reminder to his successors of the importance of what used to be praised as the gentlemanly virtues.

President Ford (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

The abiding cliché about Gerald Ford -- who died Tuesday at age 93 -- is that he was a decent man who steadied the country but held the White House too briefly to leave a major imprint. We've always thought that view of his Presidency is too diminishing, not least because he led the nation at a dangerous time and resisted political furies that could have done the U.S. far more harm.

"America's Suicide Attempt" is how the historian Paul Johnson describes the 1970s. And it is important to recall the bad temper of the times that Ford inherited in becoming the 38th President. He succeeded Richard Nixon, who had resigned over the Watergate coverup and amid an unpopular war in Vietnam. He faced large liberal majorities in Congress that were emboldened by their ouster of Nixon and set to revive the Great Society. And he had to clean up the financial problems caused by a burst of inflation and wage and price controls. Ford navigated all of these traumas better than he gets credit for. * * *

It is true that Ford was something of an accidental President, the only one in U.S. history never elected as either President or Vice President. Before Nixon picked him to replace the disgraced Spiro Agnew as his Vice President, Ford had been contemplating retirement from his Grand Rapids, Michigan, House seat. But like another unlikely President from the Midwest, Harry Truman, he had reserves of honesty and fortitude that served him well.

He made a particular contribution in pardoning Nixon, though he knew Nixon's enemies would accuse him of a quid pro quo. The decision cost him dearly in the polls and may have cost him the election in 1976, but it also spared the country from years of division over a criminal trial that special prosecutor Leon Jaworski seemed determined to pursue.

Congress had trampled over a weakened Nixon, and another Ford contribution was restoring some measure of executive authority. Far more than Nixon, he used his veto pen (66 times in 895 days), blunting liberal excesses after Democrats picked up 46 House seats in 1974. He also deserves credit for resisting the isolationism that was rampant as the Vietnam War wound down. It was a rare period in postwar U.S. history when the public favored spending less on defense.

Democrats exploited the mood in early 1975 to block Ford's funding request for our allies in South Vietnam, as the North began its offensive. Ford pleaded with Congress that "American unwillingness to provide adequate assistance to allies fighting for their lives could seriously affect our credibility throughout the world as an ally," but to no avail. Saigon fell by April, and the boat people and massacres in Southeast Asia soon followed. Thus one irony of this week's praise for Ford as a unifying President: At the time, he was mocked as clumsy and dull, and he was vilified for blocking Congressional priorities. Any of this sound familiar?

Vietnam was a scarring American defeat, but it could have been worse had Ford capitulated to the Congressional stampede. Instead, he fortified U.S. relations with the rest of free Asia, and he sent in the Marines despite liberal howls when the U.S. ship the Mayaguez was taken hostage by Cambodia's Khmer Rouge.

DOJ_NMG_0109861

Given the weak hand he inherited, it is perhaps understandable that Ford continued the Nixon policy of pursuing détente and arms control with the Soviet Union. But that strategy was already beginning to fail due to growing Soviet adventurism abroad and conservative skepticism at home. Ford also joined Leonid Brezhnev in signing the Helsinki Accords guaranteeing civil liberties in the Soviet bloc; while criticized by conservatives, the Helsinki pact probably helped to undermine Soviet moral authority over the years.

The Ford Administration's economic record is also better than its reputation, sandwiched as it was between two of the three worst economic Presidencies of the 20th century. Hoover's was the worst, then Nixon's followed by Jimmy Carter's.

Ford is famous for having initially rebuffed New York City's bid for a financial bailout, but New York's trouble was merely one symptom of the financial woes caused by Federal Reserve Chairman Arthur Burns's monetary blunder. Burns opened the easy-money spigots in Nixon's first term, leading to 12% inflation, a spike in interest rates and wage and price controls, and setting the stage for financial crises from Mexico to Britain, among other places. Despite such early follies as the WIN program -- "whip inflation now" -- and a failed proposal to raise taxes, Ford ran a strong Treasury under Secretary William Simon, adopted sounder policies and left the economy better than he found it. * * *

In historical political terms, Ford was something of a transition figure -- from the traditional Republicanism of Eisenhower, with which Ford identified, to the more energetic reform conservatism that would triumph with Reagan. Arguably Ford's biggest political mistake was choosing Nelson Rockefeller as his vice president over Reagan. The New York Governor was deeply unpopular with the GOP base, and the selection left Ford vulnerable to Reagan's primary challenge in 1976.

The Gipper came within a handful of delegates of taking the nomination, a challenge that weakened Ford for the autumn race against Democrat Jimmy Carter. In the event, Ford ran one of the better Presidential campaigns of the modern era and came close to beating the former Georgia governor who had run as a conservative himself.

Perhaps President Ford's greatest achievement was in demonstrating to a nation angry and dispirited over Watergate and Vietnam that its political system was resilient and the Office of the Presidency still worthy of respect. In that sense his Presidency was a triumph of Ford's personal character -- not the first, or last, time America has been fortunate in the leaders our democracy has produced.

President Ford (WT)

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

"Our long national nightmare is over," Gerald Ford told the nation on assuming the presidency. And soon it was. For that the nation owes a large debt to the sacrifice of Gerald Ford.

The honest and forthright Mr. Ford, who died at his California home Tuesday evening at the age of 93, did what had to be done, even at the sacrifice of his presidency. In retrospect, his controversial and reviled pardon for Richard Nixon was clearly the right thing to do. He spared the country years of uncertainty, put Watergate to rest, returned the nation's eye to the future and restored tradition, honor and dignity to the nation's highest office.

To hear Mr. Ford explain it, there was never a question in his mind about what he had to do, which he explained in the logic and language of everyman. This was the mark of the man. He reasoned that Richard Nixon was only one American among many millions, and he owed the larger responsibility to the many millions who deserved to have the national nightmare put to rest. The nation had to move on.

"I paid a price, sure, but it is a price a president has to pay when he thinks he is doing the right thing, whatever the polls show," he told columnist David Broder in 1994. "The first month I was in office, I spent 25 percent of my time talking to lawyers about what to do about the Nixon tapes, the Nixon papers. Ninety percent of the questions at my first press conference were about Nixon. I thought I had to get the Nixon questions off my desk.

"I had a helluva lot more important business. The Russians and our allies didn't know what we were going to do. We had a serious recession starting. So I came to the conclusion, wholly on my own, that I ought to spend all my time on the business of 230 million Americans, and not 25 percent on one man."

This was a simple explanation, mathematical in its reasoning, and for that reason it was all the more compelling. Many Americans have changed their minds since about the pardon. In an ABC News poll taken in 2002 on the 30th anniversary of the Watergate break-in, 6 in 10 Americans said the pardon was the right thing to do.

Some argue still that the pardon deprived the nation of a "full telling" or the nation of an opportunity to "fully heal." This is nonsense. Most every significant detail of the Watergate break-in and cover-up has come to light without a drawn-out ordeal for a disgraced president, which would have amounted to a show trial.

"The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character and the honorable conduct of his administration," Mr. Bush said when he learned Tuesday night that Mr. Ford had left us. How true.

Closing The Chapter On Watergate Wasn't Done Lightly (WP)

By Bob Woodward

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

On Sunday, Sept. 8, 1974, President Ford attended church alone. He sat by himself in a pew at St. John's Episcopal Church on Lafayette Square. He took Holy Communion.

Back at the White House at 11:05 a.m., he went on television to announce that he had decided to pardon Richard Nixon for any crimes he committed during Watergate. The country's obsession with the scandal "could go on and on and on, or someone must write the end to it," he read from a statement. "I have concluded that only I can do that, and if I can I must." The core reason for the decision, Ford said, was to put Watergate and the Nixon presidency in the past.

The reverberations from that decision may well have cost Ford his presidency in the next election. In the first week after the pardon, his public approval rating plummeted from 71 percent to 49 percent. Jerry terHorst, Ford's press secretary and friend of 25 years, resigned as a matter of conscience.

Ford had been in office only a month. The pardon came as a surprise -- to Congress and the public -- and it unleashed a wave of outrage and suspicion. Had there been a deal between Nixon and Ford promising a pardon in exchange for Nixon's resignation?

The following account, which attempts to answer that question, comes from official documents, interviews with key players, contemporaneous handwritten notes, memoirs written by participants and conversations with Ford himself.A Talk With Haig

The chain of events that would lead to the pardon began only five weeks earlier when Ford, who had been vice president only eight months, learned he was about to become president.

At 3:30 p.m. on Aug. 1, 1974, Nixon's chief of staff, Alexander M. Haig, entered the vice president's suite. He looked troubled and on edge.

"Are you ready, Mr. Vice President, to assume the presidency in a short period of time?" Haig asked. New Watergate tapes, he said, would show Nixon had ordered the coverup of the burglary.

Ford was stunned.

Haig presented Ford with six scenarios: Nixon could step aside temporarily under the 25th Amendment, he could just wait and delay the ongoing impeachment process, or he could try to settle for a formal censure. In addition, there were three pardon options. Nixon could pardon himself and resign. Or he could pardon the aides involved and then resign. Or Nixon could agree to leave in return for an agreement that the new President Ford would pardon him.

Haig handed Ford two pieces of paper. The first sheet contained a handwritten summary of a president's legal authority to pardon. The second sheet was a draft pardon form that needed only Ford's signature and Nixon's name to make it legal.

"It's my understanding from a White House lawyer," Haig said, "that the president does have authority to pardon even before criminal action has been taken against an individual."

After extracting a pledge of secrecy, Ford told his top aide and speechwriter, Robert Hartmann, what had just occurred with Haig.

"Jesus!" Hartmann said. "What did you tell him?"

"I told him I needed time to think about it."

"You what?" Hartmann fairly shouted. Even entertaining any agreement of resignation for a pardon, Hartmann believed, was a monstrous impropriety that could taint a Ford presidency forever.

Ford didn't think so. He hadn't promised anything to Haig. He wanted to talk to his wife, Betty.

Betty Ford was firm that he shouldn't get involved in making any recommendations to Nixon or to Haig.

About 1:30 a.m., Ford called Haig.

"Al," he said, "our discussion this afternoon, I hope you understand there was no agreement, no decision and no deal."There Wasn't a Deal

The next day, Ford told his adviser and former House colleague John Marsh about the visit from Haig and the options, including one in which Nixon would resign.

"I then, what I would do, I would give Nixon a pardon," Ford said.

Marsh couldn't believe it. "Look, you can't do this," he said gently.

"You could make a strong case for a pardon, that it would be in the national interest," Ford told Marsh.

"You can't do that," Marsh repeated. It would look like a quid pro quo for Nixon's resignation.

Alarmed, Marsh went to see Hartmann. Together, the two went to talk with Ford, who then told them about his late-night phone call to Haig saying no deal.

DOJ_NMG_0109863

Hartmann and Marsh both told Ford there had to be no connection between a Nixon resignation and a possible pardon. They urged Ford to talk to former Nixon White House counselor Bryce Harlow.

Harlow persuaded Ford to place a second call to Haig to explain that he had no intention of recommending what President Nixon should do about resigning or not resigning.

Afterward, Hartmann, Marsh and Harlow had a drink together. They celebrated and declared that they had forced Ford to dodge a bullet.Making Up His Mind

On Friday, Aug. 9, 1974, Nixon resigned.

Ford held his first news conference on Aug. 28, and a third of the questions were about Nixon. To Ford, though, it felt more like 90 percent. He feared that without a pardon, Nixon and Watergate would haunt his presidency for years.

"My mind is 99 percent made up," Ford told Haig, Hartmann, Marsh and former law partner Phil Buchen in the Oval Office two days later.

Marsh was deeply worried. He went to see Ford during his lunch in a study off the Oval Office.

"Questions are going to be raised about a deal," Marsh said.

Ford stopped eating. "Jack," he said, "I know exactly where you're coming from, and I have thought of that, and there was no deal."Custody of the Tapes

Ford called in longtime friend and former Justice Department lawyer Benton Becker to determine exactly what a president's pardon powers were prior to someone's indictment and conviction, and to determine what should be done with Nixon's papers and tapes.

After resigning, Nixon asked to have the materials shipped to his home in California. Traditionally, a former president owned all his papers. But Becker immediately saw that returning them to Nixon would make Ford complicit in hiding the truth.

"You will be writing the history of your presidency in the first weeks," Becker told Ford, "and history is going to say Jerry Ford participated in the final act of the Watergate coverup."

Ford authorized Becker to ensure the government would retain the tapes. "That history must be preserved," Ford said. "Do whatever you have to do. . . . I'm not shipping that stuff out."

Becker worked out an arrangement in which Nixon and the government had joint custody of the tapes for 10 years. Congress and the courts eventually saw that the tapes were preserved.

But Becker also returned to Washington with concerns about the health of Nixon, whom Ford still considered a friend. Nixon was "more depressed than any person I've ever seen," Becker reported. "I really have serious questions in my mind whether that man is going to be alive at the time of the election."

"Well," Ford noted, "1976 is a long time away."

"I don't mean 1976," Becker said. "I mean 1974." Congressional elections were two months away.

As Ford reviewed the pardon statement the morning of Sept. 8, with a felt-tip pen, he inserted a phrase saying the threat of prosecution hung "like a sword over our former President's head, threatening his health."

Hartmann, who was in the Oval Office that morning, had been pushing Ford to delay the pardon, to allow more time to pass.

"You know, if I decided to do it and then something happened to him and I hadn't done it because I was just waiting for a better time," Ford said to Hartmann, "I would never be able to forgive myself."A Nation's Outrage

The new president had misjudged the mood of the country. Rather than sympathy, the public and the media voiced outrage at the pardon. It seemed to be totally on Nixon's terms -- early, complete and without acknowledgment that he had committed crimes or even impeachable offenses. Suspicions about a deal surfaced almost immediately.

Ford agreed to testify about his decision before a House subcommittee. His staff went to work preparing his statement.

Haig learned of the testimony being drafted in a phone call from J. Fred Buzhardt, who had remained at the Ford White House during the transition. It stated that Haig had offered the presidency in return for the pardon on Aug. 1 but Ford had rejected the deal.

"Al, I think you'd better come to the White House," Buzhardt told Haig. "These boys have prepared sworn testimony for the president that could very well result in your indictment."

Haig drove to the White House and insisted on seeing President Ford. Within minutes, Haig was in the Oval Office.

"What do you want?" Ford asked.

"The truth," Haig replied. "That's all."

"You'll have it, Al," Ford said. He handed Haig a yellow legal tablet and said, "You write that portion as you remember."

So the conclusions of Ford's top aides that a deal had been offered were initially in Ford's testimony but were excised at the insistence of Haig.'I Was Naive'

DOJ_NMG_0109864

Twenty-three years later, on Sept. 22, 1997, in a suite at the Waldorf Towers in New York, I asked Ford whether he thought Haig had offered him a deal.

"Well, I guess I was naive," Ford said. "I was naive that anybody would offer a deal, because all my political life people never came to me, 'I'm going to give you a political donation, I expect something in return.' People never came to me that way, because they knew damn well I wouldn't be a part of it. So when Al Haig comes with those six terms, I just didn't visualize him as one making a proposition to make a deal. It never went through my mind."

I continued to press Ford. Did he agree, when all the facts and conclusions were examined now, decades later, that Haig had offered a deal?

"I would agree," Ford said, "because after talking to Hartmann, Marsh and Harlow, I wanted the record clear that I did not agree to consummate. . . . So that it has to be very clear that, yes, on paper, without action it was a deal, but it never became a deal because I never accepted."Nixon's 'Confession'

I interviewed Ford on the subject again on May 20, 1998, at his home office in Rancho Mirage, Calif., situated on a golf course in the midst of the desert. He was alone.

He brought up his pardon decision, noting that no president had "caught as much hell as I did." His recollections were clear. I suspected he had replayed them many times in his mind.

"I was overwhelmed with the public reaction," he said. "I guess I anticipated a lot, but not to the extent that happened. But . . . it didn't faze me one bit. If anything, it made me more stubborn that I was right."

I asked why he hadn't pressed Nixon harder for an admission of guilt.

"We were under a time pressure," he responded. Once he'd made the decision to grant the pardon, he had to move quickly. "The longer it took to resolve some of these things, the more likely that the issue would have come to the surface and it could have been a different ballgame."

I said I agreed, it would have leaked. Still, a forthright acknowledgment by Nixon could have ended the historical debate on that question. Why didn't Ford make more of the 1915 Supreme Court decision in Burdick v. United States that held that accepting a pardon is tantamount to confession of guilt?

"I still carry it around in my pocket, that statement," Ford said. "I've got it in my wallet here because anytime anybody challenges me, I pull it out. I've got it here someplace." He searched around in his wallet, and handed me a folded, dog-eared piece of paper. It was a portion of the Burdick decision.

I began to read aloud. "Most important, the justices found that a pardon 'carries an imputation of guilt, acceptance, a confession of it.' " Ford seized on the last phrase and repeated it: " 'Acceptance, a confession of it.' " See, Nixon had confessed, he said. "That was always very reassuring to me."

Bush Recalls Ford's Integrity, Instincts (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, December 28, 2006

President Bush on Wednesday remembered former President Gerald Ford as a "man of complete integrity who led our country with common sense and kind instincts" and helped restore faith in the presidency after the Watergate scandal.

"On Aug. 9, 1974, he stepped into the presidency without ever having sought the office," Bush said. "He assumed power in a period of great division and turmoil. For a nation that needed healing and for an office that needed a calm and steady hand, Gerald Ford came along when we needed him most."

The president, who personally expressed his condolences in a phone call late Tuesday night with former first lady Betty Ford, called the former president a "man of integrity" who devoted the best years of his life to the nation. Bush said Ford commanded the Oval Office for 2 1/2 years with commonsense and kindness.

Ford "reflected the best in America's character," Bush said.

Ford helped restore Americans' confidence in the White House after President Richard Nixon's downfall in 1974 through the "honorable conduct" of his administration, Bush said.

Bush, who is spending the week at his Texas ranch, made his statement before sunrise inside a hangar at a helipad outlined in blue-green landing lights. Dawn was breaking over the ranch after he finished expressing his sadness over Ford's death.

"Our 38th president will always have a special place in our nation's history," he said.

Bush's father, former President George H.W. Bush, served in the Ford administration as a diplomat and CIA director. The president borrowed from the troupe of Ford advisers in making up his own presidential team more than a quarter century later.

DOJ_NMG_0109865

Vice President Dick Cheney served as Ford's chief of staff, while just departed Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld served Ford in the same job.

Cheney called Ford a "dear friend and mentor" and hailed his former boss' role in bringing the nation out of what the vice president called the "greatest constitutional crisis since the Civil War."

"In that troubled era, America needed strength, wisdom, and good judgment, and those qualities came to us in the person of Gerald R. Ford," Cheney said in a statement. "When he left office, he had restored public trust in the presidency, and the nation once again looked to the future with confidence and faith."

Rumsfeld called Ford "a man of great decency and towering integrity."

"As President, his personal character helped to restore the reservoir of trust in government and its leaders that is needed for our system to function effectively," Rumsfeld said.

Democrats and Republicans alike recalled Ford's willingness to work across party lines.

"President Ford was one of the kindest, most sincere elected officials whom I have known and with whom I have worked," said longtime Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va. "Although he and I were from different political parties, we often were able to find common ground and work together for our country."

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who served with Ford in the House, praised the former president for his commitment to his wife Betty and family.

"Jerry was warm gentle, friendly, pleasant courteous individual. He never used bad language, he loved his family, his kids and above all else he loved Betty," Dingell said.

Former Republican Sen. Bob Dole from Kansas, Ford's running mate in 1976, said Ford could be described in three words: "A good man."

"He was a friend to everyone who met him," Dole said. "He had no enemies."

White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten notified Bush about Ford's death shortly before 11 p.m. EST after getting the news from Ford's chief of staff. Deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel said Bush, who is scheduled to return to Washington on Jan. 1, will attend the funeral.

Bush Pays Tribute To Gerald Ford (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

President George W. Bush expressed sadness over the death on Wednesday of former president Gerald Ford, saying he had helped “heal” America in the aftermath of the Watergate scandal.

“With his quiet integrity, common sense, and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the presidency,” Mr Bush said. “The American people will always admire Gerald Ford’s devotion to duty, his personal character, and the honorable conduct of his administration.”

Mr Ford was aptly named the “accidental president” after the dramatic resignation of President Richard Nixon in 1973 over Watergate unexpectedly catapulted him into the Oval Office. He assumed the presidency as the US was winding down its controversial involvement in Vietnam.

Just one month after becoming the 38th president of the US, Mr Ford himself drew condemnation for pardoning Mr Nixon, a move that was widely credited as helping Jimmy Carter defeat Mr Ford in the 1976 presidential election. But Mr Ford, who said the pardon was needed to close the Watergate era, appeared well aware of the possible repercussions of his decision.

When his aides suggested that a pardon could doom his chances of being re-elected, Mr Ford shot back: “It could easily cost me the next election if I run again. But damn it, I don’t need the polls to tell me whether I’m right or wrong.’’

Historians later credited Mr Ford with restoring dignity to the office of the president, which had been badly tarnished by Mr Nixon and Spiro Agnew, who resigned as Mr Nixon’s vice-president after being charged with tax evasion.

Vice-president Dick Cheney, who became chief of staff to Mr Ford after Donald Rumsfeld moved from that job to become defence secretary, said on Wednesday: “He assumed the nation’s highest office during the greatest constitutional crisis since the Civil War. In that troubled era, America needed strength, wisdom, and good judgment, and those qualities came to us in the person of Gerald R. Ford.”

Democrats and Republicans mourned Mr Ford. Harry Reid, the incoming Democratic Senate majority leader, said Mr Ford helped lead the US from “one of its darkest hours with grace and bipartisanship”. John McCain, the Arizona Republican senator said he “sacrificed his own ambitions to help move our country beyond the divisions and disillusionment caused by Watergate and a lost war”.

John Bruton, the European Union ambassador in Washington, said he was “deeply saddened” by the death of Mr Ford, whom he described as a “healing force” in US history.

DOJ_NMG_0109866

German President Horst Köhler offered his “deeply felt condolences’’ and described Ford as “a great American” who played an important role in advancing trans-Atlantic ties and as “one of the founding fathers of the world economic summits of the leading industrial nations”.

Czech President Vaclav Klaus called Ford “an outstanding politician’’ whose work ‘‘was instrumental for freedom in my country and for the fall of the Iron Curtain in Europe”.

Ford's Integrity Praised (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

Washington Times, December 28, 2006

President Bush and other lawmakers paid their respects to Gerald R. Ford yesterday, as plans were completed for several days of funeral services and memorials, which will include the late president's body lying in state at the U.S. Capitol on Sunday and Monday.

Gregory Willard, a Ford family representative, told reporters yesterday that services will begin tomorrow in California and last until Wednesday, when Mr. Ford will be interred in a hillside tomb near his presidential museum in Grand Rapids, Mich.

Speaking from his ranch in Crawford, Texas, Mr. Bush praised the former president for restoring integrity to the White House after the scandal-forced resignations of President Nixon and Vice President Spiro Agnew.

"With his quiet integrity, common sense and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the presidency," Mr. Bush said. "The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character and the honorable conduct of his administration. We mourn the loss of such a leader, and our 38th president will always have a special place in our nation's memory."

The curators of Mr. Ford's presidential museum opened their lobby for 24 hours a day starting yesterday and said the lobby will remain open until further notice.

Mr. Willard said the funeral ceremonies begin tomorrow, with a private prayer service for the family at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, Calif., which Mr. Ford and his wife, Betty, had attended. On Saturday, the 38th president's body will be flown to Washington for a state funeral in the Capitol Rotunda that evening. On its way to the Capitol, the hearse will pause at the World War II Memorial, in tribute to the Navy veteran's service.

The public will be able to file into the Capitol to pay last respects to Mr. Ford from the conclusion of the funeral until the coffin leaves for a funeral service at the Washington National Cathedral on Tuesday morning. His remains will leave Washington for the final service and interment in Michigan, the former president's home state.

The tributes poured in yesterday. Vice President Dick Cheney, who served as Mr. Ford's chief of staff, praised his former boss in a statement, calling him a "dear friend and mentor."

"Throughout his career -- as a naval officer, congressman, vice president and president -- Gerald Ford embodied the best values of a great generation: decency, integrity and devotion to duty," Mr. Cheney said.

Mr. Ford had close ties to the Bush administration. Mr. Bush's father, former President George Bush, served in the Ford administration as a diplomat and CIA director. And just-departed Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld also served Mr. Ford as chief of staff.

Mr. Rumsfeld yesterday called his former boss "a man of great decency and towering integrity." The elder Mr. Bush called Mr. Ford "one of the most decent and capable men I ever met."

Former Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, who was Mr. Ford's vice-presidential running mate in 1976, said Mr. Ford "was a friend to everyone who met him" and "had no enemies."

Praise for Mr. Ford was not limited to his former political allies. Former President Jimmy Carter, who defeated Mr. Ford in the 1976 presidential election, also had kind words for his one-time opponent.

"An outstanding statesman, he wisely chose the path of healing during a deeply divisive time in our nation's history," Mr. Carter said. "He frequently rose above politics by emphasizing the need for bipartisanship and seeking common ground on issues critical to our nation."

Former President Bill Clinton and New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton issued a joint statement, saying that Mr. Ford "to his great credit ... was the same hard-working, down-to-earth person the day he left the White House as he was when he first entered Congress."

Mr. Bush ordered all flags at federal buildings, including Congress, the White House, and U.S. diplomatic missions and military bases abroad, to be flown at half-staff for the next 30 days, according to the U.S. Flag Code guidelines for a former president's death. Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm, Michigan Democrat, followed suit for her state, ordering all flags on state office buildings to be flown at half-staff through Jan. 25.

DOJ_NMG_0109867

"I remember in his inaugural speech he said, 'You have not elected me as your president by your ballots, and so I ask you to confirm me as your president with your prayers,' " said the Rev. Billy Graham. "God certainly answered those prayers. President Ford was the great healer, and brought us together. We owe a great debt to him for how he put principle over politics at a crucial time in the life of our nation."

Historians have viewed Mr. Ford's legacy as focusing on the stability he provided after Mr. Nixon's resignation. However, polls show that his standing has continued to improve with the American public over the years.

In March 1975, his popularity sank to 37 percent, the lowest point of his presidency. The drop in his poll numbers is attributed to his decision to pardon Mr. Nixon the September before and the continued fallout from the Vietnam War.

In September 1974, just 33 percent of respondents told Time magazine that they agreed with the pardon. Yet by 1980, 55 percent of respondents said they had a favorable opinion of Mr. Ford in a CBS News/New York Times poll.

Those positive sentiments appear to have solidified over time. According to a June 2006 Gallup poll, 60 percent of Americans said they approve of the job Mr. Ford did as president, with only 26 percent registering disapproval.

"For most, the legacy of Gerald Ford will be the unity he brought to the nation after the divisive and bitter experiences of Watergate," presidential historian Doug Wead said yesterday on the Web site NewsMax.com. "In those days, Republican and Democrat, journalist and pundit could agree that the new president was honest and decent and he would make every effort to be fair. It was a time for healing."

Even Chevy Chase, the comedian whose "Saturday Night Live" parodies cemented the image of Mr. Ford as a klutz, said yesterday that he had come to have a high opinion of the former president, who was actually a star athlete in college and later a football and boxing coach.

After the show's run, "we became friends and he was a very, very sweet man," Mr. Chase told [a wire service] news agency.

"He took my wife and I on a whole lovely trip through Grand Rapids to show us where he had been as a child. We kept in touch, and he was just a terrific guy."

Gerald Ford Dead At 93 (CHIT)

By William Neikirk

Chicago Tribune, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Gerald R. Ford, who struggled to heal the nation's Watergate wounds in a short and turbulent tenure as president, died Tuesday. He was 93.

The death was announced by his wife, Betty. No cause of death was immediately disclosed, but the longest-living U.S. president had suffered from pneumonia and heart ailments in the past year.

``The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character and the honorable conduct of his administration," President Bush said in a statement from his Texas ranch. Bush said Ford "will always have a special place in our nation's memory."

Ford took over as the nation's 38th president on Aug. 9, 1974, after the resignation of Richard Nixon, but economic woes and his pardon of Nixon undercut his campaign of reconciliation and eventually his presidency. He was the only person to ever serve as chief executive without being elected president or vice president.

He died near his California home. After his body is flown to Washington Saturday, Ford's motorcade will pause at the World War II Memorial en route to the Capitol.

Ford's body will lie in state in the Capitol where he represented Grand Rapids, Mich., as a House member for 25 years and as House Republican leader. His body is expected to arrive Saturday evening in the Rotunda, to be met by House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Senate President Pro Tem Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) for a short ceremony.

The casket will be available for public viewing Saturday night, Sunday and Monday. On Tuesday morning, a large-scale funeral service will be held at the National Cathedral. Then, next Wednesday, Ford will be interred outside his presidential library and museum on the banks of the Grand River in Grand Rapids.

Those arrangements may change slightly as Congressional and White House officials work with the Ford family.

"Our long national nightmare is over," Ford told an anxious country after taking the oath of office to replace Nixon, who stepped down rather than face almost-certain impeachment over his role in covering up the Watergate scandal.

Referring to Nixon's departure, Ford added: "Our Constitution works. Our great republic is a government of laws and not of men."

But as he took charge with those reassuring words, events would later show that moment was perhaps the high point of a presidency that suffered for lack of a true electoral mandate.

DOJ_NMG_0109868

It came to an end in 1976. Ford managed to eke out a narrow yet party-dividing victory for the Republican nomination after a strong primary challenge from former California Gov. (and later president) Ronald Reagan. But in November he lost to Democrat Jimmy Carter in one of the closest elections in U.S. history after starting out far behind in the polls. Carter, a former Georgia governor, made the pardon a central campaign issue.

Ford achieved a rare distinction in 2003, when he became only the fourth former president to reach age 90, after John Adams, Herbert Hoover and Reagan. He told an interviewer upon turning 90: "I'm still playing golf. I'm still a nine-holer--my legs can't handle 18 very well."

Though Ford left the Oval Office with a reputation for being one of the nicest, most decent presidents in U.S. history, in the end the nice guy failed to extend the Republican electoral victories that began with Nixon's capture of the White House in 1968. Many observers saw Ford as a victim of his predecessor's scandal and the distrust it brought his party.

But in the first few weeks after Nixon's departure, the genial Ford brought a calming presence to the highest office in the land, shunning the imperial atmosphere fostered by Nixon. His straightforward manner eased the nation's concerns after a major constitutional crisis had nearly torn it apart. He also communicated a spirit of openness and sincerity as he crisscrossed the country, visiting all 50 states during his first 16 months in office.

Ford's wife, Elizabeth Ann "Betty" Ford, had stayed out of the spotlight during his congressional career. She spent much of her time raising their four children, Mike, Jack, Steve and Susan. But as first lady, she assumed a larger public role, stressing help for handicapped children and favoring the Equal Rights Amendment.

After she had breast cancer surgery in 1974, she campaigned for greater public awareness of the disease. And then, after successfully battling her own dependency on drugs and alcohol, she helped establish the Betty Ford Center at the Eisenhower Medical Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif.

`Accidental president'

The "accidental president," as some have called Ford, was also prone to accidents. His occasional stumbles and gaffes made him a favorite target of comedians, including Chevy Chase on NBC's "Saturday Night Live." He bumped his head on the presidential helicopter, and on an overseas trip in 1975, he fell down the ramp of Air Force One. Yet with an outstanding football career at the University of Michigan, he was perhaps the best athlete ever to occupy the Oval Office.

Ford wrote in his autobiography, "A Time to Heal," that he laughed at the jokes made at his expense about such missteps, but he added that if the people internalized an image of him as a bumbling, stumbling leader, that wouldn't be funny at all for his presidency.

The acid-tongued Lyndon Johnson once remarked that Ford played too much football without his helmet on.

"I'm a Ford, not a Lincoln," Ford said in one notable remark uttered while he was still vice president but that nonetheless reflected a modest vision about his place in history.

Even his political advisers privately criticized his speaking style and lack of charisma, but never his sincerity or decency. To many on the political scene in Washington, he was just "Good Old Jerry Ford."

In his nearly 2½ years as chief executive, Ford also had to deal with many thorny problems besides Watergate and the Nixon pardon. He presided over the painful final act of the American withdrawal from Vietnam--the April 28, 1975, evacuation of U.S. personnel as the North Vietnamese stormed Saigon. Throughout his presidency, he strove to stabilize an economy plagued by inflation, recession and fears of energy shortages.

Early in his tenure, he ordered a clemency program for Vietnam-era draft evaders and deserters that required them to do public service. About 15,000 Americans, civilian and military, participated.

He continued Nixon's program of detente with the Soviet Union and reached out to China, although the perceived defeat in Vietnam posed a major challenge in projecting U.S. power abroad in a world divided by the Cold War.

Ford sought to counter an image abroad that America had turned into a helpless giant--and he believed one incident gave him that opportunity.

Shortly after the fall of Saigon, he authorized a military operation to rescue 39 crew members of the merchant ship SS Mayaguez, which had been seized near the coast of Cambodia by Khmer Rouge forces.

In a mission filled with miscalculation and bungling, 41 Americans died and 50 were wounded in an invasion of Cambodia's Koh Tang Island, even though the crew members had been secretly released and put on a Thai fishing vessel before all the military strikes were completed. Despite the heavy losses, Ford claimed a victory for American credibility.

Attempts on his life

There were two attempts on Ford's life in September 1975 on separate trips to California. Both of the would-be assassins were women, Lynette "Squeaky" Fromme and Sara Jane Moore. For a while, Ford cut back on his travel as a result of the attempts.

DOJ_NMG_0109869

Though he was a creature of Congress, as president he often found himself at odds with a Democratic-controlled Capitol Hill, particularly on legislation to deal with the economy, and vetoed 66 pieces of legislation. He battled with Congress over energy legislation and whether spending should be cut to match tax reductions.

With inflation at 12 percent when he took office, he renounced Nixon's wage and price controls and opted instead for a "Whip Inflation Now" or "WIN" program, complete with WIN buttons that yielded more laughter than cooperation. In 1975 the economy sank into a steep but brief recession, and unemployment soared to more than 9 percent.

Joblessness and inflation abated in 1976, and tax cuts proposed by the White House helped. But the recovery slowed right before the November election--bad timing for Ford.

Ford, who was 61 when he took over the White House, was born Leslie Lynch King Jr. on July 14, 1913, in Omaha. He became Gerald R. Ford Jr. after his mother divorced and remarried.

When Ford assumed the presidency, he was a veteran congressional leader with three sons and a daughter whom his wife, Betty, almost exclusively raised as he tended to his political career. He had promised her that he would not run for president in 1976, but political demands dictated otherwise.

His family made more news than he did on occasion, with Betty Ford creating a national controversy by saying she would not be surprised to learn her children had smoked marijuana and wouldn't be shocked if her teenage daughter engaged in premarital sex.

Her husband, a Republican from the party's moderate Eisenhower wing, rose to the rank of House minority leader during a nearly 25-year congressional career before being chosen in October 1973 to be Nixon's vice president under authority of the 25th Amendment. He replaced Spiro Agnew, who stepped down after pleading no contest to a charge of income tax evasion after receiving illegal payments.

Two Democrats, House Speaker Carl Albert and Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield, were instrumental in Ford's selection, telling Nixon that of all the potential candidates, Ford would have the easiest time being confirmed. Ford also was pushed by moderates inside the Nixon administration. His ascension to the presidency marked the only time that a person who was not elected either president or vice president has held the nation's top office.

Once he became president, Ford named former New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller as vice president, completing the only non-elected team ever to lead the national government. But in an effort to appease the party's right wing, Rockefeller was dumped as Ford's 1976 running mate in favor of Sen. Bob Dole of Kansas.

"You just lost the election," Reagan representative Drew Lewis told Ford because he did not choose Reagan as his running mate.

Though Ford and Rockefeller were polar opposites in many ways, Ford was unsparing in his praise for the New Yorker as a team player. He later said one of his biggest regrets was in caving to right-wing pressure and dropping Rockefeller from the ticket.

Rockefeller, a liberal Republican who had sought the presidency in 1964, had his troubles in the new administration. He began as Ford's czar of domestic policy but was outmaneuvered by the president's top aides in that task. Later, Ford assigned him to head a commission that investigated controversial counterintelligence operations by the CIA and FBI, including alleged CIA assassination plots against foreign leaders such as Cuba's Fidel Castro.

When the Rockefeller Commission refused to publish information on the assassination plot against Castro under President John Kennedy, a congressional committee headed by Sen. Frank Church, an Idaho Democrat, rebuffed Ford and decided to publish it as part of a report recommending overhaul of government intelligence agencies.

For his part, Ford imposed restrictions on the FBI for spying on political activist organizations and high-profile figures such as Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, he said relaxing those curbs appeared to be appropriate, even though he added he was "very, very queasy" about "going back to the bad old days when the FBI was spying on people."

Ford was plain-spoken, and not naturally given to eloquence, a Midwesterner of modest means and common-sense conservative politics who never aspired to be president. His ambition as an up-and-coming congressman pointed in only one direction--to be speaker of the House. He said he believed in limited government and admitted he did not have presidential "vision," which he defined as grand governmental schemes and the rhetorical ability to sell them to the public.

Yet when he put his principles in action, sometimes they proved costly. When he opposed a federal bailout of a financially pinched New York City, the New York Daily News splashed a "Ford to City: Drop Dead" headline on its front page. The president said a bailout would have enabled the city to escape dealing with its problems. Some critics felt that position cost him New York in the 1976 election.

But nothing compared with Nixon's pardon for political impact. On Sept. 8, 1974, roughly a month after he took over, Ford issued a "full, free and absolute pardon" to Nixon in a decision that put an indelible mark on his presidency and gave Carter a handy campaign issue.

DOJ_NMG_0109870

Critics charged that the pardon had been hatched as part of a deal that would bring Ford to power, but Ford steadfastly denied that was the case.

In his autobiography, Ford said he decided on his own to pardon Nixon, explaining that Nixon's humiliation over resigning was punishment enough and that putting him on trial would revisit the sins of Watergate and cause greater turmoil. "The healing process would have been torn apart," he said.

One of his top advisers, James Cannon, wrote in a book that the president was "shocked" at the negative public reaction resulting from the pardon, thinking that the American people would be in a more forgiving mood. They weren't, and the pardon hobbled Ford throughout his presidency.

In retrospect, many political scientists give Ford credit for making a tough decision that would, over time, help heal the country--just not in time for Ford. In later years he would be honored for making one of the most courageous decisions in American politics.

On May 21, 2001, he received a Profile in Courage Award from the family of President Kennedy for his pardoning of Nixon. In his remarks, he said, "No doubt arguments over the Nixon pardon will continue for as long as historians relive those tumultuous days."

President Bill Clinton presented him the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 1999 for guiding the nation through the difficult times of Watergate, Nixon's resignation and pardon, and America's difficult disengagement from Vietnam.

On June 19, 2006, a few weeks before Ford's 93rd birthday, Vice President Dick Cheney praised the former president at the Gerald R. Ford Foundation's annual dinner.

"We worked for a man who had inherited a damaged office and who swiftly and successfully restored authority, dignity and respect to the presidency," Cheney said.

He noted that Ford once said that he "never could have imagined that he would be president of the United States in America's bicentennial year," 1976.

Cheney recalled at the foundation's 2005 dinner in Rancho Mirage that Ford "called the room to silence, lowered his voice, drew us into his confidence--and announced that he was Deep Throat."

`Integrity in the White House'

Asked by the Tribune in May 2003 how he wanted to be remembered, Ford said: "When historians write whatever they write, I hope they will say that President Ford re-established integrity in the White House, that President Ford restored public support for the White House on the basis of integrity. If that's the achievement of the Ford administration, according to historians, that would please me the most."

Some of Ford's key aides went on to greater political careers--perhaps one of his biggest legacies. His top diplomat in China, George H.W. Bush, became vice president and president. Cheney, his chief of staff, became vice president.

Donald Rumsfeld, another chief of staff and defense secretary, took over the Pentagon under President George W. Bush in 2001 and became one of the most influential defense secretaries in U.S. history. His chief economic adviser, Alan Greenspan, later became chairman of the Federal Reserve.

Politically, Ford--like Nixon--mistrusted the GOP's right wing. Ford and Reagan were never close, for instance, and campaign memos written on Ford's behalf in 1976 identified Reagan's followers as "right-wing nuts." The president also said he was miffed because Reagan provided only lukewarm support for his run against Carter.

To win the nomination in 1976, the president found he had to get tough with Reagan, airing television commercials questioning his competency and judgment.

He wrote in his autobiography that Reagan always thought he was right in an argument, didn't work all that hard at campaigning and had a tendency for "offering simplistic solutions to hideously complex problems."

Ford had his shortcomings as a campaigner. His staff often criticized his speaking style and speeches that weren't considered punchy enough. At a campaign speech in Illinois, for example, he stumbled over the words "fly swatter" several times, much to the delight of Carter.

But his most serious misstep came in a debate with Carter, when he declared that Eastern Europe was not under the domination of the Soviet Union. Ford did not think he had stumbled until Cheney told him the next day, and urged a clarification. Ford clarified his remarks, but the damage had been done.

Reagan swept to the GOP nomination in 1980, but at the Republican National Convention in Detroit, lieutenants for Reagan and Ford conducted intense negotiations to get Ford on the ticket as Reagan's running mate. Each time Ford turned down the offer, even as he appeared to be holding out for a kind of co-presidency or expanded vice presidency.

Ford indicated he might be willing to go on the ticket if the right deal could be worked out, but ultimately none of the offers was satisfactory to Ford. Reagan went to his second choice, George H.W. Bush.

In a May 2003 interview, Ford gave this account:

DOJ_NMG_0109871

"When Betty and I got to Detroit, we had a message that Gov. Reagan and [Reagan's wife] Nancy wanted to see us. They came to my suite and that's when Gov. Reagan said he would like me to be his running mate, which was a shocker because I had no such ambitions, but in deference to his request, I said let's think about it for 36 hours. In the meantime, both of us had advisers who analyzed the circumstances and finally, it was just generally agreed that it wouldn't work. And that's when Reagan very hurriedly called on George Bush."

While president, he had maintained his interest in sports, playing tennis often, building his own heated swimming pool on the White House grounds and going to his winter home in Vail every Christmas for a skiing holiday.

As a child, Ford lived in Grand Rapids, Mich., where he moved with his mother, Dorothy Gardner King, two weeks after his birth. Five months later, on Dec. 19, 1913, her divorce from Leslie Lynch King Jr. was made final.

On Feb. 1, 1916, his mother married Gerald R. Ford Sr., a paint salesman, who adopted her young son and renamed him. The couple had three sons of their own, but the elder Fords never told the younger children or Gerald that he was adopted. The future president didn't know he was adopted until he was 17, when his real father came to Michigan and introduced himself.

While working part time in a Grand Rapids restaurant, he noticed a stranger lingering by the candy counter one noon.

Ford described the incident in ``Gerald Ford and the Future of the Presidency," a book by Jerald terHorst, who was Ford's first press secretary in the White House and resigned in protest over the Nixon pardon.

``He stood there for a long time--he was a stranger--and finally as I was handling food or doing dishes, he walked across to me and said, `Leslie, I'm your father.' I was a little startled to be addressed as Leslie. Then he said, `Yes, I am your father; I was divorced from your mother. Would you go out to lunch with me?' "

Ford saw his father, who is believed to have died in the early 1940s, only occasionally after that.

A football star in high school, Ford attended the University of Michigan on an athletic scholarship. Although he has often been referred to as a former All-American football player, he did not make the first team at Michigan until his senior year, when he was named the team's most valuable player and was picked for the College All-Star Game.

After turning down offers to play professional football for the Green Bay Packers and the Detroit Lions, he went to Yale Law School, where he helped pay his expenses by working as an assistant football coach. He received his law degree in 1941, finishing in the upper third of his class, and joined the Navy less than a year later.

During his 47 months of active duty, he was first assigned to help shape up the hundreds of aviation cadets training at Chapel Hill, N.C. He then served on the light aircraft carrier USS Monterey in the Pacific. After the war, he returned to Grand Rapids to practice law.

In his autobiography, Ford told of being nearly swept overboard during a typhoon in the Philippine Sea that also ruptured airplane fuel tanks and caused a fire. He wrote that, as president, a fire at the height of a typhoon was a "marvelous metaphor for the ship of state."

1st taste of politics

Ford's first taste of politics was in 1940 when he served as a Michigan volunteer in Republican Wendell Willkie's presidential campaign against Franklin Roosevelt.

When he became interested in trying to solve the housing problems of young, married former servicemen, he decided to use the experience he had gained in the Willkie campaign to help organize the Independent Veterans Association. He was named vice president of the group, which effectively lobbied local commissioners and supervisors for more low-cost housing for veterans.

Meanwhile, he had met Chicago native Betty Bloomer Warren, a former professional dancer who studied with Martha Graham and worked as fashion coordinator at a Grand Rapids department store. After they dated for several months, he proposed but told her they couldn't marry until autumn because something was coming up--actually a try for Congress--that he couldn't tell her about at the time.

He won an upset victory over the incumbent in the Republican primary and was married on Oct. 15, 1948, less than three weeks before he won the general election.

The honeymoon gave way to the campaign. Married on Friday, Ford took his new bride to a University of Michigan football game the next afternoon. That evening they attended a Republican reception in Owosso, Mich., for Thomas Dewey, the Owosso-born governor of New York who was running for president.

After defeating Democrat Fred Barr, Ford went to Washington and won assignment to the House Appropriations Committee.

His first national recognition came in 1952, when he joined 18 other House Republicans in sending Dwight Eisenhower a letter urging that he return to the United States from his military post in Europe and run for president. About the same time he signed the Eisenhower letter, Ford was approached by a group of Michigan Republican leaders wanting him to run for the U.S. Senate to fill the seat of Arthur Vandenberg, who had died, but Ford turned them down to make way for a friend.

By 1959 he was being talked of as a candidate for the House Republican leadership. A year later he was endorsed by the Michigan GOP as the favorite-son candidate for vice president.

He was one of three Republicans picked for a ``truth squad'' to trail Kennedy around the country during the 1960 campaign against Nixon. He was also one of five Republicans to sign a statement denouncing Kennedy's first State of the Union Message as ``a shabby attempt'' to paint a bleak picture of the nation's economic and international situation.

Later, President Johnson would choose Ford as one of two congressmen on the Warren Commission, which investigated Kennedy's assassination.

Ford was always popular with his fellow Republicans, and that paid off in 1963 when he was elected chairman of the House Republican Caucus, the third-ranking GOP leadership post. Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) said Ford was one of four Republicans he could support for president in 1964. When Goldwater won the nomination, he considered picking Ford as his running mate.

After Goldwater's 1964 loss to Johnson by a landslide, Ford made his move for the House Republican leadership, besting veteran Rep. Charles Halleck of Indiana for the position that would nearly a decade later prove to be his springboard to the presidency.

As House Republican leader, Ford seldom rejected a plea for campaign help from GOP colleagues. He teamed up with the colorful Sen. Everett Dirksen of Illinois in the ``Ev and Jerry Show''--a television presentation of Republican views on national issues.

With Johnson's Great Society programs being passed easily by the heavily Democratic Congress, the ``Ev and Jerry Show'' had more entertainment value than political significance.

Ford's tenure as vice president was an uncomfortable part of his political career. The balance between loyalty to his president and the maintenance of personal integrity and credibility proved difficult. Even after he was told Nixon was likely to resign within a week, Ford said in several speeches he knew of no impeachable offense that had been committed and suggested Nixon somehow would overcome his problems.

An Unelected President Shone At Crucial Moment (CSM)

Posted December 28, 2006 - http://www.csmonitor.com/2006/1228/p25s01-uspo.html An unelected president shone at crucial moment Gerald Ford is eulogized for his openness and honesty in the White House after the Nixon years.

By Peter Grier | Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

WASHINGTON

On Aug. 8, 1974, shortly before 11 a.m., President Richard Nixon entered the Oval Office to meet with Vice President Gerald Ford. President Nixon's face was ashen, but he was set on his course, so he shook hands and motioned Mr. Ford to sit in a chair beside him.

An awkward silence followed. Then Nixon broke it.

"You'll do fine," he said.

The formalities were yet to come, but at that moment, like a shock, the powers of the presidency leapt from one man to the other. Nixon, wounded by Watergate, was resigning; Ford was about to become the first, and so far only, unelected chief executive of the United States.

Ford, who died Tuesday at his home in California, had spent decades in Washington preparing himself for higher political office. The problem was, that office was speaker of the House. Now, in 1974, this product of Congress had to sit where Nixon had sat - and Lyndon Johnson and John F. Kennedy before him - and lead a dispirited and divided nation.

Watergate was only part of it. Ford inherited the Vietnam war, and inflation, and the cold war, too.

Did he do fine, as predicted? Ford's pardon of Nixon was deeply unpopular, and probably cost him the '76 election. His Whip Inflation Now campaign seemed all lapel buttons and no bite. The comedian Chevy Chase's imitations of his pratfalls remain legendary, however unfair.

But Ford was more, somehow, than the sum of his policies. Decent, fair, modest, and - truth be told - shrewd, he made Washington seem normal again. It was a time for healing, as he himself later said. And heal he did, steadying the economy and keeping to a moderate foreign-policy course.

The Nixon years had been as dramatic and taxing as Wagnerian opera. This political theater ended under Ford. The US could relax, and refocus on the future.

"On behalf of the entire nation, thank you for restoring the nation's confidence in itself," said President Jimmy Carter to Ford, moments after taking the oath of office in 1976.

DOJ_NMG_0109873

Ford was born July 14, 1913, in Omaha, Neb. He was named Leslie Lynch King Jr., after his father, Leslie King, a Montana wool trader. His parents divorced shortly after his birth, and two years later, his mother married a Michigan paint salesman named Gerald Ford, who gave his stepson his name and raised him as his own.

Stocky and blond, Gerald Rudolph Ford Jr. grew up in Grand Rapids, Michigan's second-largest - and most conservative - city. Even in those days, boys generally wore sports shirts and sweaters to school. Jerry Ford usually wore a suit and tie.

He studied hard and got decent grades but was best known as the star center of the South High School football team. "Back then I had absolutely no interest in politics or a career in government," he later said.

Recruited by its football coach, Ford entered the University of Michigan in 1931. He played on undefeated teams in 1932 and 1933, and was named the Wolverines' "most valuable player" in 1934. The Detroit Lions and the Green Bay Packers offered him pro contracts when he graduated in 1935, but Ford, a solid "B" student, had set his sights on another line of work: the law.

He took a coaching job at Yale, and eventually talked his way into Yale Law School. He worked hard - perhaps unsurprisingly, his best grades were in legal ethics - but had time to found a modeling business on the side.

Yes, modeling. Urged on by Phyllis Brown, a girlfriend who was herself a model, Ford backed a New York agency for several years. Eventually he himself starred in a Look magazine photo spread about a weekend in the life of sports-oriented young people.

Then World War II intervened. Shortly after receiving his law degree in 1941, Ford enlisted in the Navy. Serving on the aircraft carrier USS Monterey, Ford was witness to many of the biggest naval battles in the Pacific. But his only close call came during a typhoon, when he slipped on deck and flew like a toboggan over the edge - only to drop neatly onto a catwalk.

After the war, Ford returned to Grand Rapids to practice law.

And like another young Navy vet in California, Richard Milhous Nixon, Ford's interests and experience made politics a natural career choice.

He began his political life as a reform candidate dedicated to sweeping out the prewar old guard of Michigan politics. In 1948, he beat incumbent Rep. Bartel Jonkman in the Republican primary for Michigan's Fifth Congressional District.

Eventually, the people of the Fifth District elected Jerry Ford to Congress 13 times.

In Washington, Ford quickly developed a reputation as a loyal Republican and hard worker. He wangled a spot on the powerful Appropriations Committee, and, with the help of other young members dissatisfied with the GOP old bulls, won election to the party's congressional leadership.

In 1965 he was elected House minority leader. But his long-held goal, speaker of the House, seemed as far away as ever, as Democrats kept control of the chamber in election after election.

Some thought him stolid. Others knew better.

"There is an inscrutability about Jerry," one of his friends told the Grand Rapids newsman Bud Vestal in 1974. "You think you know him, but there's always one layer of reserve between you and Jerry's inner self."

By '74 he was tired of laboring in the minority. That term would be his last, he figured - he'd go back to Grand Rapids in 1976.

But then came the scandals of the Nixon presidency. Vice President Spiro Agnew resigned in 1973, after being accused of taking bribes in political office. Nixon knew Ford from years of service together in Congress; some newsmen had even speculated in 1968 that Ford would be his running mate. When Nixon announced his new choice for vice president at a White House ceremony, members of Congress in the audience raised a deafening cheer.

"They like you," Nixon said to Ford as they stood on the podium.

"I have a couple of friends out there," said Ford, as the applause continued.

Then the Watergate crisis deepened and, less than a year later, Nixon, too, resigned. Ex-jock, ex-model, a man who'd come home at night covered with paint after working in his father's paint and varnish factory as a boy, Ford was president of the United States.

On Sept. 14, 1974, President Ford opened a National Security Council (NSC) meeting on the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) nuclear-reduction talks with a short, cogent statement of the principles at stake.

SALT was good for the country, Ford said; the US had the "obligation" of finding common ground for agreement. Better to go in with that attitude than a cynical or skeptical one, which might itself block the way forward.

"Not any agreement is acceptable ... but reaching an agreement is in our best interests," he said. "We should proceed on the basis that this is the case."

To the cabinet, accustomed to Nixon's long, rambling harangues, these words must have seemed a revelation. They were modest, yet unarguable, and after the president delivered them, he shut up. Not entirely - he asked a question here and there. But in the main, he let his advisers convince him, rather than the other way around.

DOJ_NMG_0109874

To pore through the minutes of Ford's presidential meetings is to see a leader who is far from a bumbler. In at least one NSC meeting he corrected a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff about the military's own budget. But as president he did not force decisions. He had a sense of humor, even about his infamous falls, including one he took on a state visit to Austria.

"In Austria, the president indicated he tumbled into Austria," read the minutes of a June 4, 1975, cabinet meeting, "but he really felt that Betty had tripped him, then ran away and left him to get to his feet all by himself."

But it wasn't enough to win his election to the office he'd inherited. Barely a month into his presidency, Ford pardoned Nixon for any crimes he might have committed. Eighty percent of Americans disapproved; even Ford's press secretary, Jerry terHorst, resigned.

Ford's popularity recovered, and the nation was spared a divisive trial, but the pardon remained a drag on Ford's poll ratings. In 1976, he was beaten by Democrat Jimmy Carter, who won fewer states but more electoral votes.

Ford was the only Michigander, and the first Eagle Scout, to become president. He was the first appointed vice president (the second was his own vice president, Nelson Rockefeller), and the only unelected chief executive of the US. He was the only president whose motorcade was involved in an auto accident, and he held the record for number of presidential assassination attempts (two).

Yet he may forever be best known for this: He was his own man, and not Richard Nixon. For the United States, at a crucial point in its history, that was enough.

As Donald Rumsfeld, who served as Ford's Defense secretary, said in 1986: "It was a time to heal, and Gerald Ford did it as few others could have."

The Homegrown Decency Of Gerald Ford (WP)

By Wil Haygood

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

There is something about landscape and upbringing, about how it often seems to come to bear upon the temperament of an individual. Gerald R. Ford Jr., a Michigan boy, grew up to be president. If one were to flip through a sepia-tinted scrapbook, into Ford's 1920s and 1930s Grand Rapids, one might see glistening lakes, football fields, leafy trees. One might hear teakettles whistling atop stoves. And one might imagine a place where boys weren't supposed to cry.

There was indeed that tableau, but there were also other things -- less poetic -- humming in the life of the young Gerald Ford. His mother was a divorcee; his birth father was a smoothie and a ladies' man. There would be financial woes even after his mother remarried. Young Jerry also had a stuttering problem. (By the time he reached high school, however, the stutter was gone, as if he had miraculously laid it in his hand and flung it across a nearby lake.)

There was something of a Hemingwayesque code at play in Ford's upbringing. Grace looked so sweet under pressure. One bore up coatless in wintertime if needed. One suffered quietly, and family demons never rolled beyond the window curtains.

By the time he had emerged onto the national stage, something simple and munificent had bled its way into his being: decency.

Ford was a decent man, and he seemed to admire in others, more than anything else, that trait.

Throughout his life, there were moments when he might have faltered. He might have become self-centered, paranoid about the motives of others, egotistical once entrenched behind a fancy desk on Capitol Hill. He came of age during the Depression, when people starved and homes vanished like feathers blown away by the cold financial winds.

There was indeed a Nixon enemies list, but Ford would have considered such a thing anathema. He seems to have eschewed unattractive tics. He chuckled; he rested; he backslapped. Parodied on those "Saturday Night Live" skits, he took it in stride and even made a cameo appearance on the show. Life needed humor.

Here is Ford in his unadorned autobiography, "A Time to Heal," talking about his freshman year in 1931 at the University of Michigan: "I'd saved one hundred dollars that summer working at the paint factory. For three hours every day, during the lunch period, I waited tables in the interns' dining room at the university hospital, then helped clean up the nurses' cafeteria. A wonderful aunt and uncle, Roy and Ruah La Forge, sent me a two-dollar check every week. And once every two or three months, I received twenty-five dollars for donating blood at the university hospital."

There's decency in remembrance of that aunt and uncle; they're not just aunt and uncle, they're "wonderful."

He wore plaid and made it look, well, plaid. He smoked a pipe and he talked like a man who had no time to waste on words. He thought candor decent, slipperiness indecent.

The human dramas found him sure enough, and the sword he bore against them was decency.

DOJ_NMG_0109875

In his mind it was decent to pardon Richard Nixon. Here are some of the words Ford uttered upon accepting the presidency: "In the beginning I asked you to pray for me. Before closing, I ask again your prayers for Richard Nixon and for his family. May our former president who brought peace to millions find it for himself."

You could make too much of Ford's Midwestern upbringing -- as if someone were predestined by virtue of a Michigan or Ohio or Illinois birth with openness, candor and friendliness. That is a cliche burned into the nation's mind-set, along with notions that most Californians are supposed to be uber-hip and most New Yorkers fancy. What that upbringing might have given Ford was room to grow and little room to cry out. It gave him the cheeriness to do unexpected things, and he did them as simply as walking through someone's front door: He appointed William Coleman, a black man, as transportation secretary. It was not lost on blacks that Ford was the first Republican president to appoint a black as a Cabinet secretary, and it was not lost on blacks that the distinguished Coleman was not given the kind of job blacks usually got -- such as housing or health and human services. Coleman was the best individual Ford could find for the job. Ford presided over the swearing-in ceremony himself; it seemed a grandly decent and quietly historic thing to do.

He stood resolutely beside his wife, Betty, when she endured bouts with alcoholism. He encouraged her to talk about her disease. His family's demons, in time, rolled beyond the window. He blinked not an ounce of shame or embarrassment.

Politics, football, love, family. He warmed the bench at Michigan until he eventually won the job as starting center. There is a beautiful poem by James Wright, a Midwestern poet by way of Ohio. It speaks of things on the gridiron of Ford's life:

In the Shreve High football stadium,
I think of Polacks nursing long beers in Tiltonsville,
And gray faces of Negroes in the blast furnace at Benwood,
And the ruptured night watchman of Wheeling Steel,
Dreaming of heroes.
All the proud fathers are ashamed to go home.
Their women cluck like starved pullets,
Dying for love.
Therefore, their sons grow suicidally beautiful
At the beginning of October.
And gallop terribly against each other's bodies.

The 38th president of the United States had galloped toward decency during his lifetime. Myths seemed to have meant little to him. In his memoirs, he recalled the afternoon he met his birth father during his teen years. It deeply affected him. The man had come through Grand Rapids with a pretty chippy; he idled into the small restaurant where his son was slapping burgers. They went for a ride. The words got in the way. "When I went to bed that night," Gerald Ford would come to write, "I broke down and cried."

A decent thing for a kid to do.

Wife Created New Image For First Lady (USAT)

By John Ritter

USA Today, December 28, 2006

As Betty Ford mourns her husband of 58 years, Americans recall an outspoken and candid first lady never shy about discussing her problems or pet causes.

Entering a White House East Wing vacated by the reticent Pat Nixon, Ford in less than three years put a new face on the presidential wives sorority and created a model for her successors.

"Betty was so much more outgoing and gregarious and kind of in your face about certain issues," says Craig Schermer, historian at the National First Ladies' Library in Canton, Ohio. "She paved the way for Nancy Reagan and Rosalynn Carter and Barbara Bush."

Ford, 88, is best known for openness about her breast cancer while in the White House and, after President Ford had left office, about her substance abuse. But she was even more outspoken — though it's less remembered today — about her support for the doomed Equal Rights Amendment for women.

"She publicly made phone calls and even appeared on The Mary Tyler Moore Show to urge congressional support," Schermer says. "At one point, somebody on the president's staff asked him if there was a way to muzzle her." He refused.

Here was a first lady who, when asked by a TV interviewer what she'd do if she learned that her daughter was having premarital sex, said she hoped her daughter would be on the pill.

That seemed outrageous to many in the mid-1970s. Equally courageous was Ford's decision to publicly disclose her breast cancer in 1974 and her subsequent treatment — a mastectomy. Women didn't talk openly about breast cancer in those days, much less examine their breasts for lumps. After she left Bethesda Naval Hospital, Ford appeared on the South Portico of the White House and waved.

DOJ_NMG_0109876

"She was one of the first people of prominence to acknowledge it. It was not an easy thing to do," says Barbara Brenner of the advocacy group Breast Cancer Action. "She encouraged a lot of women to take better care of themselves."

Ford is also a living symbol that breast cancer need not be a death sentence, Brenner says.

The former first lady is even better known today for a painful chapter in her life, addiction to alcohol and painkillers stemming from attempts to relieve severe neck pain. Her daughter, Susan Ford Bales, then 19, arranged a medical intervention that got her mother into treatment in 1978.

In 1982, Ford co-founded, with her friend Leonard Firestone, the Betty Ford Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif. The facility has become a world-famous destination; more than 70,000 people have sought treatment there for alcoholism and drug abuse, including such celebrities as Elizabeth Taylor.

Even though Ford's addiction treatment occurred after her husband left office, "what it did was make us realize that presidential families have their own crises," Schermer says. "We make jokes today about the Betty Ford Center, but it provided a real viable place for people to go."

The Fords, married in 1948 two weeks before Gerald was elected to his first term in Congress, were a devoted and intimate couple. "They were very, very close physically and emotionally, and they genuinely truly adored each other," Schermer says.

The Fords were also the first couple to elevate the presidential kiss from a traditional peck on the cheek. "They were very open about kissing one another," he says.

Profile In Decency (WP)

By Bob Dole

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

We were fortunate in 1974, a time of crisis, to have the right person in the right place at the right time. When the country needed healing, reconciliation and restoration of confidence, Gerald Ford provided it.

He was a principled partisan, a GOP leader who worked diligently for Republican causes but who knew the limits of partisanship. He could also count -- and he knew that with Republicans in the minority, if he was to accomplish anything as House Republican leader or as president, he would often need a bipartisan approach.

He was never a person to nurse a grudge. He was willing to admit mistakes. Generally, he had a smile on his face, but he was determined and competitive, though realistic about what he could achieve.

In defeat he was gracious. Notwithstanding a heated 1976 campaign, in a race that went from a 30-point deficit to a cliffhanger, he and President Jimmy Carter became close friends and accomplished many worthwhile things together.

Gerald Ford had never sought the presidency and thus was obligated to no group or individual. His legacy will be that he stopped the national hemorrhaging over Watergate. A man of courage and integrity, he made the tough choice of pardoning Richard Nixon, which helped heal the nation but very likely cost him the 1976 election. He showed his willingness to put the country's interest first.

Becoming The President (NYT)

By David Hume Kennerly

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

I TOOK this photograph of President Gerald Ford in the White House Cabinet Room on May 14, 1975, as he met with his National Security Council about the Mayagüez crisis. The cargo ship Mayagüez had been captured by Khmer Rouge rebels, and it was up to the president to try to get the American crew released safely.

After diplomacy failed, Mr. Ford, who had been president for nine months, waved off one of the Joint Chiefs of Staff's recommendations, which involved a B-52 strike on Phnom Penh, and instead ordered a strong but limited military action that ultimately secured the crew's freedom. Tension was thick in that meeting, but the president's hand was firmly on the controls. In my mind this incident was the fulcrum of his presidency, the point at which he came of age as commander in chief, and the photo shows that.

In some of the Mayagüez meetings, the president's advisers offered up hypotheticals on how certain decisions might "play." They wanted to make sure the world knew that America might still use overwhelming force in achieving its ends. Mr. Ford didn't want to hear that. He had no bloodlust. He knew Vietnam was a debacle; it had been his painful duty to oversee the end of that horrible chapter of American history. But he refused to make innocent Cambodians pay for America's mistakes in Vietnam.

For me, 30 years later, this photo is emblematic of Gerald Ford's finally making the presidency his own. If I had to describe him in one word, it would be "resolute."

The man I came to know and admire had a quiet and very powerful sense of self. He had the least guile of anyone I've ever met and a total lack of vanity. There were no "two Gerald Fords," there was no other agenda, no secret life. An avid golfer to the end, he would never move his ball to improve his lie when no one was looking. To me that was the central theme of his character. I will miss him profoundly.

Moral Leadership (WP)

By Ron Nessen

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

One reason Gerald R. Ford was a good president was because he never wanted to be president.

After 25 years as a congressman from Grand Rapids, Mich., he told his wife, Betty, that he was going to run for one more term in the House and then retire to spend more time with her and their children. Then, suddenly, he was appointed vice president (after Spiro Agnew's resignation) and succeeded to the presidency (after Richard Nixon's resignation).

Unlike politicians who carefully calculate for decades how their every word and deed will sound and look when they eventually run for the White House, Ford moved into the Oval Office without having his persona distorted by lust for the presidency.

And the public sensed this genuineness. What a relief to have a regular person as president, particularly after the imperial presidencies of Nixon and Lyndon B. Johnson. Ford was "the man next door."

After the resignation, it took the Nixons a few days to move their belongings out of the White House. It took a few more days to freshen up the paint in the second-floor living quarters. So for 10 days after he became president, Gerald Ford, Betty and their children Susan, Steve and Jack continued to live in their modest suburban rambler on Crown View Drive in Alexandria. I always thought: What a perfect symbol for an ordinary-guy president.

One day Ford's dog, Liberty, made a mess on the rug in the Oval Office. A Navy steward rushed to clean it up. "I'll do that," Ford said. "No man should have to clean up after another man's dog." As I say, it was nice to have a regular person as president.

Unlike some of his predecessors, Ford didn't take himself too seriously. He taped short bits making fun of himself for "Saturday Night Live," then in its first season. He invited Chevy Chase, who made his reputation on the show by spoofing Ford's foibles, to play tennis on the White House courts. And after Chase had performed his "clumsy Ford" routine at the White House Correspondents' Association dinner, the president took the podium and topped the professional comic with a brilliant routine of self-deprecating humor.

One of Ford's favorite sayings about the political and legislative debates in Washington was that "you can disagree without being disagreeable." He not only said it, he lived it. How nostalgic that seems in these days of angry, divisive, polarized, downright nasty Washington rhetoric.

But as president, Gerald Ford did more than change the post-Watergate atmosphere in Washington. The Vietnam War ended during his presidency. By what he did and what he said after the last helicopter lifted off the roof of the U.S. Embassy in Saigon, Ford headed off a bitter postwar campaign of recrimination about "Who lost Vietnam?"

One day during that dark period, I walked into the Oval Office and showed Ford an Associated Press story reporting that the House had rejected a bill providing funds to help resettle hundreds of thousands of Vietnamese refugees who would probably be targets of imprisonment and execution by the victorious North Vietnamese and Viet Cong. I'd never heard Ford curse before, but he did that day when he read the story.

He undertook a public lobbying campaign, including visits to refugee camps in Arkansas and Florida, which turned around public and congressional opposition to helping the refugees. It was his greatest display of moral leadership.

Ford also had a knack for finding and recruiting talented people to serve in government.

Henry Kissinger, Ford's secretary of state, gave a talk at the National Archives a few months ago assessing Ford's presidency. Kissinger noted that judgments about events and leaders made in the heat of the moment often must be modified or reversed when those events and leaders are reassessed from the perspective of 30 years of subsequent history.

President Ford and his presidency are viewed much more favorably today than they were the day he left office. It's good to know that he lived long enough to enjoy the reassessment.

'Our Constitution Works' (WSJ)

By Melvin R. Laird

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0109878

Years ago, in the middle of a severe national crisis, a man arose who, in biblical phraseology, had "healing in his wings." On Aug. 9, 1974, that man, Gerald Rudolph Ford, Jr., became our 38th president during the political storm of Watergate and began a vital American restoration with these words: "Our long national nightmare is over. Our Constitution works."

Jerry Ford was my close friend for more than 50 years. Our children grew up together. We spent holidays together. It is difficult for me now to imagine moments more rewarding than an August evening in 1974, at the Fords' modest house in Alexandria, Va., where Betty and Jerry had invited their children and a few intimate friends to ponder history in the making -- Richard Nixon's resignation and Jerry's ascension to the presidency. Some of us sat on the floor of the small living room, and Betty served snacks as we talked. Having taken off his coat and tie, Jerry helped in the kitchen. He made sure everyone felt at home, paying as much attention to the opinions of his children as to those of his friends. He was no longer Jerry but the president, yet he was still the same.

He was our Accidental President -- never elected by the voters to represent anything but his congressional district, which included Grand Rapids, Mich. It was a happy accident for America, and in many ways it was no accident. It was years in the making and required hard work, planning and good fortune. Jerry often told me how fortunate he had been, beginning when he was only two weeks old and his courageous mother fled an abusive marriage to make a better life for herself and her son.

I first met Jerry in 1951, but our paths came close to crossing when we both served in the Navy in World War II and our separate ships were caught in the same typhoon that nearly took our lives in December 1944. Jerry's brush with death came when he was rushing to put out a fire on the flight deck of the U.S.S. Monterey, and lost his footing. He fell as the storm rolled the ship 25 degrees, and he slid down the tilting deck. Only his quick athletic reflexes and the two-inch rim at the edge of the deck slowed him down just enough to allow him to roll onto the catwalk below. In less than a day, Typhoon Cobra sank three of our destroyers and took the lives of 778 men. Later, some were surprised that Jerry could laugh in the midst of great political turmoil. They failed to fathom how harmless political conflicts can be to a battle-tested veteran.

Seven years later, on a visit to Washington as a Wisconsin state senator, I was introduced to Congressman Ford. He was nine years older than me. We became immediate friends. And when I was elected to Congress, we were seatmates in the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee for 16 years, before I became secretary of defense. He was as plain as bread and occasionally bland, but also unfailingly believable, honest, considerate and -- that rarest of commodities -- politically dependable.

When it was clear that the mossback Republican leadership of the House needed to be swept aside, I led a group of young Turks (which included Rep. Donald Rumsfeld) pushing Jerry forward through three successive party coups, eventually making him House minority leader. Jerry and I worked as a close team rebuilding the party with policies that offered constructive alternatives and laid the groundwork for Nixon's 1968 presidential win. * * *

Lyndon Johnson publicly ridiculed Jerry, saying that he'd "played football too long without his helmet on." Jerry was blessed with an abundance of inner security, so political barbs like that didn't bother him much. True, he was a star center for the University of Michigan football team; but he also graduated third in his class at Yale Law School and could easily hold his own with any "intellectual," including Henry Kissinger, when he challenged him on the policy of détente. Johnson insulted Jerry because as president he felt threatened, and rightly so. Jerry had become a formidable political opponent, partly as a result of his opposition to a massive escalation of U.S. troops in the Vietnam War. (In one of the secret tapes released by the National Archives, Defense Secretary Robert McNamara can be heard saying to Johnson: "Jerry Ford and Laird are dangerous." Johnson agreed.)

Jerry's most ambitious political goal was to become speaker of the House, but the lack of a Republican majority denied him. Instead, and ironically, he became president of the Senate when Nixon appointed him vice president. I was Nixon's White House domestic counselor when Vice President Spiro Agnew resigned in October 1973, and used my leverage with Nixon to persuade him to choose Jerry over the man Nixon wanted, John Connally of Texas. Jerry survived the most vigorous investigation ever conducted by the FBI up to that time and the first test of the 25th Amendment providing for the appointment of a new vice president. With a man of such integrity waiting in the wings, many in Congress were prepared to run Nixon out of office for his Watergate misdeeds.

Three days after his inauguration, President Ford spoke to a joint session of Congress, and said simply: "We have a lot of work to do. Let's get on with it." He also warned the American public: "A government big enough to give you everything you want is a government big enough to take from you everything you have." These remarks delivered in an hour of severe national trial evoked immediate acclaim.

Jerry was not perfect, and he could be faulted for allowing Mr. Kissinger to push too rapidly for détente with the Soviet Union. He could also be faulted for the misguided dumping of his vice president, Nelson Rockefeller, from the 1976 ticket in a vain hope of placating Ronald Reagan and the conservative wing of the party. Later in life he admitted to me he was wrong on both counts.

Nevertheless, in his 895 days as president, Jerry Ford accomplished a great deal of good. He inherited double-digit inflation and the worst recession since the 1930s, which he turned into a healthy economic recovery before he left office. He reformed the CIA and had a gift for some enlightened appointments, such as Ed Levi as attorney general and, in my opinion, John Paul Stevens as Supreme Court justice. The 1975 Helsinki agreement on human-rights principles, which he negotiated with the Soviet Union, emboldened leaders such as Lech Walesa in Poland and Vaclav Havel in Czechoslovakia to challenge Communist rule in Eastern Europe, leading to the eventual collapse of the Soviet empire.

Of greatest importance, however, was his righting of the ship of state. That included the controversial pardon of Nixon. I was 100% behind it, but along with Bryce Harlow urged him to delay until congressional and other support could be publicly lined up in advance. But Jerry was never one to procrastinate once he had made a decision. So when he abruptly announced the pardon a month into his presidency, the nation was stunned, and did not forgive or forget. That probably cost him the 1976 election. Typical of Jerry, he never regretted his decision.

Perhaps the most emotionally satisfying stamp of approval regarding that decision came five years ago in a small scene out of the public eye when Sen. Edward Kennedy admitted that Jerry had been right. The Kennedy-Nixon rivalry was the political equivalent of the Hatfields and McCoys, so the admission had strong emotional resonance. The occasion was the Kennedy family presentation of the John F. Kennedy Profile in Courage Award to Ford, precisely for the pardon. Sen. Kennedy praised him that day for going against the tide of popular opinion. "I was one of those who spoke out against his action then. But time has a way of clarifying past events, and now we see that President Ford was right," Sen. Kennedy said.

Jerry's reply on that occasion in Boston is something all Americans should take to heart as we mourn his passing: "The ultimate test of leadership is not the polls you take, but the risks you take. In the short run, some risks prove overwhelming. Political courage can be self-defeating. But the greatest defeat of all would be to live without courage, for that would hardly be living at all."

Mr. Laird was secretary of defense under Nixon and an eight-term congressman from Wisconsin.

Why Ford Was The Right Man For The Moment (FT)

By Art Cyr

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

"The right sort of sports fan" is how McGeorge Bundy in 1974 described America's newly-installed President Gerald Ford, immediately after the resignation of Richard Nixon.

Bundy at the time was president of the Ford Foundation, a major target of the political right, and previously had been national security adviser to presidents John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson. He appeared on the very long "enemies list" maintained by the Nixon White House,and personified the Eastern seaboard elitists who used to run foreign policy and particularly galled the now-disgraced former president.

Gerald Ford, a star football player at the University of Michigan, turned down more than one offer from the pros. Congressman Ford's "regular guy" demeanor personified the classic American athlete. Perhaps that was one reason Nixon made him vice president after the resignation of the disgraced Spiro Agnew. Nixon, by that time drowning in political fall-out from the Watergate scandal, may have sensed what the country would need to recover from his own political demise.

Nixon seemed to personify how seeking national political office could become distorting torture. In the 1960 presidential campaign, working reporters in the field on balance clearly favored the Democrat, Kennedy, over Nixon. Unfair jibes included the point that the athletic Kennedy was sports-minded, in contrast to Nixon.

In reaction, relentlessly determined Nixon became an expert on big-time sports, knowledgeable about teams and players – especially football. After each Super Bowl, he would phone the winning team (Ronald Reagan would call both teams). When massive numbers of anti-Vietnam War protesters came to Washington, the White House announced that the president was unconcerned, and planned to watch a football game.

By contrast, Ford, the "positive president", ran an open and upfront White House. He was willing to testify before Congress, as Abraham Lincoln had done. He avoided recrimination against his own political opponents – who were never viewed as "enemies".

Ford even took the risk of formally pardoning Nixon, avoiding the spectacle of the resigned president on trial and perhaps in prison. Many observers believe the ensuing controversy was one factor in Jimmy Carter's victory in the 1976 presidential election, which rendered Ford our only president not elected to national office.

Time, however, has confirmed Ford's judgment. An informal AOL online poll immediately after his death indicates about two-thirds of respondents believes pardoning Nixon was the right thing to do.

Without the mandate of popular election, and assuming office in the shadow of Nixon's resignation, Ford was never able to assert presidential strength. A large proportion of his legislative vetoes were overturned. Congress tried to run foreign policy through the War Powers Act. That law is now defunct, but the atmosphere of the time prevented the Ford administration from intervening effectively when South Vietnam was overrun by North Vietnamese troops in 1975.

Unavoidably, any discussion of the Ford presidency involves Nixon, in ways that go beyond policy. Each man seemed to represent the average American, far removed from east coast elitists who led America into Vietnam. Reagan's election to the White House in 1980 dramatically confirmed this popular reaction.

Meanwhile, Gerald Ford remains the right president at one particular moment in history.

Gerald Ford's Perfect Pitch (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Those who believe that a kindly Providence keeps a watchful eye on America's welfare can cite the fact of Gerald Ford. On Aug. 9, 1974, at a moment when the nation was putting aside an unhappy, tormented president, and was aching for serenity in high places, to the center of national life strode an abnormality -- a happy, normal man as president.

Watergate and a presidential resignation were only two of the nation's problems that August. The mid-'70s were years when everyday things could no longer be counted on -- inflation was undermining the currency as a store of value, and lines at gasoline pumps testified to the power of foreigners to get between Americans and their best friends, their automobiles. Ford was a political sedative for a nation with jangled nerves.

He was one of five presidents who never got elected to the office. (The others were John Tyler, Millard Fillmore, Andrew Johnson and Chester Arthur.) He was the only person to be president without receiving any popular or electoral votes for president or vice president. He was about as exotic as . . . well, as he was fond of saying, he was "a Ford, not a Lincoln."

He was born in Omaha and represented a western Michigan district, and much was made, rightly, of his Midwesternness. In the years before the Southern ascendancy in the Republican Party, the party spoke in the flat Midwestern cadences of the senator who had been Mr. Republican when Ford went to the House in 1949 -- Robert Taft of Ohio. When Ford became minority leader in 1965 -- replacing an Indianan, Charles Halleck -- the second-ranking Republican was Leslie Arends and the Senate minority leader was Everett Dirksen, both of Illinois.

Ford was an "accidental president," but there are reasons accidents happen as they do. Call it the cunning of history or an irony of American life, but this underestimated graduate of Yale Law School served a purpose Richard Nixon did not have in mind when he nominated him to replace the disgraced Vice President Spiro Agnew. Nixon probably hoped Ford's popularity in the House would enable him to rally House Republicans against impeachment. Instead, Ford's presence in the vice presidency probably made his former House colleagues less afraid of impeachment.

There is a photograph of the House chamber when President Harry Truman was delivering one of his State of the Union addresses. Scattered through the chamber in front of Truman were four future presidents -- Rep. John F. Kennedy, Sen. Lyndon Johnson, Rep. Nixon, Rep. Ford. Never before or since have four consecutive presidents gone directly from the legislative branch to national elective office.

In 1976 Ford might have won a full term if he had been less statesmanlike: His pardon of Richard Nixon unquestionably hurt him politically, but unquestionably helped with national healing. Ford also might have won if he had stepped out of character and been more adventurous -- if in selecting a running mate he had chosen, as he considered doing, Ambassador Anne Armstrong, a Texan, to be the first woman on a national ticket. Instead he chose a Midwesterner, Kansan Bob Dole, thereby giving a boost to a distinguished career that was to produce the party's presidential nominee 20 years later. Ford also might have won if some unsettling economic numbers had not come out a few days before Election Day. Or if in one of the debates he had not become lost in the labyrinth of peculiar thinking and rhetoric that went with detente. He insisted that Poland was not dominated by the Soviet Union.

He almost won anyway. A change of 12,791 votes in Ohio and Mississippi would have sufficed. The 1976 presidential election was the only one the Republicans lost between 1964 and 1992. Ford was punished for Nixon's sins: Jimmy Carter won by running as the non-Nixon.

Henry Kissinger, who continued as secretary of state through the Ford years, in 1999 wrote a tribute to Ford, the "uncomplicated man" who came to the presidency in perhaps the most complicated context since the Civil War -- in the aftermath of a disastrous war and as a result of a resignation. Kissinger understood that Ford, with his small-town, Midwestern aversion to histrionics, had perfect pitch for the needs of "a nation surfeited with upheavals."

Kissinger noted a "curious paradox of contemporary democracy," that as political leaders become more abject in trying to conform to the public's preferences, respect for the political class plummets. Ford was different: He "was immune to the modern politician's chameleon-like search for ever-new identities, and to the emotional roller coaster this search creates."

Surely subsequent presidential history has deepened the nation's appreciation of what it had for 29 months.

Ford Always Managed To Be A Good Sport (WP)

By William Gildea

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Without question, Gerald R. Ford was one of the most athletic presidents in history.

Ford, who died Tuesday night at age 93, loved to take part in sports from his days as a youth in Grand Rapids, Mich., until he occupied the White House and during the many years afterward. He is best known for playing center at the University of Michigan, where he was on the Wolverines' national championship football teams of 1932 and 1933 and was the team's most valuable player in 1934.

Even after he became president in 1974, Ford still found the time to follow sports avidly -- and to participate.

"I've always loved sports," he told a Washington Post reporter in 1976. "When I was a boy, I knew every batting average in the big leagues. I still look at the standings and I feel a day is wasted if I don't read the sports pages."

As president, Ford engaged in an array of sports: swimming, golf, tennis, skiing. As a younger man especially, he loved sailing.

"He was a good athlete and a wonderful person," said pro golfer Lee Elder, originally from Washington and now living in Florida. "One time the phone rang and the operator came on and said: 'This is the White House. The president is calling.' I thought, 'Sure, sure.' But it turned out that we played quite a lot together when he was in the White House and I was living in Washington. We played at Congressional Country Club and especially at Andrews Air Force Base. It was a fun time."

Later, they continued playing golf together, usually in California, where Ford spent much of his time after his presidency. They also exchanged greeting cards because they shared the same birthday, July 14. "I also had lunch with him a couple of times in Palm Springs," Elder said. "He told me he was keeping active, playing nine holes."

During his formative years, Ford excelled in football, playing linebacker as well as center in high school and then for Michigan. During a speech when he was president, he made light of his accomplishments as a player while noting that 1934 was a down season for the Wolverines after their back-to-back national titles.

"That was the year we lost seven out of eight of our scheduled games," he said. "But, you know, what really hurt me the most was when my teammates voted me their most valuable player. I didn't know whether to smile or sue."

Nevertheless, Ford indicated a number of times that he derived much satisfaction from playing big-time football at Michigan. The 6-foot, 198-pound center, whose jersey number 48 has been retired by the school, was named to play in two major all-star games after his senior year, for the East squad in the East-West Shrine Game in San Francisco on Jan. 1, 1935, and that August for the college all-stars against the NFL champion Chicago Bears at Soldier Field.

Two NFL teams gave Ford the chance to turn pro, but instead he went to Yale to earn his law degree. While there, he served as an assistant football coach and a boxing coach.

"When I got through Michigan, I was offered opportunities at the Green Bay Packers and the Detroit Lions," he told CNN's Larry King during a 1999 interview. "But I had a chance to go to Yale as an assistant football coach and go to law school at the same time. So that opportunity was so wonderful I couldn't turn down the chance to further my education and earn some money in the meantime. . . .

"I would, in retrospect, have liked to have played one year just to prove that I could. But the opportunity to go to Yale and be an assistant coach and go to law school at the same time might not have been available."

At Yale, he learned that "The Game" against Harvard "was as big as any game Michigan had with Ohio State," according to a 1993 USA Today article. With admiration, he recalled a pregame pep talk by Yale coach Raymond "Ducky" Pond before the 1935 game with Harvard. The coach seemed to make his points in much the same manner as Ford often would in public speaking throughout his life.

"Ducky wasn't a fiery speaker, but he spoke very movingly," Ford said. "He talked about the Yale alumni, his experiences and what 'The Game' meant to him. In a quiet way, it was very emotional."

In 1975, the NCAA named Ford the winner of the Theodore Roosevelt Award, given to a prominent American "for whom competitive athletics in college and attention to physical well-being thereafter have been important factors in a distinguished career of national significance and achievement."

Elder said that Ford gave him both "encouragement" and "praise" for breaking racial barriers as the first African American to compete in the Masters golf tournament, the first to take part in a multiracial sports event in South Africa and the first to play on the U.S. Ryder Cup team. Ford paid tribute to Elder at a reception honoring the golfer at the Washington Hilton in 1974, and played in Elder's celebrity pro-am tournaments for charity.

"He was strong and could drive the ball a long ways," Elder said. "He and I played in the Bob Hope Classic and I remember him making several nice drives. At Congressional, he chipped up on one hole for a birdie. He had a great smile."

Before the 1975 Jackie Gleason Inverray Classic golf tournament in Florida, the comedian presented Ford with a set of gold-plated golf clubs. But because Ford participated so often in sports as president, it almost was inevitable that he would be caught by reporters and photographers committing some gaffe.

One front-page photo showed him tumbling on the ski slopes, and on the golf course he plunked some spectators. But he remained active, expressing strong feelings about the importance of keeping physically fit. At age 62 in 1975, he told a Post reporter: "My health is the best. I'd be delighted to have my health record put on the table. . . . I think it's good. I'd lay mine against anybody else's."

He described himself as "kind of amused" by depictions of him as clumsy. "Most of the critics . . . have never played in a ballgame, never skied," he said. "I guess you have to live with it. The main thing is, you don't have to believe it."

But he didn't take himself so seriously that he couldn't laugh at quips by the likes of Bob Hope. "I love playing golf with Gerald Ford," Hope was quoted in the 2003 book "Bob Hope: My Life in Jokes." "He makes me feel like I'm back performing in a war zone."

And Ford himself once was quoted as saying, "I know I am getting better at golf because I'm hitting fewer spectators."

But as people who played different sports with Ford in his later years would agree, he possessed a typical athlete's sense for what he was doing -- in tennis, for example, he had a feel for how a ball might bounce when sliced or drop-volleyed. "There is no question that he thoroughly enjoys it," Rear Adm. William M. Lukash, then the presidential physician, told Tennis magazine in 1976. "He's an athlete and a competitor, and to that kind of a man, tennis is a very satisfying sport."

Those who played tennis doubles or a round of golf with him usually came away impressed by his genial personality, which he managed to retain even while trying to play his best.

One particularly happy day for Ford brought him together with his Grand Rapids South High School football teammates for a reunion at the White House in 1974. The president took them out to the Rose Garden and later showed them the Oval Office. The team's coach, Clifford Gettings, described Ford as a hard worker who developed into an excellent player.

"He came to me a spindly, awkward kid. 'What position shall I play?' he asked. I said, 'Center,' and he's been in the center of things ever since. He had a lot of drive. He always had a football in his hand and must have practiced centering that ball day and night. I used the Pop Warner double wing and the Fielding Yost short punt formation, so Jerry had to center the ball long and short. I never saw him make a bad pass. He was all-city three years and all-state in his senior year."

Notably, the group from Grand Rapids found Ford the president as unpretentious as they had remembered him.

"He was always a guy I loved," said Silas McGee, a teammate. "He was always down to earth like the rest of this group."

Ford Recalled In His Adopted Home (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

When the McCallum Theatre in Palm Desert was sinking into debt a few years ago, the City Council debated whether to approve a donation. A tall, graying figure rose from the audience to ask for help.

The 38th president of the United States told the local leaders that the theater was a jewel to enjoy and preserve. The council responded with a $5 million grant.

It was just one example of the presence built by Gerald R. Ford, who died Tuesday at his home in Rancho Mirage at 93. He and his wife, Betty, became fixtures throughout the Coachella Valley, the desert oasis in Riverside County the Fords called home since leaving the White House in 1977.

"Obviously, the whole city of Rancho Mirage is deeply saddened by the passing of perhaps one of our more treasured residents," Rancho Mirage Mayor Richard Kite said. "We were proud to call Gerald Ford one of our own because he lived here for almost 25 years."

Kite said Ford, in years past, was the most influential person in the Coachella Valley, and both he and his wife Betty were among the most generous philanthropists. They were major supporters of the McCallum Theatre and instrumental in protecting the area's big horn sheep.

"He was very approachable, and he was kind," said Kite, who served with Ford on the theater's board of directors. "He was the type of person, even though he was a past president, that didn't talk down to you."

The Coachella Valley flourished in the 1950s and 1960s as the playground for celebrities, including Frank Sinatra, Bob Hope and Kirk Douglas. The region was known for its country clubs, lush golf courses and upscale living.

According to the official Rancho Mirage website, every president since Harry Truman has visited the desert. The Fords visited during Easter vacations and decided to retire there.

DOJ_NMG_0109883

After he lost the presidency to Jimmy Carter in 1976, Ford's longtime friend Leonard Firestone persuaded him to move next door to him at the Thunderbird Country Club. Ford moved into a single-story estate along the golf course at the Thunderbird Country Club in 1978, according to the website.

The Fords have helped open and fund such charitable endeavors as a domestic violence shelter, a children's museum, a teenage outreach program and a bighorn sheep preserve.

Betty Ford is best known for establishing the alcohol and drug treatment clinic in Rancho Mirage that bears her name. It has treated more than 60,000 people since opening in 1982.

Although Ford represented Grand Rapids, Mich. for 25 years in Congress, he and Betty were hometown heroes in the Coachella Valley. An elementary school and a street bear the name of the former president. A bronze bust of Ford stares from the entrance of the Children's Discovery Museum of the Desert, a facility the Fords helped fund.

It wasn't just the desert that attracted the former president.

An avid skier, Ford began vacationing in Vail, Colo. in the 1960s. Borrowing against his children's life insurance policy, he soon bought a second home in the ski resort town. He later moved nearby to Beaver Creek and remained active in Vail Valley community events until a few years ago, raising money for charities, leading the Fourth of July parade, lending his name to a golf tournament and lighting the town Christmas tree.

But it was the Coachella Valley that felt the Fords influence most directly.

"It's obviously a great loss," said Becky Stidler, 56, of Rancho Mirage. "It was always a thing of great pride to know that we had a living president residing here."

Flags stood at half mast outside St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, the church where the Ford's prayed.

"They were unobtrusive," said Father Dan Rondeau, associate rector at St. Margaret's. "They looked like other married couples, holding hands talking to each other. It was inspiring for the congregation to see them kneeling side by side."

Rondeau said the Fords were private people but they could be gracious with their time.

"If people stopped them, they talked or posed for pictures," he said. "Enough people talked to them, so it always took them a while to get from the back to the front of the church."

Rondeau said Ford was true to his faith when he pardoned former President Richard Nixon.

"He saw himself as minister of reconciliation, as a minister of Christ," Rondeau said. "It was a gracious, grace-filled act."

Ford's Former Home Languishes On Market (WP)

By Ian Shapira

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

The modest two-story colonial in Alexandria has all the trappings of an ordinary home: the pink bathroom, the Magic Chef oven, a couple of fireplaces. But 514 Crown View Dr. also boasts some signs, both subtle and overt, that indicate its unusual status in U.S. history.

Neighbors talk of the steel rods placed underneath the driveway to support the limos. A previous tenant speaks about the countless telephone lines installed in the basement and attic used by the Secret Service.

But a gold-lettered National Park Service sign affixed to the right of the front door says it all:

PRESIDENT GERALD R. FORD, JR. RESIDENCE.

The death of the nation's 38th president has focused public attention on his time in the White House. But some spotlight has also fallen on a little-known, decidedly humdrum neighborhood (about 15 minutes south of 1600 Pennsylvania Ave.), where Ford lived for nearly 20 years as a Michigan congressman, vice president and -- for 10 whole days before moving into the White House -- as president.

Mostly everything about the place appears serviceable and decently appointed (with a swimming pool out back, to boot), but the property spans less than a quarter-acre, a remarkable home simply because it is so unremarkable. It stands in humble (almost painfully humble) contrast with the mansion made available to vice presidents in 1974 in the tony Massachusetts Avenue Heights neighborhood in Northwest Washington.

Ford was the first vice president eligible to live in the house on the grounds of the U.S. Naval Observatory, but he became president before renovations were completed. Ford's vice president, Nelson Rockefeller, used the house mainly to entertain. The first full-time residents were Walter and Joan Mondale, who took up residence in 1977. Every vice president since has lived there.

Javad Khakbaz, who is the president of an Iranian English-language newspaper company, has tried to find someone to take it off his hands since September and is suffering the same indignity laid upon just about every other seller in the Washington area: No one's buying.

Khakbaz is reluctant to discuss the home's plight -- he has dropped the original price of $1.05 million to $999,000 -- but his real estate agent, Joan Dixon, is blunt: "We've had a couple people interested in it, but they wanted to lowball the price," she said yesterday, showing the home not to prospective buyers but to a bunch of curious reporters. "It's a wonderful family home. It has four bedrooms, two full bathrooms and three half-bathrooms . . . even if one of them is pink."

But what might appear to be normal about the home and neighborhood is not. The Abbruzzese family at 515 Crown View Dr. proudly showcases a copper plaque above their garage, given to them by members of the Fourth Estate whom they permitted to camp out on their front lawn while Ford was across the street doing neighborly things, like helping run the country, or his family, depending.

The Abbruzzeses, Democrats, forged a gentle bond with their powerful neighbors across the road.

"When it was Betty's birthday, or it was their anniversary, he was out of town and I invited her to dinner with some neighbors," Louise Abbruzzese recalled yesterday. "But she called me and said he was coming home early and I said, 'That's fine, he can come.' I was cooking a rib roast. He liked beef. He liked it rare."

But in the years since Ford departed Crown View Drive in 1974, the home never found a longtime resident. It changed hands twice, Khakbaz said, and neighbors speak with a calibrated air of decorum about the itinerant nature of its inhabitants.

"It's a hard house to sell because it's been a rental for a long time," said Jill McCaffrey, 63, who lives next door to the Ford home with her husband, retired four-star Army Gen. Barry McCaffrey. "Let's just leave it at that."

One of those renters, Brewster Thackeray, 37, now a senior project manager for AARP, recalled yesterday how he first found the place back in 1996. He was 27 and had just broken up with his live-in girlfriend and didn't want to pay the rent at their Cleveland Park apartment on his own. Serendipitously, he stumbled across an ad for the former president's house.

"It was super cool," said Thackeray, who was with the American Trucking Associations at the time. "I had found a picture of Gerald Ford washing dishes in his sink, but there I was using that very same sink next to the same oven next to that same knotty pine paneling on the walls."

Thackeray was so impressed that he wrote the Fords -- and Ford wrote him and his roommates back, two letters and a signed photograph. "You have our very best wishes as current occupants of the home we built and loved," one of Ford's letters said. "We were proud of it when we moved in March 1955. Thanks for enjoying it also."

And enjoy it Thackeray and friends did. The presidential refrigerator was converted into a "kegorator." And they had parties, though not necessarily of the black-tie, state dinner variety.

"The best party we had was a toga party," he said. "People came in togas and hung around the pool."

The Loss Of A President, Perfect For The Cameras (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

New York Times, December 28, 2006

Death is sad, at least in most cases. But the death of a former president has become an almost cheery television event.

It has been more than 40 years since John F. Kennedy was assassinated. His successors died out of office, relatively painlessly, and most were well into old age. The passing of a retired commander in chief perks up the day with a wallop of stately special reports and bittersweet nostalgia (plaid jackets, “Saturday Night Live,” détente), without undue anxiety or grieving.

And in Gerald R. Ford, who was 93 and served less than one term, television has found the avatar of comfortable presidential fade-outs. The deaths of Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard M. Nixon were too fraught with the Shakespearean tragedies they lived in office. Ronald Reagan’s life and two terms were so momentous that the days leading to his funeral, though full and colorful, were also weighed down with mournful Hollywood pageantry.

As president, the likable, reliable Mr. Ford was most memorable for pardoning Nixon; all day, television screens showed Mr. Ford’s address to the nation, as well as grainy color images of him looking on, stone-faced, as Nixon flung his arm in farewell from his helicopter on the White House lawn.

All the networks went live on Wednesday to Crawford, Tex., to cover President Bush’s tribute to his predecessor. Reporters stood vigil in front of the flags flying at half-staff at the White House, and in Rancho Mirage, Calif., and Grand Rapids, Mich. Most morning news programs were too respectful to repeat clips of Chevy Chase doing his pratfall impression of Mr. Ford as the great fumbler on “Saturday Night Live.” By midday, however, cable news shows were gingerly exploring the “lighter side” of Mr. Ford’s tenure.

In retrospect, it was remarkable how open to reporters the Ford White House was. On NBC “Today” flashed a black-and-white photograph by the former White House photographer David Hume Kennerly that showed Mr. Ford, seated at a table with three aides, in a long-sleeved shirt and pajama bottoms. (One of those aides was his chief of staff, Donald H. Rumsfeld, who recently retired as secretary of defense; Mr. Rumsfeld, along with Vice President Dick Cheney, who also worked in the Ford White House, stood out as among the most lasting, and contested, elements of Mr. Ford’s legacy.)

DOJ_NMG_0109885

Mr. Ford's presidential retirement was dignified and decent but not particularly distinguished: old news clips showed him in the 1980s and 1990s playing golf and attending fund-raisers for Republicans, not raising roofs for the homeless or public awareness about pandemics in Asia and Africa.

Richard Norton Smith, a former director of the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum and Library, told ABC News that the former president "swam twice a day well into his 90s."

On CBS the presidential historian Douglas Brinkley somewhat apologetically told Harry Smith, a host of "The Early Show," that while Mr. Ford's post-White-House legacy is eclipsed by the charity work of former President Jimmy Carter, "we must not forget what the Fords have done for people who have a drug addiction." But it was Mr. Ford's wife, Betty, who shattered taboos, first by publicly discussing her breast cancer, and later, her dependence on drugs and alcohol, and it was she who led the way for the Betty Ford Center in Rancho Mirage, Calif.

After he tumbled into the presidency, Mr. Ford earned respect for the way he rose to the occasion. But as Wednesday's television eulogies showed, it was his first lady who seized it.

Tom Brokaw, who covered the Ford White House for NBC, went on "Today" to lead the network's special report, but on ABC it was Charles Gibson and not Diane Sawyer, who was on vacation. And that was a pity: Ms. Sawyer worked in the press office of the Nixon White House during the final days and was on the plane that took the disgraced president to San Clemente, Calif.; her reminiscences would most likely have been more interesting.

All of Mr. Ford's acquaintances and biographers spoke of his modesty and stalwart nature. In an interview with Mr. Brokaw taped for Wednesday's History Channel special, "Gerald Ford: A Man and His Moment," his daughter, Susan, described him as the "Steady Eddie" of the family.

It seems that his persona was not so overwhelming that it drove commentators to fold into the shadows.

On "Today" the NBC correspondent Andrea Mitchell mentioned that she last spoke to Mr. Ford in California last February, "when he came over to see me, and we had lunch." (It is hard to imagine a former president in his 90s going out of his way to meet a television reporter, so it was hard not to suspect that Mr. Ford was going out of his way not to invite Ms. Mitchell over to his house.)

Except for Ann Curry, who on "Today" adopted her usual smarmily maudlin tone, most of the encomiums were by turns affectionate and respectful, but not overly mournful.

Mr. Ford lived on healthily and happily for three decades after leaving the White House; as even recent clips show, he, more than anyone, made the Oval Office seem like a ticket to longevity.

Today, It's New York: Tomorrow, Oval Office? (WP)

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Presidential Hopefuls Abound in State

NEW YORK -- They sally forth one after another, this parade of presidential candidates from New York.

Some go by a single instantly identifiable name: Hillary! Rudy! Others require fuller identification: Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, a Democrat-turned-Republican who is weighing a presidential run as an independent, and former governor George E. Pataki (R).

New York may not challenge Virginia for its title as "Mother of Presidents," but the state could produce four presidential candidates in 2008 -- not to mention new Gov. Eliot L. Spitzer (D), who has harbored presidential dreams since he was in fourth grade and is already rumored to have an eye on 2012.

New York's ascendancy could reflect a change in the national temperature. The South, after dominating politics for 30 years, has maybe played out, at least for Democrats. In 2000, Al Gore did not take Tennessee, where he built his political career, and John Edwards could not carry North Carolina in 2004. The Northeast turned nearly solid blue in last month's midterm elections and, if taken together with Pennsylvania and Ohio, perhaps the Northeast is ready for a comeback as an electoral linchpin.

"At least on an hallucinogenic level, we have four presidential candidates," said Douglas Muzzio, a political scientist at the City University of New York's Baruch College. "I don't think Pataki and Bloomberg are really serious, but it reflects the changing fortunes of the city. After 9/11, there's a lot of interest and sympathy for our candidates."

It's a curious turnabout for a state and a city often seen as located offshore from the North American continent. Americans have long had a love-loathe relationship with New York, flocking here as tourists even as most insist they could never, ever live in such a cacophonous joint. New Yorkers respond in kind, secure in their conceit that anyone with any sense lives here already.

This mutual disdain held until the 1970s. As the city teetered on the edge of bankruptcy and arson fires roared, the city gained a reputation as a dangerous citadel of sclerotic liberalism. Former mayor John V. Lindsay ran in the Democratic primary for president and lasted but a few weeks.

The New York pol became a forlorn character on the national stage.

"The last time they loved us was when Martin Van Buren was elected, and he ran as a Whig," says Hank Sheinkopf, a Democratic political consultant born, raised and based in New York. "Welcome to post-9/11 New York, where the cachet is back and we're no longer seen as a bastion of left-wing insanity."

In fact, New York once produced a line of presidents, from Van Buren to Chester A. Arthur and Grover Cleveland to Theodore Roosevelt and his distant cousin Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who was elected four times. But it has been nearly 60 years since the state produced a presidential finalist, Republican Thomas E. Dewey in 1948.

The current crop offers two larger-than-life political personalities: Rudolph W. Giuliani, the crime-fighting, Manhattan-living Republican former mayor, and Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, the former first lady and the inhabitant of a New York City suburb. Bloomberg is a municipal Croesus with a pile of money so vast -- estimates of his personal fortune start at $5 billion -- that he self-financed the most expensive mayoral campaigns in the nation's history, spending a combined $150 million.

Pataki, a politically centrist Republican from an Upstate city, served three terms as governor.

Money from this mercantile city feeds the profusion of presidential hopefuls. As one investment house after another announces billions of dollars in bonuses this autumn, the wealthy overflow with guilt. Many give copiously to the candidates.

"Lincoln when he was running came to New York to meet with the rich of this city," said Mike Wallace, director of the Gotham Center for New York City History and a Pulitzer Prize-winning historian. "As money has to be raised in ever vaster quantities, more and more candidates coming here with hands outstretched."

Cesar Perales, a former deputy mayor and general counsel for the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund, said the New York pols are tutored in shaking the tin cup. "Candidates in New York," he said, "learn this from an early age."

There is a cultural shift at work, too. Perhaps the nation finds New York more palatable because it is no longer so different. The tourist precincts, which encompass most of Manhattan and a swath of Brooklyn, are wealthy, well-fed and pasteurized. The old hipster haunts of Alphabet City and Williamsburg are about as edgy as the Hard Rock Cafe.

Sure, the city's poverty rate hovers at just under 20 percent, there is a profound lack of affordable housing, and income inequality grows by the years. But, those problems, analysts say, get relatively little attention anymore.

"The four candidates represent the thinnest slice of New York," said Harvey Robins, a top official in two mayoral administrations. "They appeal to the moneyed classes, which are very representative of New York in this age. Their leadership is pretty far from the visionary leadership of Teddy and Franklin Roosevelt."

New Yorkers seem unsurprised at the profusion of candidates. Their vision is pre-Copernican: It is just more proof the universe revolves around New York. "The city is the center of the world," said actress Elena Zazanis, 32, as she walks down First Avenue to an audition. "I don't know any great mayors from Wyoming, do you?"

Not that this stops New Yorkers from dissecting their own. Pataki is suspect, as he hails from somewhere north of the New York suburbs but short of the Arctic Circle. Most give a pass to Giuliani -- he's a dark enough cup of coffee to be unmistakably New York -- but many won't vote for him (he polls well behind Clinton in the city).

As for Hillary Clinton? Lucy Cantarella, a retired arts administrator in the East Village, gives her best pained look. "She doesn't think like a New Yorker. She plays it safe. Be brilliant. Stir it up!" As for Bloomberg, he's rich enough to pass as a New Yorker these days -- but rooting for the Red Sox?

Cantarella has the ultimate test of fire for these candidates: If they're real New Yorkers, the rest of America won't vote for them. "The middle of the U.S . . . they distrust us," she said. "You see how they look at us? They think we're aliens."

John Edwards Joins Presidential Race (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, December 28, 2006

Former Democratic vice presidential nominee John Edwards jumped into the presidential race Wednesday a day earlier than he'd planned, prodded by an Internet glitch to launch a candidacy focused on health care, taxes and other domestic issues.

The North Carolina Democrat's campaign accidentally went live with his election Web site a day before an announcement Thursday that was supposed to use Hurricane-ravaged New Orleans as a backdrop.

The slip-up gave an unintended double-meaning to his campaign slogan on the John Edwards '08 Web site: "Tomorrow begins today."

Aides quickly shut down the errant Web site but could not contain news of the obvious, even in the shadows of former President Ford's death.

DOJ_NMG_0109887

"Better a day earlier than a day late," said Jennifer Palmieri, an Edwards adviser.

Earlier Wednesday, Edwards visited the site of his planned announcement for a photo opportunity. He did yard work at the home of Orelia Tyler, 54, whose house was gutted by Hurricane Katrina and is close to being rebuilt.

The campaign Web site featured some of Edwards' expected campaign themes.

"This campaign is about changing America," the Web site read, listing five priorities that fit neatly with Edwards' message of economic equality. Among them: "Providing universal health care for all Americans," "Rebuilding America's middle class and eliminating poverty," and "Creating tax fairness by rewarding work, not just wealth."

Edwards, 53, also issued a statement on Ford's death, saying he was deeply saddened by the news and calling the former Michigan Republican a "true leader."

"He called on us to never lose faith that we can change America," Edwards said.

Taking turns with about 30 young people shoveling loads of dirt in Tyler's backyard, Edwards declined to discuss the campaign, focusing instead on the slow recovery in New Orleans, where whole neighborhoods remain a wasteland.

"Anyone who's not concerned with the rate of recovery is not paying attention," said Edwards. He said finger-pointing is part of the problem, adding that the student volunteers he worked with provided an example of what can be accomplished through cooperation.

Edwards arrived promptly at 1:30 p.m., clad in jeans and a khaki work shirt. His aides kept more than two-dozen reporters and photographers at bay as he and the students prepared Tyler's yard for landscaping.

Tyler is still living in a Federal Emergency Management Agency trailer in her yard.

"I feel like a child with Santa Claus," Tyler said before Edwards arrived.

The son of a textile mill worker, Edwards has been on a fast track most of his life despite his up-by-the-bootstraps roots.

A standout law student who became a stunningly successful trial lawyer, Edwards vaulted from nowhere politically into the U.S. Senate and then onto the 2004 Democratic presidential ticket — all in less than six years.

In 1998, in his first bid for public office, Edwards defeated incumbent Sen. Lauch Faircloth, R-N.C., a leading advocate for impeachment of President Clinton.

Edwards began building support for his first presidential bid shortly after arriving in the Senate. He quickly made a name for himself in Congress, using his legal background to help Democratic colleagues navigate the impeachment hearings.

Edwards launched a bid for the Democratic nomination in 2003 and quickly caught the eye of Democratic strategists. Although he won only the South Carolina primary, his skills on the trail, his cheerful demeanor, and his message of "two Americas" — one composed of the wealthy and privileged, and the other of the hardworking common man — excited voters, especially independents and moderate-leaning Democrats.

Edwards' handsome, youthful appearance also gave him a measure of star quality.

Those were among the qualities that led Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, the Democrats' 2004 standard bearer, to select Edwards as his runningmate. It was a stunning success for someone who had majored in textile management as an undergraduate as a kind of insurance policy in case a law career didn't pan out.

Republicans have sought to cast Edwards as a money-chasing trial lawyer. It is an image that Edwards has tried to counter by arguing that he represented ordinary people wronged by big corporations.

"I spent most of my adult life representing kids and families against very powerful opponents, usually big insurance companies," he liked to say. "And my job was to give them a fair shake, to give them a fair chance."

Edwards Makes N.O. Platform To Throw His Hat Into The Ring (NOTP)

By Bruce Nolan

New Orleans Times-Picayune, December 28, 2006

What Orelia Tyler asked for was a team of volunteers to come spread a load of dirt in the back yard of her nearly restored eastern New Orleans home.

What she got Wednesday was the crush of a national political photo op for former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, who brought two dozen reporters and photographers to watch him shovel dirt in jeans and a work shirt, a choreographed background for his effective announcement of his 2008 presidential candidacy.

"No!" said an astonished Tyler, who said she had no idea her home on Stemway Drive near Lakefront Airport had become a political stage.

Edwards' campaign team scheduled the work party as a photo session, but made clear that the formal declaration of candidacy would come today.

DOJ_NMG_0109888

The explicit announcement will come -- again in Tyler's backyard -- today at 8 a.m., said Edwards aide Jennifer Palmieri. And Edwards's Web site briefly -- apparently accidentally -- posted his formal announcement Wednesday, then took it down, the Associated Press reported.

"What happened was, apparently, they were testing the Web site," Palmieri told The Washington Post. "I guess, somehow, when they were testing it, AP happened to catch it."

Officials said they had always intended to post the announcement on the Internet on Wednesday night, in advance of Edwards' scheduled announcement early today, the Post reported. Edwards had also planned to send an e-mail to his supporters before speaking to the cameras from New Orleans.

Even though it was accidental, the announcement on the campaign Web site quickly spread across the Internet, the paper reported. By early Wednesday evening, Edwards' entry in Wikipedia, an online encyclopedia, noted: "On Dec. 27, 2006, he announced his entry into the 2008 presidential race."

Edwards, who also ran in 2004, limited his remarks Wednesday. He said his candidacy would emphasize Americans helping Americans, New Orleans being the most spectacular current example of the opportunities that offers.

Edwards did speak briefly to the recovery, faulting the White House for providing too little help.

"The president should've said, 'I want someone in my office every morning, telling me what was happening in New Orleans yesterday,' " he said.

One issue is poverty

Edwards announced his 2004 presidential candidacy on Jon Stewart's hip, irreverent Daily Show. This year he chose the sober wreckage of New Orleans to make a point about the "intolerable" gap between haves and have-nots all over the country, Palmieri said.

"It's about what people all around America saw," in the images of suffering New Orleanians stranded at the Superdome and the Ernest N. Morial Convention Center, she said. "That there are 38 million people living in poverty."

"There's not any other place in the country that speaks to an issue -- poverty -- like New Orleans does," she said.

Edwards, 53, is a multimillionaire trial lawyer who grew up poor, the first in his family to go to college. He focused his 2004 campaign on helping the working man. He lost the nomination to Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, but ran as Kerry's vice presidential candidate.

He joins outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsak and Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich as declared Democratic candidates.

Waiting in the wings are New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, and perhaps Kerry, Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden and others.

No Republican has formally declared for president, although several have formed exploratory committees. Those include Arizona Sen. John McCain, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, among others.

Lots of help

Tyler spent part of the afternoon chatting with the young workers Edwards brought with him from Baton Rouge. She watched appreciatively as they attacked a mound of dirt she said a contractor left before he abandoned a landscaping job in her backyard.

Her house took on more than nine feet of water during Hurricane Katrina. Tyler said she returned to New Orleans two months after the storm when Reily Foods Co. welcomed her back to her job in quality assurance. She has lived in a FEMA trailer in her front yard since March, but hopes to reoccupy her nearly refurbished house as soon as she gets gas service restored, she said.

She still lacks countertops, but said she is ready to move in anyway.

Tyler said she recently told a friend she still needed help with the back yard.

In short order, her address showed up as a work site to be tackled by the students of the Achievement Academy, a tutorial program with 156 students in Baton Rouge, said its director, Kwame Asante.

Twenty-six students from the academy, sixth- through eighth-graders, arrived at Tyler's house Wednesday to shovel.

Asante is also president of the NAACP chapter in Baton Rouge -- and a contact Edwards has used in earlier relief trips into New Orleans.

Edwards and several hundred students gutted houses on spring break this year. And on Monday, Edwards and the Achievement Academy students worked at Second Harvesters Food Bank, several said.

Liked what she saw

Although Tyler said she had no idea her property would be the scene of a political announcement, she said she was grateful for the help with the dirt.

She said she voted for Edwards in the Louisiana primary of 2004.

"I remember looking him up and liking what I saw," Tyler said of Edwards.

DOJ_NMG_0109889

And what was that?

She shook it off with a laugh: "Don't ask me now. That's too far to go back."

Tyler watched the work in her back yard for a while Wednesday, then excused herself for a trip downtown.

She said she had an appointment on Poydras Street: Her long-awaited Road Home interview.

"Can't be late for that," she said.

Democrat John Edwards To Announce 2008 U.S. Presidential Bid (BLOOM)

By Nicholas Johnston

Bloomberg, December 28, 2006

Dec. 27 (Bloomberg) -- Former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, the losing Democratic vice presidential candidate two years ago, will announce tomorrow that he is seeking the party's nomination for president in 2008, a spokeswoman said.

Edwards will make the announcement in New Orleans in front of a house that was destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. He spent time today helping volunteers fix up the home's backyard.

``He will announce his candidacy for president tomorrow," said spokeswoman Jennifer Palmieri.

Edwards, 53, was John Kerry's vice presidential running mate in 2004 and during the campaign spoke often about two Americas, one rich and one poor. He will use New Orleans tomorrow as a backdrop to highlight that disparity.

Edwards is the highest profile candidate to officially announce for 2008. His opponents for the nomination may include Senators Hillary Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, who haven't announced whether they will enter the race.

Edwards sought the Democratic presidential nomination in 2004, coming in second in the Iowa caucuses and fourth in the New Hampshire primary. He eventually withdrew and was picked by Kerry for the second spot on the Democratic ticket.

Edwards's Theme: U.S. Poverty (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Amid Iraq Talk, White House Hopeful Sticks to '04 Issue in '08 Run

For the roughly two dozen candidates considering a run for the White House, it is perhaps the jackpot question: What might be the winning message in a contest whose first nominating vote is still more than a year away?

Today, former Sen. John Edwards begins testing his hunch that Americans, though focused now on the war in Iraq, can be won over to a campaign built on what he calls "the great moral issue of our time" -- fighting poverty at home. He plans to do so with an unorthodox announcement of his candidacy, not standing on a flag-draped stage, but volunteering his labor in New Orleans's Lower Ninth Ward, which is still struggling to recover from Hurricane Katrina.

The North Carolina Democrat's theme of ending the "Two Americas" of haves and have-nots dates to his 2004 presidential bid. Mr. Edwards didn't win his party's nomination then, but his strong reception among voters helped him to secure a place as Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's running mate. Mr. Edwards argues that the disparity between the richest Americans and the working class has widened since then.

"When I talked about poverty in the 2004 campaign, political types said it was futile," he said in a speech this year. "They said nobody cares about poverty except for the poor. Not true, and we saw it with Katrina."

For him and other presidential hopefuls, crafting a campaign message requires striking a balance between giving voters what they want to hear, and inspiring them to something else. That is proving troublesome for the Republicans' front-runner Sen. John McCain. His popularity since 2000, rooted in his past independence from his party and President Bush on issues such as campaign spending and treatment of war prisoners, is now jeopardized by his unwavering support for the Iraq war and his unpopular call to send more troops there.

Complicating the challenge for all of the candidates: The presidential fields for both parties are taking shape earlier than before, amid stiff competition for staff, big donors and the support of state-party activists. A candidate's message first must appeal to these political insiders, even before party voters weigh in at the first state primary or caucus. Political pros are interested in how well a message ultimately might play among all voters when they go to the polls in November 2008.

Many Democratic political operatives remain skeptical that the Edwards message will resonate among either Democratic or independent voters when antiwar talk is the rage, and could continue to be into 2008. On the eve of Mr. Edwards's announcement, rival Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware drew headlines with his pledge to oppose any increase in U.S. troops to Iraq.

Other Democrats say Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, could emerge as standard-bearers for a domestic agenda that competes with that of Mr. Edwards. Mr. Obama, especially, is seen as a rival to Mr. Edwards for the candidate who best projects optimism and hope.

Those cheering on Mr. Edwards's antipoverty crusade include party strategist Donna Brazile, who was Al Gore's campaign manager in his 2000 presidency bid. Recalling Mr. Edwards's past emphasis on the "Two Americas" theme, she says: "In 2004, that message went largely unheard. To his credit, he kept at it. And Katrina demonstrated the validity of that message."

Ms. Brazile is admittedly biased toward the message if not the messenger. (She says she will remain neutral in the Democrats' 2008 contest.) A native of New Orleans, she visited her father in the city this week for the holidays. Seven siblings and her extended family were among those displaced to other parts of Louisiana and seven other states, and like tens of thousands, they continue to struggle 16 months after Katrina to rebuild lives, careers and wrecked houses, she says.

Mr. Edwards plans to officially announce his 2008 candidacy to reporters today during a break on reconstruction work in the Lower Ninth Ward, New Orleans's most impoverished and hard-hit neighborhood. He is there with college volunteers he has mobilized. Earlier this year, Mr. Edwards labored in nearby St. Bernard Parish with nearly 700 student supporters who were on spring break from colleges in 27 states.

Yet as Mr. Edwards has suggested in speeches, his antipoverty theme is broader than helping Katrina's victims. He speaks of "the forgotten middle class" and of workers generally, who have seen their wages stagnate and benefits erode. He will expand on that message in coming days, seeking to take advantage of the slow-news holidays with a post-announcement tour of early primary and caucus states that could quickly decide both parties' nominees. Mr. Edwards is set to jet to Iowa, then crisscross the nation to New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina before ending Saturday in his home state, North Carolina. He plans to host town-hall-style events at each stop.

The former senator essentially has been campaigning since 2004. He has kept most of his top staff and donors together, and operatives in key places such as Iowa; he rates high in polls in that first caucus state. His email list has grown to more than 700,000, and union leaders are enamored of his populist message, Democrats say. Mr. Edwards's recent enlistment of labor stalwart and former Michigan Rep. David Bonior as campaign manager was plainly a bid for union support.

After the 2004 election, Mr. Edwards became director of the Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, where he has solicited policy ideas for fighting poverty. He previewed his emerging antipoverty program most comprehensively in an address in June at Washington's National Press Club.

In that speech, he set a national goal of ending poverty in 30 years for the 37 million Americans living below the poverty line, lifting one-third of them above it in each of the next three decades. His "Working Society" agenda would mean a higher federal minimum wage, reduced taxes for low-income workers, universal health care, and one million new housing vouchers for working families, to help them find homes in neighborhoods with better schools.

Mr. Edwards proposes "Work Bonds" to provide tax credits to match low-wage workers' own long-term savings. He calls for the government to partner with nonprofit organizations to create a million "stepping stone" jobs, to help welfare recipients and others get experience on local projects so they can go on to better-paying private-sector jobs. And he would open "second-chance schools" aimed at the increased number of high-school students who drop out before graduating.

Mindful of the current headlines, however, Mr. Edwards has paired his domestic agenda with a call to immediately reduce U.S. forces in Iraq by at least 40,000. And he has taken pains to put his domestic vision in a global context. As he put it at the National Press Club six months ago: "How we work to improve our country and lift people up is also critical to restoring American leadership in the world."

Edwards Faces A New Set Of Hurdles (TNO)

By Rob Christensen

Raleigh News & Observer, December 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS - As he launches his second White House bid here today, John Edwards faces a different political landscape than he did three years ago when he was North Carolina's little-known freshman senator.

Last time, the Democratic primary was a wide-open affair, and Edwards intrigued some voters as a new face. This time, Edwards is a former vice presidential candidate who must contend with assumptions that New York Sen. Hillary Clinton is the favorite to capture the Democratic nomination and that Illinois Sen. Barack Obama has eclipsed his fresh-faced appeal.

"Before Barack Obama, it was clear Edwards was going to be the biggest hurdle for Hillary to overcome and had the best shot at stopping her," said Chuck Todd, editor-in-chief of the Political Hotline, a Washington-based Internet newsletter. "Obama complicates his run. ... If it wasn't for Obama, I think we'd say this is a two-person race."

Edwards, 53, of Chapel Hill, enters the race with considerable assets. Polls show he is among the best known of the Democratic contenders after being on the national ticket in 2004 with Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry. Edwards, a successful trial lawyer before he entered politics, is the only announced Democratic hopeful who has been through the presidential marathon and has an organization. He seems likely to receive solid financial support from trial lawyers, and appears poised to pick up significant support from organized labor.

The Democratic nominee could be determined in January 2008, when caucus and primary voters in Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina make their choices. The new early nominating schedule seems to favor Edwards, who has strong ties in some early battlegrounds.

Edwards is also the only Southerner in the race, with the possible exception of former NATO Gen. Wesley Clark, who is considering a run. The last Democrat from outside the South to win the the presidency was John F. Kennedy in 1960.

But Edwards has plenty of skeptics.

"He has got a lot of problems," said Allan Lichtman, an American University presidential scholar and Democratic Senate candidate in Maryland this year.

"He didn't do much for the Kerry-Edwards ticket. He came in with a lot of promise, but he didn't pan out. He lost the debate to Dick Cheney. He is going to be way outspent by Hillary Clinton. He doesn't have a natural base."

The Democratic primary can be viewed like the NCAA basketball tournament, said political analyst Charles Cook, publisher of The Cook Political Report, a Washington-based newsletter. In one bracket, everybody has penciled in Clinton. She has name recognition and a high-profile platform in the U.S. Senate, is a proven fundraiser and has a powerful political organization.

The question, Cook said, is who will survive to face Clinton in the opposing bracket.

"He's dealing, as all the candidates are, with the looming presidential campaign of Hillary Clinton and the recent excitement over Barack Obama," said Lee Miringoff, director of the New York-based Marist Institute for Public Opinion, which has done extensive presidential polling. "That having been said, there is still a following for his more progressive populism. He is certainly a force to be reckoned with down the road."

Edwards is announcing his campaign in New Orleans' Lower Ninth Ward, an area devastated by Hurricane Katrina. The location underscores Edwards' emphasis on poverty, which could be a political gamble. The theme is an extension of his "Two Americas" message from his 2004 campaign, in which he talked about the nation's inequalities. Two years ago, Edwards created the Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at UNC-Chapel Hill.

The campaign experienced its first glitch on Wednesday, a day before it formally came into existence.

Edwards' campaign accidentally went live Wednesday with his election Web site, The Associated Press reported.

The slip-up gave an unintended double meaning to his campaign slogan on the John Edwards '08 Web site: "Tomorrow begins today." Aides quickly shut down the errant Web site.

Several questions remain as Edwards begin his White House quest:

HAS EDWARDS' MOMENT PASSED? Edwards was the new face in 2004, and some voters liked his sunny persona. But some may view Edwards as a bit shopworn. He failed to help carry the Kerry-Edwards ticket anywhere in the South, including his home state of North Carolina.

"A lot of folks are going to view his candidacy and strategy in the context of the Kerry-Edwards campaign," said Dick Hartpootlian, a former South Carolina Democratic chairman. "Many people, including myself, thought it was a strategic disaster. They wrote off huge parts of the country, including South Carolina. ... It's going to be very difficult for Southerners to forget that snub."

The good news for Edwards is that polling suggests that Democrats tend to blame Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, not Edwards, for losing to Bush.

"The most encouraging thing for Edwards is he came out of '04 with a good bit of residual good will, particularly in Iowa, and Kerry had none" said Cook. "He came out of it as well or better than anybody had any right to hope for."

DOES EDWARDS HAVE THE PROPER SEASONING? One of the knocks on Edwards in 2004 was that he lacked the experience to be president. Edwards has served only one six-year term in the Senate and has never held an executive post. But Edwards has been globe-hopping during the past two years, meeting with foreign leaders in an effort to broaden his resume.

CAN EDWARDS WIN THE ANTI-WAR VOTE? Edwards was booed when he appeared before California Democrats during the last election because of his vote for a resolution authorizing the war in Iraq. Edwards has since said his vote was a mistake, and he has courted the anti-war bloggers who backed Howard Dean in 2004.

WILL ORGANIZED LABOR HELP EDWARDS? Edwards had little labor support when he ran in 2004. But since then, Edwards has been heavily courting labor -- walking the picket lines and participating in a campaign to pressure Wal-Mart to treat its workers better. He is expected to name former Michigan congressman David Bonior, a key labor ally, as his campaign manager. Labor could play an important role in the Iowa and Nevada caucuses.

But labor no longer has the clout that it once had.

"The last time labor got their candidate was Walter Mondale," said Todd, the Political Hotline editor, referring to the Democratic nominee in 1984.

Edwards Likely To Try For Democratic Presidential Nomination (CQ)

Congressional Quarterly, December 28, 2006

John Edwards is expected to announce his second try for a Democratic presidential nomination, during a scheduled appearance in New Orleans Thursday. If he does, he will stand out as a national figure in a field of official party contenders currently made up of three much lesser-known figures: retiring Iowa Gov. Tim Vilsack, Ohio Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich and former Alaska Sen. Mike Gravel.

Edwards, a 53-year-old former senator from North Carolina, would enter the race with substantial national name ID from his run as the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee on the ticket with Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry, which followed Edwards' emergence as the strongest challenger to Kerry for that year's presidential nomination.

His tour on the ticket that lost narrowly (51 percent to 48 percent) to President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney has not made Edwards the heir apparent for the 2008 Democratic presidential nod; in fact, Kerry has not yet clarified whether he will make a second try himself.

And Edwards' turn as the star of the field may be short-lived. He has received much less buzz among politics watchers than the Democrats' two leading subjects of presidential speculation: New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, wife of former President Bill Clinton, fundraising juggernaut and perceived front-runner in the Democratic nominating contest; and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who has skyrocketed to political celebrity since his moving keynote address at the 2004 Democratic convention and his subsequent election that year as the only current African-American senator.

In choosing the unusual "slow news" period between the Christmas and New Year's holidays, Edwards is attempting to steal a march on Clinton, whose candidacy is regarded as most observers as a near-certainty, and Obama, who is expected to announce a determination early in the new year about whether he'll run or not. Edwards may also be hoping to preempt some of the obsessive media attention given to those other top-tier candidates.

Still, despite the publicity imbalance to date, the handsome and personable Edwards has an opportunity to pursue a sizable niche as an alternative for Democratic voters worried about the electability of Clinton — who carries the baggage of controversies that surrounded her and her husband during their White House years — or Obama, who bears the burden of proof that the nation is prepared to elect a black president, and whose mere two years in the Senate would raise questions about whether he had sufficient experience.

Experience, in fact, was an issue that dogged Edwards in 2004. He ran for national office at the end of his one and only six-year term in the Senate (unlike Obama, who previously was an Illinois state senator, wealthy trial lawyer Edwards never held public office before or after his short U.S. Senate stint).

With the nation at war in Iraq and Afghanistan, four-term Sen. Kerry and other opponents for the nomination questioned whether Edwards had the requisite foreign policy and national security credentials.

Since the 2004 campaign, Edwards has taken steps to address that issue. On the signal foreign policy issue of the day, he has been an outspoken critic of the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq. He also has sought to draw attention to an overseas crisis that is far less visible to the American people: ongoing civil strife in Uganda: He edited the recently released book "Home: The Blueprints of Our Lives," which includes reflections from politicians, actors and others on their childhood residences, with the proceeds dedicated to relief efforts in Uganda.

Yet the core of his political activism, and a central theme of his prospective 2008 campaign, is combating poverty and inequality in American society. It's no coincidence that Edwards reportedly has chosen to hold his Thursday event in New Orleans' Lower Ninth Ward, a mostly African-American and largely lower-income community struggling to recover from the sweeping devastation that followed Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

In 2005, he signed on to head the new Center on Poverty, Work and Opportunity at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill (where he earned his law degree), and was visible in post-Katrina reconstruction in Louisiana.

This is not a new cause for Edwards, who often refers to his background as the son of a mill worker and as the first member of his family to go to college. His 2004 bid for president also focused on poverty and his portrayal of "two Americas," one prosperous and the other struggling economically. He projects a vision of "one America" through social equality on issues including health care coverage, increased minimum wages and other efforts to reduce poverty.

Edwards' political action committee, which has been the platform to keep him in the public eye, is called the One America Committee. Since it was formed in 2001, the PAC has raised $2.7 million and spent $2.6 million, according to the committee's filing with the Federal Election Commission.

Edwards' focus on economic issues has attracted interest from some elements of organized labor.

Reflecting on the 2004 campaign, which some analysts said was stymied by Kerry's lack of charisma, Edwards said on MSNBC's Hardball Dec. 12 that he "wasn't crazy about" running for vice president.

"Your job, basically, is to advocate for the presidential candidate," he said, giving him little leeway to speak openly about his own opinions.

But Edwards said that experience campaigning has informed his approach for this cycle. "Running before makes you focus on something different instead of focusing on how crowds respond to you and what everybody seems to love of you," he said .

"That's not the test for being president," he continued. "The test for being president is are you the best person to occupy the Oval Office and be the leader of the free world? Because literally the future of the world is at stake here. This is not about popularity and excitement."

Edwards would not head into the 2008 presidential campaign alone: His wife, Elizabeth, whom he met when they were attending law school, has been an active participant in his political campaigns.

Her own public profile has been raised by a book she authored earlier this year. Titled "Saving Graces: Finding Solace and Strength from Friends and Strangers," it focuses on how she dealt with the death of a teenage son in a 1996 car accident and with her own battle with breast cancer, with which she was diagnosed on Nov. 3, 2004 — the day after the election in which the Kerry-Edwards ticket was defeated.

As a moderate/independent, I will watch the presidential campagin of John Edwards with a keen interest. I believe in the 'one america' theme but he also will have to show me the ability to grasp and develop sound foreign policies - understanding there is a limit our country can force it will on another. In addition, I will watch how he articulate his plans for creating an environment that will induce companies to reduce their reliance for profit by building factories in countries where they pay very low wages; what is his proposed reform for Social Security; the plan for budget deficit; how to deal with terrorism, etc. The United States needs a person that is capable of making sound decisions and providing bipartisan leadership. I will expect no less.

He is rabid about amnesty for illegal aliens. So that hacks off about 79% of the electorate. He is an ex Trial Lawyer who became mega rich that way. That hacks off about 99% of the electorate. I mean who in the dickens do the Bubble Head pundits think will vote for him? Would You? Will You? Other than having a nice head of air, a nice smile and lots of very general feel good platitudes, what is there?

But you can depend on the the 1/2 of the 1% of registered Looney Left Democrats who pick our Candidates in primaries to pick another loser like him. Hello Republicans Time!

Someone who could win...say a Senator Byron Dorgan or a Senator Kent Conrad, serious men who are published discussing serious things..like Social Security, Job Loss, Outsourcing, squandering our wealth and blood in Iraq sort of like Russia did in Afghanistan. Now would the Democrats ever nominate anyone like that who would win in a landslide? Never? That is what I think too. We will get another unelectable candidate. Get ready to take another whooping, Democrats.

Edwards 2008 Bid To Push Plight Of Poor (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein

New York Sun, December 28, 2006

A former senator from North Carolina, John Edwards, is set to enter the race for the Democratic presidential nomination this morning, emphasizing the plight of the underclass by launching his campaign from a blighted New Orleans neighborhood hard hit in Hurricane Katrina.

By focusing on social justice and the poor, Mr. Edwards, 53, hopes to court Democratic Party activists and pose a challenge from the left to other likely presidential contenders, such as Senator Clinton.

"I don't think there's any question that by talking about labor, the minimum wage, and poverty, his strategy has been to run as the progressive alternative," a Democratic operative and lobbyist, Steven Elmendorf, said in an interview.

Mr. Edwards, who sought the Democratic nomination in 2004 and later became the party's vice presidential nominee, scores well in opinion polls, particularly in the early caucus state of Iowa. However, his hopes of becoming the alternative to Mrs. Clinton have been set back by a relatively new entrant on the political scene, Senator Obama of Illinois, who is also mulling a presidential bid.

Mr. Elmendorf said a run by Mr. Obama would "take quite a bit of air out" of Mr. Edwards's campaign. "He has a problem running as the new guy," the strategist said. " Obama takes up a lot of political space."

Democratic strategists said Mr. Edwards has made good use of his time since leaving the Senate in 2004. "He has done some very smart things over the past couple of years to position himself differently from the rest of the field," a Democratic consultant, Christopher Lehane, said.

In addition to staking out the poverty issue and boosting his foreign affairs resume with international travel, Mr. Edwards, who was a trial lawyer before being elected to the Senate, has moved aggressively to win the support of labor unions, particularly those for service workers.

"He's made an effort. He's worked it hard," Mr. Elmendorf said. However, he said, he doubts many unions will be willing to endorse Mr. Edwards in the primary, in part because Mrs. Clinton will be seeking those same endorsements, or a pledge from labor groups to stay neutral.

"When Senator Clinton gets engaged with them, she's very formidable," Mr. Elmendorf said. " President Clinton did a lot for them."

Mr. Elmendorf said union leaders will be wary of repeating the scenario from 2004, when some endorsed the upstart candidate, Dr. Howard Dean, only to see his bid fizzle out.

Mr. Lehane, who served for a time as a spokesman for the Democratic presidential nominee, Senator Kerry of Massachusetts, said one of the biggest challenges facing Mr. Edwards is a financial one, as contenders for the nomination are seen as needing to raise about $20 million by June.

"If you look at Hillary, she's like a blue-chip stock, good fundamentals, sustained growth, big dividends. Obama winds up being either the Google, which goes through the roof and fundamentally changes everything, or he ends up like Petco.com," Mr. Lehane said. " Edwards is one of those candidates you end up betting long on."

One asset Mr. Edwards has is that many of those who worked closely with him on his losing primary bid in 2004 seemed to enjoy the experience, while some who worked for other candidates grew disillusioned. "People working with him really enjoyed working with him and had great respect for him," Mr. Lehane said.

A Des Moines teacher who runs a Web site promoting Mr. Edwards, Joshua Brown, said Mr. Edwards's sincerity and authenticity serve him well in the small-group settings where Iowa caucus-goers meet the candidates. "He connects really well," Mr. Brown said. "In Iowa politics, a lot of it comes down to meeting the person and being able to ask them the question you want to ask."

Mr. Brown said Mrs. Clinton's celebrity could actually make it harder for her to compete. "There's going to be tons of people showing up," he said. "It's just going to be to see Hillary Clinton. "It's not going to be to listen to Hillary Clinton."

Edwards Scooped By His Web Site (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 27 -- Former senator John Edwards of North Carolina scooped himself Wednesday when advisers testing his campaign Web site posted the news that he is running for president in 2008. The posting came a day before Edwards's planned formal declaration of candidacy in this city's devastated Ninth Ward.

There was no secret about Edwards's presidential campaign intentions. The 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee has been running hard for two years, and campaign officials have been at work for more than a week on final arrangements for the official launching.

But the pre-announcement of the candidacy on the Edwards Web site -- which was online only briefly but was nonetheless, officials said, noticed by the Associated Press -- caught everyone in the campaign by surprise.

DOJ_NMG_0109895

"What happened was, apparently, they were testing the Web site," said Jennifer Palmieri, Edwards's spokeswoman. "I guess, somehow, when they were testing it, AP happened to catch it."

Officials said they had always intended to post the announcement on the Internet on Wednesday night, in advance of Edwards's scheduled announcement early on Thursday. Edwards had also planned to send an e-mail to his supporters before speaking to the cameras from New Orleans.

The sequence of events highlighted the many ways in which candidates now seek to draw attention to presidential campaign announcements, attempting to maximize their audience through the various media platforms for what are well-scripted events.

Even while doing some volunteer work Wednesday afternoon for Orelia Tyler, a New Orleans resident whose home was devastated by the floods of Hurricane Katrina, Edwards taped a statement that aides planned to post online in time for his formal announcement.

Even though it was accidental, the announcement on the campaign Web site quickly spread across the Internet. By early Wednesday evening, Edwards's entry in Wikipedia, an online encyclopedia, noted: "On Dec. 27, 2006, he announced his entry into the 2008 presidential race."

Edwards chose New Orleans for his announcement to highlight his interest in the issue of poverty, which has been his focus for most of the past two years. He has been to Louisiana numerous times since Katrina hit and recruited 700 college students to join him here in the spring to volunteer their time, helping clean out and rebuild destroyed homes.

He also picked the week between Christmas and New Year's Day to announce his candidacy in large part because he and his advisers thought it would attract more attention during what is traditionally a slow news period. But the death of former president Gerald R. Ford was by far the dominant news on Wednesday and probably will continue to be for several more days.

Edwards issued a statement mourning the death of the 38th president.

"President Ford was a true leader -- he made decisions based on what he believed was right, not what was politically expedient," the statement said. "He called on us to never lose faith that we can change America."

He said Americans could honor Ford's memory by "lifting ourselves above partisan politics and acting with the courage and conviction of our ideals."

Thursday's declaration of candidacy will be relatively low-key, with Edwards planning to make a brief statement outlining his reasons for running and then taking questions from reporters. He plans to leave New Orleans in the early afternoon for an evening rally in Iowa, the site of the first presidential caucuses, and he will hold a town hall meeting in New Hampshire on Friday.

Edwards, 53, was a successful and wealthy trial lawyer. He did not turn to politics until 1998, when he was elected to the Senate. He spent one term in Washington before deciding not to seek reelection. His 2004 presidential campaign started slowly but caught fire just before the Iowa caucuses. He finished second to the eventual Democratic nominee, Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.).

He won only one primary, in his native South Carolina, but his skills as a campaigner and his performance in the primaries prompted Kerry to select him as the Democrats' vice presidential nominee.

He joins two other declared Democratic candidates -- Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich (Ohio) -- while several others, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.), are expected to announce their candidacies in January.

Although Clinton and Obama have attracted the most attention, Edwards begins his campaign well positioned to challenge for the nomination. He has maintained considerable strength in Iowa, building on his success there in 2004, retains a base of support in South Carolina, and has developed relationships with organized labor in Nevada, which is scheduled to hold the second set of presidential caucuses in 2008.

Edwards To Run For President (WSJ)

By James Romoser

Winston-Salem Journal, December 28, 2006

Former U.S. Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., became yesterday the third candidate to enter the 2008 presidential race - but not without a false start.

Edwards' campaign accidentally launched his presidential-campaign Web site a day early, pre-empting an orchestrated announcement planned for today in New Orleans.

The Web site was quickly taken down. But the news of Edwards' candidacy, which his campaign confirmed to the Winston-Salem Journal last night, was out.

Despite the online snafu, Edwards' run is no surprise.

DOJ_NMG_0109896

He ran unsuccessfully for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2004 and was chosen by the eventual nominee, Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., as his vice presidential running mate.

Almost from the moment that the Kerry-Edwards campaign conceded the election to President Bush in November 2004, Edwards appeared to be gearing up for another run in 2008.

He has spent the last two years raising money, visiting key states that have early primaries and running his "One America Committee," which supports Democratic candidates and advocates for such causes as raising the minimum wage.

"John is the most prepared he's ever been to be president. He's spent the last two years learning, traveling, meeting people," Ed Turlington, who was the national chairman of Edwards' 2004 campaign, said yesterday. Turlington, a Raleigh attorney, continues to be involved in Edwards' campaign.

Edwards chose the politically symbolic location of the Lower Ninth Ward of New Orleans for the formal announcement of his candidacy, and he decided not to postpone the announcement after the death of former President Gerald Ford. He released a statement saying he was saddened by Ford's death.

Yesterday, Edwards helped do yard work for a woman whose house was destroyed by Hurricane Katrina.

After a new conference today, he is expected to begin a whirlwind, three-day tour in which he will visit Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina - the first four states in the 2008 Democratic primary season.

On Saturday night, Edwards will conclude the tour with a rally in Chapel Hill.

Other than Edwards, only two major candidates - Democratic Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa and U.S. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio - have announced their intentions to run for president in 2008.

But others are widely expected to join the race soon, including Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y.; Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill.; and Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

The 2008 election will be an unusual presidential election because there will be no sitting president or vice president running. "It's such a wide open race that starting early is a necessity," Turlington said.

Edwards, 53, was a successful trial lawyer and was elected to the U.S. Senate from North Carolina in 1998. In 2003, he started his first presidential campaign, which focused on a theme of "two Americas." He won one primary - South Carolina - before agreeing to be Kerry's running mate.

Recent national opinion polls have shown Edwards trailing both Clinton and Obama for the Democratic nomination. His numbers are higher in Iowa, where a poll showed Edwards tied for the lead with Obama, followed by Vilsack and then Clinton.

Edwards Frames Comeback With Populist Message: Margaret Carlson (BLOOM)

By Margaret Carlson

Bloomberg, December 28, 2006

Dec. 28 (Bloomberg) -- When the reliable Des Moines Register poll two weeks ago showed former vice presidential candidate John Edwards leading in Iowa with 36 percent, people were surprised.

How did he do that in a year when it has been Hillary and Everyone Else, then Hillary, Obama and Everyone Else? Quietly, very quietly, which is the best way for a Democratic has-been to have any hope of becoming a could-be.

Democrats hate their losers. Unlike Republicans who routinely give theirs a second chance (see Richard Nixon, Ronald Reagan and Bob Dole), Democrats would remove all memory of theirs if they could, like latter-day Kremlinologists. (See George McGovern, Michael Dukakis and John Kerry, though the last doesn't know he is over.)

Al Gore may be the exception. Having taken on many lives -- college professor, itinerant preacher on global warming, Wall Street banker and potential Oscar-winning filmmaker -- there are some Democrats asking him to run. Edwards may have telescoped Gore's six years in exile into two as he emerges from his own Elba to announce his candidacy today.

Having moved out of Georgetown in Washington to his native North Carolina -- where he built a new house, took care of his wife who learned in the final week of the campaign that she had cancer, joined an investment banking firm and tended to the family foundation established in memory of son Wade Edwards killed in a 1966 traffic accident at age 16 -- he has shed his inside-the-Beltway skin for that most desirable of guises, the Washington outsider.

Non-Combative Candidate

Surely 2008 is a better time for a candidate like Edwards -- a non-combative southerner who has won a hundred courtroom trials, has an established fundraising base, is a master of the Internet and finally has a few more lines in his baby face than he did in 2004 when George W. Bush and Dick Cheney carried the day.

Edwards's pitch that there are two Americas is, if anything, truer today than when he first took it out for a spin. There is no better place to take that theme than the hurricane-ravaged Ninth Ward of New Orleans where he will begin his campaign today.

That America is still covered with garbage as far as the eye can see, with little in the way of rebuilding and many of those who stayed stuffed into trailer parks. Imagine if a hurricane had hit the other America, say Greenwich, Connecticut. Construction everywhere else would have come to a dead halt as residents there got the undivided attention of the Bush administration and the building trades.

Donald Trump wouldn't be able to hire an architect.

A Living Wage

For the past year, Edwards has toured the country with the message that those who work deserved a living wage. He favors an expansion of the earned income tax credit, better lending practices, housing vouchers, sprinkling low-income housing amid McMansions and a program to rehabilitate Louisiana after Katrina.

And it isn't only the Ninth Ward that bears Edwards out. Wages are stagnant. There has been no increase in the minimum wage. More people are without health insurance than before.

Yet the Bush administration continues to give the rich every break at the expense of the poor. The gap between the haves and have-nots is now worthy of King Louis XIV. Just last week came the news that the chairman of Goldman Sachs Group Inc. took in $53.4 million last year or roughly $25,000 an hour for a standard work week.

Edwards got right with the Iraq war in an op-ed piece in the Washington Post in November 2005. Without making excuses, he said he regretted his vote in 2002 for a resolution authorizing the U.S. invasion.

With Senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama gobbling headlines, pitching in to clean up New Orleans in this slow news week could be all the attention Edwards gets. Like so many vice presidential candidates before him, Edwards's 2004 run didn't propel him to frontrunner status in this race.

Bungled Opportunity

By eschewing what he called the ``old politics of hate and division," Edwards gave up the usual vice presidential running mate's role of hatchet man. He bungled his best chance to show what he was made of in his debate against Cheney.

The trial lawyer who won multimillion-dollar verdicts against well-armed drug companies looked like a Ken doll who had come to ask Barbie's stern father for her hand in marriage. The only blow he landed was wrapped in velvet: congratulating Cheney on his love for Mary Cheney, his openly gay daughter, to point up the Republicans' otherwise ugly strategy to demonize gays.

Edwards spent weeks explaining himself.

It could be that in 2004, Edwards suffered from first-time jitters, too much message discipline about a divided America and the handicap of playing second banana to a waffling, windsurfing stiff.

There could be a hunger now for a quieter man after eight years of taking our enemies dead or alive.

Edwards is the candidate most reminiscent of the late Gerald Ford. Ford was a fine president in a difficult moment, so decent he couldn't win the presidency on his own.

We are a schizophrenic electorate. We prefer the likeable candidate over the sourpuss, but we also want a tough guy.

Edwards has a chance only if nice guys don't finish last.

Ohio Gov. Taft Reprimanded Over Ethics (AP)

By Andrew Welsh-huggins

AP, December 28, 2006

The state Supreme Court on Wednesday publicly reprimanded Ohio Gov. Bob Taft for his ethics violations in office, a black mark that will stay on his permanent record as an attorney.

Taft, 64, a Republican and great-grandson of President William Howard Taft, pleaded no contest in 2005 to failing to report golf outings and other gifts worth nearly $6,000 during his four-year term. He was fined $4,000. Taft could not seek re-election because of term limits and leaves office in less than two weeks.

The Office of Disciplinary Counsel, an arm of the state Supreme Court, said in April that Taft violated Ohio's code of professional conduct for lawyers, and Taft later signed an agreement admitting the violation.

The justices agreed by a vote of 6-0 with a recommendation from the Board of Commissioners on Grievances and Discipline to issue the public reprimand, which does not prevent Taft from practicing law again but will appear in public law registries. The court could have rejected the recommendation or ordered a stronger punishment.

Taft's law license has been inactive since 2002.

"The governor is pleased that the matter is concluded and that the court recognized his reporting error was nothing more than an oversight," Taft spokesman Mark Rickel said.

Court Reprimands Ohio Governor Over Gifts (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0109898

By Bob Driehaus

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio, Dec. 27 — The Ohio Supreme Court formally reprimanded Gov. Bob Taft on Wednesday for failing to report nearly $6,000 worth of golf outings and other gifts, a coda to his scandal-plagued final term in office, which ends Jan. 8.

The unanimous ruling followed the penalty recommended by the Board of Commissioners on Grievances and Discipline, which evaluates charges of misconduct among lawyers and judges. Mr. Taft, a Republican, was admitted to practice law in Ohio in 1976 and may return to practicing after his term ends.

Public reprimand was the minimum penalty that could have been imposed by the court, which had the discretion to suspend Mr. Taft's law license in Ohio or to bar him permanently from practicing law in the state.

The court said Mr. Taft deserved the minimum punishment because he had no prior disciplinary record and cooperated fully with the investigation. "Any sanction is an indelible stain on a lawyer's professional record," the ruling said.

Jonathan Marshall, secretary to the board, said, "I guess the significance is that regardless of how high a public office a lawyer enjoys, the same standards apply to all."

Mr. Taft, a great-grandson of President William Howard Taft, pleaded no contest in August 2005 to four criminal misdemeanor counts for failing to disclose $5,682.26 worth of golf outings, meals, hockey tickets and other gifts from 19 benefactors from 1997 until 2004. He was fined $4,000 and ordered to e-mail an apology to all state workers as well as to Ohio news media outlets.

He is the only Ohio governor to have faced criminal charges while in office, and his pleas joined a wave of scandals among state Republicans that culminated in a Democratic sweep on Nov. 7 of all but one statewide office and the defeat of Senator Mike DeWine by Representative Sherrod Brown, a Democrat.

Mark Rickel, Mr. Taft's press secretary, said, "The governor is pleased the matter is concluded and that the court recognized that his recording error was nothing more than an oversight."

Mr. Rickel said Mr. Taft had not decided whether to return to practicing law or to pursue other interests.

As Energy Prices Rise, Houston's Heyday Returns (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

HOUSTON, Texas — Fine wine flows freely at Tony's, the dining room of the rich and powerful in this dynamic Sun Belt city. But it always flows a little faster when the price of crude oil is high — and these days, owner Tony Vallone said, the bottles are emptying at a brisk pace.

On a recent Friday evening, socialites in fur coats stepped past the cascading sheets of water at the glass entrance, into an airy room adorned with vibrant Robert Rauschenberg paintings. Waiters wheeled out enormous souffles and whole red snappers encrusted in salt. The richest man in town, oil pipeline magnate Dan Duncan, was dining there for the third time in four days.

At the center table, Ileana Trevino, the head of a hospital foundation, was celebrating her 51st birthday with about a dozen close friends and her husband Michael, a Marathon Oil executive. She was asked what she wanted to drink.

"Whatever's expensive," Trevino replied, and laughed. The sommelier recommended bottles of a $50 red from Spain's Montsant region, a modest option at a restaurant that offers magnums of 1945 Chateau Petrus Bordeaux for $30,000.

"It's almost palpable, isn't it?" said attorney Michael Solar, one of Trevino's friends, as he waved his glass to indicate the wealth in the packed room. "When the rest of the country is doing well, it seems like Houston is often struggling. But when the rest of the country is struggling, it seems like Houston is often doing well."

High oil, natural gas and electricity prices may bring pain to families and business owners elsewhere, but in America's energy capital, they bring prosperity.

Two out of every five Houstonians owe their jobs to energy — many big oil and gas companies have their world or American headquarters in Houston — and the industry's spectacular profits in recent years have helped the nation's fourth-largest city outdistance the country as a whole in economic growth.

Los Angeles and most big cities are seeing slowdowns in their real estate markets this year, but Houston's is still climbing: For 34 months straight, area home sales have increased compared with the same month a year earlier. Yet Houston's housing remains surprisingly affordable: The median home sales price in November was $147,000, compared with $487,000 for the Los Angeles region.

The city is on pace to add 75,000 jobs this year, an increase of about 3.5%, or more than twice the national average. Though that growth rate falls short of Las Vegas and a few other large American cities, experts say it is remarkable that

Houston's economy continued to expand even after one of its largest white-collar employers, Enron Corp., collapsed from a financial scandal and declared bankruptcy in 2001.

"A petroleum engineer coming out of Texas A&M now gets about $87,000 a year and a $30,000 signing bonus, and that's for someone with no experience," said Robert W. Gilmer, a senior economist for the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas. "Houston has heated up to the point where it spreads all the way through the employment sector, to plant operators and truck drivers."

Halliburton Co., the construction and oil field services firm that landed numerous federal contracts to rebuild Iraq, has a checkered reputation in parts of the world. But it has added 11,000 jobs this year, and in Houston, where it is headquartered, it was recently selected as one of the best companies to work at by a leading business journal.

"There is definitely a feeling of excitement working in the energy industry in Houston at this time," said Renee LeBas, who moved here this year to work at Halliburton, where she helps companies find solutions to oil field problems.

LeBas, a petroleum engineering graduate from the University of Texas at Austin, recently bought a small house in a desirable suburban neighborhood, just inside the ring of freeways that circles the city. It's the 28-year-old's second real estate purchase since college.

For all the people doing well in Houston, however, there are still many not benefiting from the improved economy, particularly those without college educations. Houston's unemployment rate continues to be slightly higher than the national average, and the presence of tens of thousands of Hurricane Katrina evacuees threatens to become a major social problem when government housing assistance to the storm survivors runs out.

"Not everyone in Houston is going like gangbusters," said Stephen L. Klineberg, a Rice University sociologist who has been surveying the attitudes of Houstonians for a quarter-century. "A relatively small number of people are making a lot of money, but there are still plenty of people struggling to get by."

What's more, many of those prospering are greeting the good times with a grizzled skepticism.

Houston's economy is much more diverse than it was two decades ago, when roughly 80% of all jobs were tied to energy; the city now has a thriving port and a rapidly expanding medical district known for some of the best specialized care in the South. Still, veterans of Houston's boom-and-bust energy economy are mindful that fortunes could turn quickly, like they did in the 1980s, when a sudden swoon in crude oil prices sent the city's economy crashing.

"This industry is known for being a roller coaster, and right now, with oil over $60 a barrel, they can't find enough people for all the work they've got," said engineer Glenn Woltman, 55, who recently left a federal job in New Orleans to take a position paying "well into the six figures" here with Superior Energy Services Inc. "This is about as good as I have seen it. I was considering five different offers."

But the 33-year petroleum engineer, who lost his job with Marathon Oil during a downsizing two decades ago, is chastened by experience.

"I'm packing away as much as I can, because I do know that oil runs dry," said Woltman, whose job is to evaluate "missed opportunities" at a Gulf Coast oil field that was already tapped by BP. "I have been through those bad cycles."

Houston's economic boom is tied not only to short-term spikes in energy prices, but to forecasts for global energy demand that are leading many companies to make ambitious long-term bets. Amid expectations that the skyrocketing needs of China and India will only increase, firms are more willing to explore for oil and gas in places previously considered too expensive, or to slog through red tape to build refineries and power plants.

Headhunters in Houston are going after all the engineers with 10 to 15 years' experience they can find. Companies are paying salaries $10,000 to $15,000 higher than just 18 months ago, and are sweetening the pot with retention bonuses, stock options and other perks reminiscent of last decade's dot-com boom.

Some firms are even luring engineers out of retirement by offering them more than they made during their prime earning years. Hagan Joyner, 74, got a call from a headhunter at Collarini Energy Staffing, offering a six-month gig. The veteran reservoir engineer, who worked 39 years before retiring in 1999, turned it down. But his wife, overhearing the conversation, told him he'd be crazy if he didn't call back.

He took a less stressful job minutes from his house, helping oil companies report their reserves to banks and the Securities and Exchange Commission — for $85 an hour.

"I didn't think I'd see something like this again in my lifetime," said Joyner, who is planning to use his windfall to see more of the world with his family. "The pay is certainly more than I used to make when I was working full time. We're getting our house fixed up, and are doing some things for our grandchildren."

Houston, like other Sun Belt cities, remains relatively affordable. Its cost of living is 24% less than other metro regions of 2 million or more people, according to the Council for Community and Economic Research, a national group that compares basic costs such as housing, groceries and utility bills.

So after paying their bills, many still have money to spend.

DOJ_NMG_0109900

Those benefiting most from the current energy boom are behaving demurely compared with past generations of Houstonians, who giddily spent small fortunes on jewelry, 12-cylinder Jaguar sedans and lizard-skin cowboy boots when oil prices were high, only to sulk in shame when they bottomed out. A bumper sticker popular in Houston's sober aftermath read, "Please Lord, give me one more oil boom. I promise not to blow it next time."

But after years of modest consumption, the money has begun to flow, especially at the city's more luxurious establishments.

"It's human nature — when people have more discretionary income, they are more willing to spend," said Evelyn Gorman, owner of Mix: Modern Clothes, an industrial-chic boutique that sells Bruno Frisoni shoes, Balenciaga handbags and other high-priced fashions. Mix, which recently moved into a boxy new building that looks like a Gulf Coast oil platform, has enjoyed steadily increasing sales over the last two years.

"Would I want to be in Louisiana or Detroit right now? Absolutely not. In Houston, Texas, energy capital U.S.A., when the price of oil is high, you can certainly tell the difference," Gorman said.

The city's elite spas and social clubs all have waiting lists, said Colleen Kennedy, director of memberships at the Houstonian Club, where the first President Bush goes for his haircuts and former First Lady Barbara Bush takes brisk walks.

"That is the first time in all my years in this business that I have seen that," said Kennedy, who has been with the Houstonian for a quarter-century. "All of these clubs are high-dollar items. Our membership fees are $20,000 and $24,000."

In the Texas Hill Country, the picturesque region of rugged, rolling landscapes at the center of the state, Houstonians buying vacation and retirement homes have helped send real estate prices surging.

"I'm astounded at these prices. I used to think these people must be dope dealers or something, but I know better now," said Pat Boyle, owner of Pat Boyle Realty, who has been selling ranches in Bandera County since 1978. Among the properties was a 31-acre hilltop retreat with an orchard and swimming pool for $1.6 million — a large sum in a state where the median home price is $142,000.

"Oil and gas is still the engine that pulls the train, but it seems like the whole Texas economy's rocking and rolling. All these people in their glass cubicles in Houston want their little piece of the Hill Country," Boyle said.

Like Texans in general, Houstonians love to drive gas-guzzling pickups and sport utility vehicles, which remain a common sight here despite the surge in prices at the pump. In the upscale Galleria shopping district, Texas-sized compact parking spots can fit a tank — and are frequently filled with the urban equivalent, a gleaming new Hummer.

"A lot of people have figured out how to make a lot of money in this town, and God bless them," said Mike Shafer, sales manager for the McGinnis Hummer dealership. He estimated he sells 40 Hummers a month, up from 25 a year ago. The outsized status symbols range from $29,000 to $53,000. "Gas goes up, gas goes down, but that never really affects sales here," Shafer said.

Houstonians also love going out to eat — and they do so more than big-city dwellers anywhere else in the country. The Zagat Survey this year found that Houston residents dined at restaurants 4.2 times a week, compared with 3.4 times for New Yorkers and 3.2 times for Americans overall.

During the peak of the petroleum boom that showered Houston with riches a quarter of a century ago, Tony's would sometimes sell white truffles to a cadre of society queens and oilmen, said Vallone, a gracious man whose pudgy cheeks and thick torso betray years of la dolce vita.

Now, Vallone said, it is not unusual for Tony's to sell three dozen orders of white truffles on a Saturday night. The patrons who pay $125 for the privilege of having the aromatic delicacy shaved onto their plates of pasta and risotto are not all tycoons — many are young professionals with money to burn.

"In the old days, young people would come here for a special occasion, a birthday or an anniversary," said Vallone's wife, Donna. "Now they come here to dine."

Ex-Interior Secretary Norton Is Hired As Counsel For Shell (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Royal Dutch Shell PLC said it hired former U.S. Interior Secretary Gale Norton to serve as a counsel for the Anglo-Dutch oil company.

The move comes amid rising scrutiny in Washington of the department's dealings with the oil industry.

Ms. Norton, who stepped down as interior secretary March 31, will be based primarily out of Colorado and will serve as general counsel for the firm's unconventional-resources division, Shell said. The oil company is developing and testing proprietary technology designed to enhance oil recovery from certain unconventional sources, such as oil shale and extra-heavy oil, Shell said.

DOJ_NMG_0109901

Ms. Norton, 52 years old, served as secretary of the Interior from 2001 to 2006 and was the first woman to hold the position. She was succeeded by former Idaho Gov. Dirk Kempthorne.

Before that, Ms. Norton was senior counsel at Brownstein, Hyatt & Farber P.C., a law firm based in Denver. She is a former attorney general for Colorado and associate solicitor of the Department of the Interior. In 1996, she unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination for the Senate in Colorado.

The hiring of Ms. Norton comes at a tough time for her former agency. With the Democratic takeover of Congress, leading lawmakers have signaled they will closely scrutinize the Interior Department's policies for collecting oil-and-gas royalties from public lands.

The Minerals Management Service has come under particular criticism after agency omissions excused the oil industry from paying royalties on Gulf of Mexico leases from 1998 and 1999. A Government Accountability Office report said the omission by the MMS cost taxpayers $10 billion.

Shell, historically one of the biggest industry players in the Gulf of Mexico, was one of five oil companies that reached an agreement with the MMS Dec. 14 to pay royalties on the 1998 and 1999 leases.

Acosta Moving To Qorvis Communications (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Dean Acosta, NASA press secretary and deputy assistant administrator for public affairs, is moving to Qorvis Communications next week to work with the firm's aerospace and technology clients, such as Pratt & Whitney and United Technologies.

Acosta, a former journalist, joined NASA in April 2003, several weeks after the shuttle Columbia accident. He led NASA's communications effort in the return to flight with the launch of the Discovery more than two years later.

"Although NASA has been an incredible work experience . . . it's nice to work for a company that's your core expertise," Acosta said.

Acosta is barred by ethics rules from contacting the space agency for one year, but he can still advise contractors with NASA interests.

Also at Qorvis, Kara Ross, a Clinton White House Midwest spokeswoman, joined as a senior director. She most recently worked for ACS Government Solutions and earlier for the Transportation Department, the Defense Department and former senator John Glenn (D-Ohio).

Experiment In Caring (WSJ)

By Lucette Lagnado

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Agnes Barrett has lived on West 138th Street in Harlem for more than 42 years, persevering as the area experienced riots, fires, gangs, crack and epidemics of AIDS and homelessness. One night in the 1970s, she recalls how a house near hers caught fire and a baby was tossed out the window. She can still see the father running down the street holding the injured baby in his arms.

These days, Mrs. Barrett, who still works as a nurse's assistant one day a week at the age of 77, faces a new challenge: luxury apartments being built next door to her modest $465-a-month subsidized walk-up. Like many Harlem seniors, she fears what will happen in the rush to develop one of New York's hottest real-estate markets. "I love the beautification," Mrs. Barrett says, "but if you can't afford it, where are you going to go?"

Sheena Wright, the 36-year-old chief executive officer of Abyssinian Development Corp., is working to answer that question and a larger one faced by other cities and towns stretching far beyond the borders of Harlem: How do you keep the elderly -- and particularly the elderly poor -- at home, where they want to be, and out of institutions?

Abyssinian's unusual answer is real estate. ADC, the 17-year-old not-for-profit real-estate arm of the famed nearly 200-year-old Abyssinian Baptist Church, is a community-development and human-services organization that controls $299 million in property assets in booming central Harlem. Last year, ADC had a net gain of $73,593, says an Abyssinian official, citing financial statements. Now, it is using its resources to create a social, psychological and economic sanctuary for the community's elderly and poor residents, pumping proceeds into social-service projects while enabling tenants in Abyssinian-owned housing to pay low rents.

"We take the proceeds from the real-estate activities and they go into supporting our programs and services," Ms. Wright says. "The seniors in our community have been the stalwarts. They have been holding down the fort. It is time for us to take care of them."

Ms. Wright calls the streets around the church the "Abyssinian Neighborhood." The church began buying up real estate there nearly 20 years ago when the city was willing to sell abandoned properties for as little as $1 to anyone willing to manage them. "No one wanted to develop anything in Harlem -- housing or commercial -- and groups like Abyssinian took that risk," says Ms. Wright.

The area has since undergone dramatic change. During the last five years, median gross rents in Harlem have risen by 27%, while the supply of rent-regulated housing declined by nearly 3% from 2002 to 2005, according to Benjamin Dulchin, deputy director of the Association for Neighborhood and Housing Development in New York.

As Harlem has become a hot market, Abyssinian found itself vying for the same properties as private developers. These days, Abyssinian says an empty lot near the church can command nearly $1 million.

Ms. Wright is now running a real-estate empire comprising more than 1,000 rental dwellings, the bulk of them in buildings inhabited by the poor and the elderly. The development corporation also controls several commercial properties, and it is developing condominium apartments in five vacant lots now inhabited by stray cats on Mrs. Barrett's block, a venture aimed at middle-income, first-time homeowners.

In recent years, Abyssinian also renovated a group of brownstones and then sold them for several hundred thousand dollars each. Yet even there, Ms. Wright points out, profit margins turned out to be small and were plowed back into the mission. Abyssinian also needs private funding to carry out its social programs, she says.

Unlike private developers, Abyssinian's goal is to create a healthy and viable community. It has no plans to sell its low-income properties, Ms. Wright says. What it does want to do is attract middle-class and affluent residents as a way to strengthen the neighborhood.

"It's not healthy for our elderly to live in a 100% low-income community," says Ms. Wright. "The mix, raising the level and standard of services and amenities in the neighborhood, benefits everyone."

Abyssinian Baptist's immediate target is an area about four blocks wide, from Adam Clayton Powell Jr. Boulevard to Malcolm X Boulevard, and from West 136th Street to West 139th Street. Abyssinian says it has made a commitment to assist every senior who resides within those boundaries. Abyssinian says residents get visits or calls from staff case workers to find out what they need.

Some of the visitors weren't welcomed at first. Mrs. Barrett, for one, can't stand the idea of being looked after, and deplores even being called a "senior." Mrs. Barrett, whose landlord is Abyssinian, refuses to see a doctor. Yet an Abyssinian case manager has found a way to befriend her by simply checking in regularly to see how she is faring and earning her trust. Membership at Abyssinian Baptist church isn't mandatory: Mrs. Barrett loves her church, the Greater Refuge Temple, several blocks away.

Abyssinian is also trying to teach residents like Mrs. Barrett how to fight back if preyed upon by aggressive landlords. An active civic-engagement division in ADC has been organizing tenants' groups and block associations and teaching the elderly about legal resources. Seniors are trained to organize rallies and protest marches and realize their power as a voting bloc.

Abyssinian is hoping to add more blocks surrounding its commitment area and have the whole area designated as a NORC, for naturally occurring retirement community, which is defined as a residence, building, neighborhood or community not built specially for seniors but with a high concentration of older residents. Often it is a building where people moved in their younger years and aged in place; or it may be a small-town neighborhood where the young people moved away leaving behind the elderly.

Funded by city, state and federal monies, NORC programs are considered a cost-effective alternative to institutional care. In New York, the state has begun to fund NORC programs that encompass a neighborhood. Abyssinian has been seeking official NORC funding from New York state but has so far been unsuccessful. The state's NORC budget is limited, a state official said, making the selection process highly competitive.

What makes the Harlem experiment unusual? "They literally are drawing a ring around their elderly," says Fredda Vladeck, director of the Aging in Place Initiative of the United Hospital Fund, a nonprofit philanthropic research and policy group in New York. "They are creating an aging zone and looking not only at what services to provide but what to do to make that a community."

"I think it is very exciting and very important," Ms. Vladeck says. "It is renewing and redefining a sense of community in an urban setting." Abyssinian's idea of how to connect with seniors who don't live in the same building can be applied to suburban or small-town elderly.

To those who wonder if it's possible to mix social services and real-estate profit, Ms. Wright says there's no conflict between the church's core mission of helping the poor and powerless, and taking advantage of lucrative opportunities toward that end. Abyssinian's initiatives cost money, she says. "Doing God's work, fulfilling the mission -- you have to do it responsibly, you can't set out and promise services to people in need without a plan for sustainability, or have services for a year and then run out of money," she says.

Next on the horizon is an even more ambitious project: building mixed-income co-operative apartments or condominiums, and a cultural center, on the site of the old Renaissance Ballroom on Adam Clayton Powell Jr. Boulevard. There is one possible problem: The city's Landmarks Preservation Commission is weighing whether to declare it a landmark. However, the commission noted that such a designation wouldn't preclude development.

A Police Charity Moves To Exit The Fast Lane (WSJ)

By George Anders

Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

When corporate executives join civic boards, they usually are brought in to raise money, map out a growth strategy or provide cost-cutting discipline.

If only Robert Teal had it so easy.

The 63-year-old Mr. Teal, a longtime Silicon Valley entrepreneur, recently became chairman of the CHP 11-99 Foundation. It is one of the nation's leading police charities, operating independently of the California Highway Patrol but providing officers or their families with everything from college scholarships to funeral expenses. When Mr. Teal looked at the charity's main way of bringing in cash, he saw a problem lurking.

For years, the foundation had been selling "Life Memberships" to motorists for $1,800 apiece. Lots of people with Ferraris, BMWs and other fast cars snapped them up, mounting the foundation's hard-to-miss license-plate holders on their vehicles' rear bumpers. (The holders read: "MEMBER CHP 11-99 FOUNDATION.") Buying a membership was seen by many as protection against speeding tickets, though statistical evidence one way or another doesn't exist.

Foundation officials insisted they weren't trying to arrange highway leniency for anyone. The CHP has been even testier, declaring: "Everyone on the highway gets treated the same." But some motorists were clearly looking for special favors. As many as eight to 10 times a year, the foundation was forced to expel life members who treated patrol officers insolently after being pulled over for speeding.

So Mr. Teal led a push to revamp the way the 8,000-member foundation raises money. "Selling more memberships wasn't the answer to our funding needs," Mr. Teal says. "It had to come to an end." The biggest worry: If the foundation opened its doors too wide, it might end up with erratic drivers -- and high-profile accidents -- that ruined the group's reputation.

Mr. Teal's campaign shows how a take-charge leader must maneuver when redirecting a foundation or other nonprofit. It also speaks to foundations' challenges in seeking donations without creating awkward or unrealistic expectations from people giving money.

The CHP 11-99 Foundation was created in 1981 by Bob Weinberg, a Southern California cattle-feed merchant. He enjoyed chatting with patrol officers over coffee and would hand out $100 bills to help with college or medical expenses.

"We joked back then that the foundation was run out of Bob Weinberg's back pocket," says Dave Helsel, a retired CHP officer. The foundation's full name reflected Mr. Weinberg's belief that patrol officers performed dangerous, necessary work and didn't get much recognition for it. On California police radios, "11-99" is the code for an officer in distress.

Before his death in 1991, Mr. Weinberg broadened the foundation by hosting golfing fund-raisers and charging membership dues. Directors issued license-plate frames as conversation-starters, hoping that passersby in parking lots would ask about the foundation and eventually donate, as well.

In the early 1990s, foundation officials say fewer than 20% of CHP officers knew of the charity. There wasn't much reason to think that fast drivers belonging to the foundation would win sympathetic treatment when pulled over. Jack Campbell, the foundation's president in the mid-1990s, recalls getting three speeding tickets from CHP officers who didn't know -- or care -- what organization he ran.

Starting in the late 1990s, things changed. Foundation officials hit the road, briefing more than 100 CHP field offices about the opportunities for patrol officers' children to win college scholarships. The foundation became much better known among patrol officers; this year, it has provided $1.7 million in scholarships to 809 students. Today, 80% to 85% of CHP officers know about the charity, according to foundation officials.

Growing awareness of the charity on the part of officers has had no impact on the way the CHP does its work, according to CHP officials. "There's no favoritism on the highway just because someone is a member of 11-99," says Fran Clader, a CHP spokeswoman. "We're an equal-opportunity ticketer." But she acknowledges that patrol officers enjoy discretion in deciding whether to ticket a speeder or merely issue a warning. The CHP doesn't monitor treatment of subgroups of drivers, such as 11-99 members.

On Internet chat sites, car enthusiasts have claimed awesome benefits from belonging to the 11-99 Foundation. A poster on a Mercedes-Benz site, benzworld.org, referred to the foundation's license-plate frames as "the ultimate speeding ticket solution"; a car enthusiast on Acura-Legend.com called them a way for drivers to be "almost guaranteed of getting out of a ticket."

Other members are more demure. "I joined because I believed in their cause, and I thought it might help with tickets," says Bill Watkins, the chief executive officer of Seagate Technology Inc. He drives an Aston-Martin and can't always resist the temptation to let it roar. He says that while he was let off with a warning once or twice since joining, in another instance, "the officer wrote me up for everything."

By 2003, the foundation was spending more than $100,000 a year doing background checks on applicants' driving records -- and expelling a few members a year because they were abusive to CHP officers. Some directors felt those were bearable costs. Others thought it was time to change.

Mr. Teal emerged as the boardroom radical. He had joined the foundation board a decade earlier, having established himself as a major donor who had a high regard for the CHP. Affable and sensitive to other people's concerns, he was in line to take command of the board when his predecessor's three-year term expired. He made clear that overhauling the life-member program would be a top priority.

"The only asset we've really got is our image in the eyes of the CHP," he says he told colleagues. "If we lose that, we're dead."

Mr. Teal argued for jacking up membership fees to a new range of $5,000 to $25,000, far exceeding what fast-driving applicants might hope to save on speeding tickets. "You can kill any product if you price it high enough," he says. "I felt that's what we should do." Fast-driving tycoons could still afford that amount, he conceded. But it was a halfway step toward a different business model -- and it amounted to as much change as he thought the board could stomach.

Mr. Teal also believed the foundation could tap into big new sources of money. He urged colleagues to approach some of California's leading corporations and wealthiest people, asking them to donate $100,000 or more to create endowed scholarships in their name, which could run in perpetuity.

Some longtime directors balked at first. Such high dues would make it hard for many ordinary people to join the foundation, said director Frank Clark, a contractor who had been a friend of the late founder, Mr. Weinberg.

Mr. Teal pressed on, anyway. From his Silicon Valley days, helping start companies such as disk-drive maker Maxtor Corp., he says he found that "you can't really control the culture of an organization after it gets past 300 people. Before that, you know everyone. After that, you're dealing with third-hand referrals, and you just don't know who's coming in."

Another relatively new director, former hedge-fund manager Larry Bowman, rallied to Mr. Teal's position. "The more selective you are about your members, the easier it is to make sure they uphold your values," he maintained.

The giant dues increase passed in late 2005 and became official early this year. New-member applications are down sharply, says Edward Trickey, CEO of the foundation. But revenue growth hasn't suffered. That's partly because wealthy donors are giving more and also because a retooled foundation Web site makes it easy for small donors to pitch in $50 or $100. They don't get license-plate holders, but they get to support an admired cause.

Foundation donors also are being told that they shouldn't expect any roadway favors if they join. The foundation's new application form states that membership doesn't entitle anyone to "leniency or preferential treatment in any contact involving a law enforcement authority." Abusing membership privileges or property "shall result in immediate termination."

Going forward, Mr. Teal says it might make sense to get rid of the 11-99 Foundation's license-plate holders altogether. That would end even the appearance that foundation backers amount to a privileged class of drivers on the highways.

The foundation board hasn't yet decided whether to jettison that perk of membership. But Mr. Teal says he already unbolted the 11-99 Foundation holder from his BMW and mailed it back to foundation headquarters. "I told people to put it in a museum," he quips.

The Snooker Strategy (WP)

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

ABABY WHO was born in the year that Virginia last secured a stable new source of revenue for its aging transportation network would be most of the way through college now. If he happened to live in Northern Virginia and commute by car to classes at George Mason University, his life would probably be a nightmare of time wasted and psychic energy squandered on sclerotic roads during rush hours that last up to four hours. If by chance he decided to study public finance, he would doubtless be appalled by the Old Dominion's irresponsibility. Since 1986, the hypothetical year of his birth, Virginia's population and economy have boomed, but the state has not managed to tap one nickel's worth of fresh funding to update its roads, rails and bridges to 21st-century standards. In Northern Virginia alone, the cost of needed improvements to roads and rail is estimated at $17 billion.

On taking office at the start of the year, Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) did the sensible thing by proposing a tax package that would yield $1 billion annually for transportation statewide. The Republican-dominated state Senate backed him. But Republicans who control the House of Delegates would have none of it. Instead, after a generation of neglect, they have decided to attack the problem of Virginia's roads with press releases.

The press releases are masterpieces of omission, obfuscation and budgetary shenanigans designed to snooker voters. Rather than proposing a long-term fix for a long-term problem, they proudly announce that they favor spending what amounts to a pittance -- half of the state's current $500 million surplus -- on one-time transportation projects. Never mind that they have no viable plan for sustaining that already inadequate spending next year and the year after, since surpluses never last and cyclical downturns are inevitable. Never mind that once the money they propose spending is divvied up statewide, it would result in barely enough to build a decent interchange and a few precious miles of highway in Northern Virginia. Never mind that soaring highway maintenance costs are already gobbling up state funds meant for road construction to the tune of $450 million a year, which is approximately twice the amount the House Republicans propose spending on transportation from the current surplus. And never mind that skyrocketing costs for road materials and construction compound the cost of foot-dragging on a long-term solution. None of that bothers the House Republicans, because they're really more interested in scoring PR points than in building roads.

Mr. Kaine, stymied in his attempts to fashion a sustainable program of new funding, proposes spending an additional $161 million in surplus funds on transportation improvements during the coming fiscal year. (That, in addition to $339 million in surplus funds left over from last year.) It is, as the governor recognizes, a drop in the bucket and one that must be weighed against competing funding demands for public safety, schools and the poor. It would do nothing for Metro, which is slowly strangling from lack of revenue; for widening Interstate 66 inside the Beltway; or for the staggering improvements needed around Fort Belvoir, where 20,000 defense jobs are to be relocated -- let alone projects elsewhere in the state.

So what is the House Republicans' response to the underfunding and Mr. Kaine's proposal to deal with it? First, a press release, of course! Incredibly, House Speaker William J. Howell (R-Stafford) bashed the governor for "shortchanging" transportation, when his own House caucus is responsible for the absence of any serious program to deal with the state's most urgent priority. And yesterday, House Republicans introduced legislation to shift much of the responsibility to local officials who approve new development. These are just more tactics in Mr. Howell's ongoing snooker strategy. They're not likely to work.

Islamists Seem To Give Up Grip On Somali City (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Dec. 27 — The Islamist forces who have controlled much of Somalia in recent months suddenly vanished from the streets of the capital, Mogadishu, residents said Wednesday night, just as thousands of rival troops massed 15 miles away.

In the past few days, Ethiopian-backed forces, with tacit approval from the United States, have unleashed tanks, helicopter gunships and jet fighters on the Islamists, decimating their military and paving the way for the internationally recognized transitional government of Somalia to assert control.

Even so, the Islamists, who have been regarded as a regional menace by Ethiopia and the United States, had repeatedly vowed to fight to the death for their religion and their land, making their disappearance that much more unexpected.

Fortified checkpoints across the city — in front of the radio station, at the airport, at the main roads leading into Mogadishu and outside police stations — were abruptly abandoned Wednesday night, residents said.

Many of the teenage troops who made up the backbone of the Islamist army had blended back into the civilian population, walking around without guns or their trademark green skullcaps.

The sudden reversal left it unclear whether a war that had threatened to consume the Horn of Africa had quickly ended, or the Islamists had merely gone underground, preparing to wage a guerrilla insurgency, as some leaders had threatened.

“The whole city is just waiting,” said Sheik Ahmed Shiro, a Koranic teacher in Mogadishu.

At 10 p.m. on Wednesday, several Islamist leaders emerged to hold a news conference at their headquarters in Mogadishu. They did not explicitly concede defeat to the transitional government, but seemed to be preparing their forces for such an eventuality. “We need our soldiers to return to their positions for the sake of the people,” said Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, one of the leaders. “Even if your positions are transferred to the government, you must stay where you are and make sure Mogadishu is as safe as it was before.”

DOJ_NMG_0109906

As he spoke, Mogadishu was rapidly descending back into the clan-based anarchy that had been its hallmark for most of the past 15 years, before the Islamists came to power and pacified the city.

Witnesses said bands of armed thugs swept through the markets, smashing and stealing at will. Gunfire rattled from neighborhood to neighborhood as the disparate clan-based militias that had joined forces to form the Islamist movement began to fragment and turn on one another.

With the war going badly for them, clan elders had been rapidly losing faith in the Islamist leaders, residents said. The quick defeat the Islamists suffered earlier on Wednesday at Jowhar, the last major town on the road to Mogadishu, seemed to be the final straw.

The Islamists started out as a grass-roots movement of clan elders and religious leaders who banded together earlier this year to rid Mogadishu of its notorious warlords, earning them a lot of public support.

But much of that good will seems to have been sapped by their decision to go to war against the transitional government and the Ethiopian forces protecting it.

The Islamists attacked Baidoa, the seat of the transitional government, on Dec. 20; a few days later, they announced that Somalia was open to Muslim fighters around the world who wanted to wage a holy war against Christian-led Ethiopia.

That provoked a crushing counter-attack by the Ethiopians, who command the strongest military in East Africa. For the past week, the Islamists have lost one battle after another, their adolescent soldiers no match for a professional army.

By Wednesday, the Islamists were cornered. Thousands of troops from the transitional government were closing in on the seaside capital from two directions.

Mogadishu was coming unhinged. The ports and airports had closed, leading to a shortage of just about everything, sending prices for food, medicine and fuel skyward. A gallon of gas in Mogadishu now costs $8.

The once feared Shebab, the devout young Islamic fighters, began deserting in droves. (Shebab is the Arabic word for youth.) “We can’t resist,” said Musa Abdullahi, an 18-year-old Shebab who quit his unit after half his comrades were cut down by Ethiopian helicopter gunships. “We thought this fighting would be like the others. It’s not.”

Ahmed Nur Bilal, a retired Somali general, said the war had been a horrible miscalculation.

One of the first things the Islamists did after the fighting started was to close all schools in Mogadishu in order to send more young people to the front. “They’ve misled our children to their deaths,” Mr. Bilal said.

Residents said that crowds in one slum threw rocks at the Islamists’ pickup trucks as they drove by on Wednesday. Some people openly celebrated in the streets by hoisting up pictures of the transitional government’s leaders and gleefully chewing khat, a mildly narcotic plant the Islamists had outlawed.

The demonstrations helped prompt the clan elders, who are regarded as the pillars of Somali society, to act. According to residents in Mogadishu, the leaders of several major clans — and some businesspeople who had been financing the Islamists — demanded that the Islamist leaders return the armed pickup trucks that had been lent to the movement.

Faced with the loss of support from their counterparts, other clan leaders saw the coalition begin to crumble and withdrew their trucks as well, leaving little of the organized force that once lent the Islamists their power.

One adviser to Western diplomats who has close contacts with both the Islamists and the transitional government described the unraveling as an “organic process that rose up from the people, in an unorganized way, Somali style.”

Disappointment in the Islamists, however, does not necessarily translate into widespread enthusiasm for the transitional government, which until last week had been considered weak and divided by many Somalis. Thousands of people in Mogadishu, a war-weary city of two million, have begun to pack up and leave, residents said, afraid not only of the possibility of heavy urban fighting but also of a return to warlord rule, which kept Mogadishu in anarchy for years.

The transitional government has sent mixed signals about what it plans to do next.

Until now, Mogadishu had been considered too dangerous as a headquarters for the transitional leaders, themselves a mix of clan elders and former warlords. But transitional government leaders have always said they eventually planned to base their government in the capital, and this week they vowed to keep fighting until Mogadishu was theirs.

Several Mogadishu residents said on Wednesday night that they expected the Ethiopian-backed forces to march into the city at dawn. That has been a pattern since the fighting began, with the Islamists retreating from cities across Somalia during the night and the transitional government troops arriving in the morning. But some analysts believe there will be a few days of negotiations before that happens.

Ethiopian officials have said that occupying Mogadishu is not part of their plan. But they have also said that rooting out Islamist extremists is their priority.

Ethiopian Troops Take Key Town In Somalia (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 27 -- Ethiopian forces backing Somalia's interim government took control of the key Somali town of Jowhar on Wednesday and were on the verge of overrunning Balad, a village just 18 miles from the dusty, battered capital, Mogadishu.

With Ethiopian troops, tanks and helicopters closing in and military planes buzzing overhead, the situation in Mogadishu appeared confused, with witnesses reporting thousands of Somalis -- who have known little besides fighting for the past 15 years -- fleeing the capital, and those who remained unsure who might next control the city.

Militias loyal to Somalia's Islamic Courts movement, having retreated in recent days from most of the towns they had taken earlier this year, were spotted Wednesday shedding uniforms and fleeing the capital they have controlled since the summer, while other witnesses reported young men signing up with Islamic militias at several mosques around the city.

Islamic leaders have said the war is entering a new phase, and on Wednesday, Mohamoud Ibrahim Suley, a movement official in Mogadishu, told the Associated Press that "our snakes of defense were let loose, now they are ready to bite the enemy everywhere in Somalia."

Regional analysts have said the Islamic Courts militias, vastly outgunned by Ethiopian soldiers in conventional military terms, were counting on waging a guerrilla war.

"On one level you could say they've been beaten by the Ethiopians and they're trying to spin it," said Matt Bryden, a consultant in Nairobi with the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based policy research group. "On the other hand, you could say this is what they expected and of course they now go into a guerrilla war, and we get into an intractable, unwinnable conflict."

Abdirahman Dinari, a spokesman for the interim government, which has been holed up in the town of Baidoa, said officials of the U.N.-backed body could enter Mogadishu in the next day or two. The fragile government, cobbled together by regional negotiators two years ago, was initially based in Nairobi.

"Mogadishu is our capital," Dinari said. "So the government wants to consult religious moderates and other civil society activists on how we can make a strategy together that will solve our problems."

It was unclear whether Ethiopian troops would enter Mogadishu or simply surround it in an attempt to isolate the Islamic Courts fighters.

A draft U.N. Security Council statement calling for a cease-fire remained stalled, while African Union officials asked for a meeting of regional leaders in the Ethiopian capital, Addis Ababa, and called on Ethiopian forces to withdraw.

On Tuesday, however, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said that his campaign was only halfway completed and that he planned to clear out all the "extremists" from Mogadishu.

Experts have said that any large-scale invasion of Mogadishu by Ethiopian troops could end in a bloodbath.

Somalia has been without a functioning government since 1991, when President Mohamed Siad Barre was overthrown. In the next two years, tens of thousands of foreign troops were unable to subdue the chaotic city controlled by rival clans, and in October 1993, 18 American soldiers were killed in a failed raid to capture a fugitive warlord, an operation that led to the withdrawal of U.S. forces.

Though the United States has for the most part remained in the background as the current situation has deteriorated, Somalia has historically been considered strategically important because of its position adjacent to Red Sea shipping lanes.

More recently, it has drawn attention because of fears that the country could become a base for terrorist groups.

In the past, some Islamic Courts leaders have expressed a desire to create a "greater Somalia" that would include ethnic Somali portions of Ethiopia, Kenya and Djibouti; Ethiopia and Somalia have fought several times over Ethiopia's Ogaden region, including a full-scale war in the 1970s.

The United States and Ethiopia have accused the Islamic Courts movement of harboring terrorists, and the U.S. State Department went further this month, saying the movement was now controlled by an al-Qaeda cell, a claim that regional experts believe is exaggerated and fed in part by questionable intelligence from Ethiopia.

As the fighting continued Wednesday, an already dire humanitarian situation in Somalia appeared to worsen. Somalis who had already suffered severe droughts and floods fled the fighting in huge numbers, U.N. officials said, with thousands leaving Mogadishu and surrounding areas.

Officials with the International Committee of the Red Cross said the number of wounded had surpassed 800; Dinari said Ethiopian and interim government troops had killed more than 1,000 Islamic fighters, although aid groups could not confirm that figure.

Islamic Militias 'On Run' Near Mogadishu (WT/AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0109908

MOGADISHU, Somalia -- Somali and Ethiopian troops drove Islamic fighters out of the last major town before Mogadishu yesterday, and the government predicted that the capital and stronghold of the radical Islamists would fall without a fight.

Government spokesman Abdirahman Dinari said no assault was planned on Mogadishu because the forces of the Council of Islamic Courts were crumbling so fast.

"Islamic Courts militias are already on the run, and we hope that Mogadishu will fall to our hands without firing a shot," he said.

As government forces advanced to within striking distance of this beleaguered city, clan leaders considered abandoning Islamic militias who control the Somali capital and throwing their support to the United Nations-backed regime, based in Baidoa.

In New York, the U.N. Security Council failed yesterday for a second day to agree on a statement calling for a quick end to the war in Somalia after Qatar again insisted that it also urge Ethiopian troops to leave.

The 15-nation council remained split 14-1 against the Qatari position, as it had been Tuesday, so further deliberations were called off with no expectation that they would resume any time soon, diplomats said.

During the two days of closed-door negotiations, Qatar had pushed for a demand that "all foreign forces immediately withdraw from the territories of Somalia and cease their military operations inside Somalia."

Acting U.S. Ambassador Alejandro Wolff said it was too simplistic to think that an Ethiopian withdrawal would solve the problem.

The Islamic Courts movement had grown steadily in power for six months, until the dramatic entry into the war by Ethiopian troops. Since then, fortunes have changed dramatically with the Islamists in full retreat.

Yesterday, residents reported seeing thousands of Ethiopian and Somali government troops in tanks heading toward Balad, about 18 miles away from Mogadishu.

Former warlord Mohammed Dheere, who controlled the town of Jowhar before it was captured by the Islamists in June, led in the Somali government troops.

Sounds of the fighting reached a military camp south of Jowhar and in the village of Lego. An Islamist official said his troops were simply entering a new phase in their battle.

"Our snakes of defense were let loose, now they are ready to bite the enemy everywhere in Somalia," said Sheik Mohamoud Ibrahim Suley. He did not elaborate, but some Islamic leaders have threatened a guerrilla war including suicide bombings in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia's capital.

Analysts fear the conflict in Somalia could engulf the region. Islamic Courts leaders have said repeatedly that they want to incorporate ethnic Somalis living in eastern Ethiopia, northeastern Kenya and Djibouti into a Greater Somalia.

Some analysts also fear the Islamic movement hopes to make Somalia a third front -- after Afghanistan and Iraq -- in militant Islam's war against the West.

The group's often severe interpretation of Islam is reminiscent of Afghanistan's Taliban regime -- ousted by a U.S.-led campaign in late 2001 for harboring Osama bin Laden. The U.S. government says four al Qaeda leaders, thought to be behind the 1998 bombing of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, are leaders in the Islamist militia.

Ethiopia sent fighter jets deep into militia-held areas Sunday to help Somalia's internationally recognized government push back the Islamist militias. Ethiopia bombed the country's two main airports and helped government forces capture several villages.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said Tuesday that Ethiopian forces may soon wrap up their offensive against the Islamic militias. He said he aims to severely damage the Islamic Courts' military capabilities and allow both sides to return to peace talks on an even footing. He has said he would not send troops into Mogadishu.

A State Department spokes- man in Washington signaled support Tuesday for Ethiopian military operations against Somalia, noting that Ethiopia has had "genuine security concerns" stemming from the rise of Islamist forces in its eastern neighbor.

Ethiopia-backed Forces Near Mogadishu (FT)

By Andrew England And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

Somali government forces and allied Ethiopian troops advanced closer to Mogadishu on Wednesday, capturing a key town 90km to the north from the Islamist movement that controls the capital.

Ethiopia’s deployment of fighter jets, tanks and artillery to support the weak transitional government, has forced the Islamists, which had controlled much of southern Somalia, to retreat from front line positions. The dawn attack on Jowhar, situated on a main highway to the capital, appeared to take place without major clashes.

DOJ_NMG_0109909

Officials from the Islamist movement, which is an alliance of militias, have said they are planning for a "new phase" in the conflict, suggesting they are preparing to mount a guerrilla campaign against the better-equipped Ethiopian forces.

Ethiopia launched its offensive against the Islamists on Sunday after fighting erupted between Islamist militias and Somali government forces around Baidoa, the government's seat in central Somalia.

Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister, says Addis Ababa has "no specific agenda" to target Mogadishu, describing the offensive as a necessary "defensive" measure and analysts warn that if Ethiopian forces did attack the capital they would risk getting sucked into a protracted guerrilla conflict.

There are also concerns that Ethiopia, an important US ally in the region, is helping to put warlords who were defeated by the Islamists earlier this year back into positions of power. The faction leaders, responsible for 15 years of chaos and bloodshed, were generally loathed by a population fed up with endless exploitation and violence.

The Somali government, which was formed two years ago at an UN-supported conference, has been dogged by divisions and has so far had minimal influence outside Baidoa. It received little international attention before the Islamists seized Mogadishu in June from a group of US-backed warlords.

Mohamed Dheere, one of the defeated warlords, was reportedly with government troops when they moved into Jowhar, and observers said at least three other warlords have moved into towns vacated by the Islamist forces.

The result could be a return to the status quo of a country split into a patchwork of fiefdoms, beset by clan divisions, violence and extortion rackets.

The Bush administration has expressed support for the Ethiopian military action on the basis that Addis Ababa has "genuine security concerns" there, and has been asked to provide support by the Somali government.

But Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the White House National Security Council, said the US was also urging the Ethiopian government "to exercise maximum restraint". No Somali party should "use external actors as an excuse to avoid further dialogue", said Mr Johndroe.

Joseph Biden, the incoming Democratic chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, on Tuesday said the Bush administration appeared to have given "tacit approval" to the Ethiopian government involvement in the conflict.

He also criticised the administration for what he called the "fundamental mistake" of supporting various militia and the warlords in Somalia rather than helping to broker a deal between the warring groups.

Although Addis Ababa and Washington accuse the Islamists of including and sheltering terrorists, the alliance had, in some areas, created a semblance of stability.

"Ethiopia seems to be counting on an unreformed transitional government and faction leaders to fill the vacuum, which is a strategy that is unlikely to succeed in bringing stability," said Matt Bryden, a Somalia expert.

Ethiopian Troops Overtaking Islamists' Control (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders And Abukar Albadri

The Los Angeles Times, December 28, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia — Troops from Ethiopia and Somalia's transitional government cornered Islamic fighters Wednesday in their stronghold of Mogadishu, setting the stage for a possible showdown over Somalia's seaside capital.

A weeklong assault led by Ethiopia's military, which sent nearly 4,000 troops into Somalia at the request of the transitional government, has resulted in a sudden reversal of fortunes for the Islamists, who have lost nearly all the territory they had seized the past six months.

On Wednesday, Islamists lost two more key areas, including the town of Jowhar and the port city of Kismayo, officials said. Ethiopian troops moved within 18 miles of Mogadishu.

As residents hoarded food, water and gas in anticipation of an attack, the Africa Union chairman called for Ethiopian troops and other foreign elements to withdraw from Somalia. The Arab League called for an immediate ceasefire.

Somalia has not had an effective central government for 15 years. The U.N.-backed transitional government has been trying to establish its authority, but the Islamists have presented a major challenge.

The Islamic Courts Union, an alliance of religious leaders, seized Mogadishu from warlords in June and gradually extended their control over much of the country. Ethiopian and U.S. officials have accused the Islamist alliance of being controlled by international terrorists, including al-Qaida. Critics said the courts union planned to install a Taliban-style government in Somalia and use it as a springboard to spread religious extremism in Africa.

Islamists deny such allegations, saying there are victims of Western and anti-Muslim propaganda.

Ethiopian and transitional government officials insisted the offensive would continue until the Islamists surrendered. "The fighting will not end as long as one of the terrorists remains in Somalia," said Barre Adan Shire, defense minister for the transitional government.

DOJ_NMG_0109910

Somali government officials said they had no immediate plans to invade the capital, a campaign they said could inflict heavy civilian deaths on the city of 2 million. Instead, Ethiopians and transitional government troops encircled Mogadishu, shut down the sea port and airport, and are pressuring Islamic leaders to give up.

"We are cutting off the roads and begging them to lay down their weapons," said Abdikarim Farah, the transitional government's ambassador to Ethiopia. He said the U.S. was helping to seal off access along the Indian Ocean coastline. "We will take over Mogadishu peacefully. I assure you that. ... How can they hold?"

U.S. military officials acknowledged they have been conducting operations to interdict terrorists in the seas surrounding the Horn of Africa but noted those missions have been in place for several years. One military official said there is a Navy presence off the coast of Somalia, but it is aimed primarily at anti-piracy efforts and has been in place for some time.

Much of Ethiopia's campaign, including the capture of nearly two dozen Somali cities over the past week, occurred without a fight because Islamist troops retreated in advance of Ethiopian tanks, jets and troops.

But fierce battles over a few key cities are believed to have left hundreds dead on both sides. Exact casualty figures could not be confirmed, but the International Red Cross estimated 800 were wounded over the past week.

Shire said more than 1,000 Islamists have been killed, including 300 foreigners.

After a three-hour battle Wednesday, Jowhar was seized by transitional government troops led by Mohammed Omar Habeb, also known as Mohammed Dhere, a warlord who was driven out of the city by Islamists this summer.

"We attack Mogadishu Thursday," Dhere told the town's residents after retaking the city. "We will catch and behead all the terrorists and militants, just as they behead innocent people."

Transitional government officials, who also have clashed with Dhere in the past, cautioned that he would not resume control of Johwar.

Later in the day, Islamists reportedly abandoned Kismayo as Ethiopians advanced. The World Food Program, a U.N. agency, was forced to suspend airlifts and food distributions to flood victims in the area, a spokesman said.

The spokesman of the Islamic courts, Sheik Mohammed Ibrahim Suley, downplayed Wednesday's setbacks.

"Our forces are coming back for tactical retreat," he said. "We are sure we will defeat the enemy and will seize the places we lost."

Islamist leaders are vowing to use guerrilla tactics, including suicide attacks, to defeat the larger, better-equipped Ethiopian military. "Our forces have mandate to ambush the enemy forces in every place," Suley said.

Analysts said such threats would not easily intimidate Ethiopia's military leaders, most of whom spent years fighting in the bush as rebels against a former dictatorship which they overthrew in 1991.

"This is a force that toppled the previous government through guerrilla warfare," said Amare Aregawi, editor of the pro-government newspaper The Reporter. "They are guerrilla-war specialists."

Ethiopian and transitional government leaders said their troops have been warmly greeted by Somalis, but some people in Mogadishu warned of a backlash if Ethiopian troops entered the capital.

"If they try to occupy the capital, there will be mass suicide attacks and terrorist acts," said Abdusamad Abdulkader, a fabric vendor.

Others said Islamists, who had been praised for restoring peace and order to southern Somalia, were quickly losing support among the people.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi promised Ethiopia would not keep its forces in Somalia or attempt to occupy its neighbor.

Experts say that raises questions about how Somalia's transitional government, with only about 10,000 soldiers, will be able to maintain control after Ethiopian troops go home.

Transitional government officials are scrambling to accelerate security recruitment and training programs and said they will attempt to rehabilitate former Islamist fighters. But United Nations or Africa Union peacekeepers likely will be needed, many believe.

"They will need substantial support from the international community," said Bereket Simon, an adviser to Meles. "The whole world should help Somalia stand on its own two feet."

War In The Horn Of Africa (NYT)

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

It is tempting to wink at Ethiopia's stunningly successful offensive in Somalia. It pushed back a hateful Islamic militia that was defying the United Nations, threatening to impose religious tyranny and, according to Washington, harboring international terrorists. The Bush administration quickly succumbed to temptation, lauding Ethiopia's attacks as a legitimate response to "aggression."

But if there's anything we should have learned over the past few sad years, it is that this kind of unilateral pre-emptive attack seldom solves anything, particularly when the country doing the invading is regarded as a longstanding enemy.

Somalia is a familiar kind of mess, with a weak official transitional government composed of a collection of regional clan leaders and warlords, pitted against radical Islamists who control their own militias, who have spread Taliban-like terror among the populace and who recently surrounded the seat of the transitional government at Baidoa.

To halt their advance, Ethiopia's armed forces crossed an international border and routed the Islamists, who retreated to their stronghold, Mogadishu, and have largely disappeared from public view.

It's hardly surprising that there was little international outcry. But while moderate forces in Somalia have been appalled by the brutal intolerance of Islamist leaders who have threatened to behead people for not praying five times a day, they are unlikely to embrace Ethiopian soldiers as a good alternative. Ethiopia and Somalia have long been rivals, and went to war in the late 1970s over a land dispute. If the transitional government seems propped up by foreign invaders, it would lose whatever popular support it has now.

The United States squandered its influence in Somalia by supporting some particularly horrible warlords to challenge the Islamist radicals. But it still has considerable sway over Ethiopia.

Washington should use that influence to push for a swift cessation of hostilities, lest the conflict pull in neighboring countries and explode over the entire region. The resulting chaos would create a refugee crisis and open a new terrorist recruiting hub. The Islamists have threatened suicide attacks and called for help from foreign fighters in a "holy war" that has already drawn thousands of Muslim fighters from Eritrea, Yemen, Libya and Syria.

The United Nations is unhappy about the Ethiopian incursion, but it needs to demonstrate that it has a good alternative. The Security Council must meet urgently to find ways to replace Ethiopian troops with a neutral international force and keep the violence from spreading to other countries.

Rather than trying to marginalize the Islamic militias and the huge clan they represent, the international community should try to harness this moment to push for unity talks while the Islamists are weak and the transitional government has attained a more equal standing.

The Somali Stakes (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

The armed conflicts that so often roil Africa rarely engage U.S. interests except in a humanitarian sense. But that cannot be said of the war that has now broken out between Ethiopia and the Islamists who seized control of much of Somalia in June. Here America's strategic interests are very much engaged, even if the actors in the fight range, morally speaking, from the unpalatable to the unacceptable.

Among the unpalatables is the increasingly autocratic Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister of 15 years, who has deployed as many as 20,000 troops in neighboring Somalia and may soon control its capital, Mogadishu. Mr. Zenawi claims to be acting on behalf of Somalia's internationally recognized but weak Transitional Federal Government (TFG), which was barely holding on in the regional city of Baidoa until Ethiopia's intervention.

The TFG is led by Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, another strongman-in-waiting whose resumé includes stints as president (first elected, later self-declared) of the breakaway northern Somali province of Puntland. Also in the anti-Islamist mix is the so-called Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism, a coalition of Somali warlords reportedly backed by the CIA with suitcases of cash on the theory they were more likely to keep the Islamists at bay than were the TFG.

On the opposite side are the Islamists, a.k.a. the Islamic Courts Union (ICU). Since wresting control over Mogadishu from the warlords, the ICU has managed to pacify parts of the country, which some might say is a net plus for Somalis. But its methods are reminiscent of the Taliban, which also brought a sort of peace to Afghanistan. The ICU threatens to behead anyone who fails to pray five times a day.

Among the ICU's leaders is one Hassan Dahir Aweys, previously of the Saudi-funded, al Qaeda-connected al-Itihaad al-Islamiya terrorist group. Mr. Aweys was named a terrorist by the U.S. as far back as 2001, and his outfit is thought to be connected to the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. The extent to which the Islamic Courts Union is assisting al Qaeda or its offshoots is a matter of dispute. But there's no doubt it is now recruiting jihadis from around the world to its cause.

Such are the opposing sides in this conflict, and it's clear that U.S. interests would be well-served by the ICU's collapse. Less clear is how to bring that about, how to do so without sparking a wider war, and how to bring some semblance of order to the country.

Eritrea, long at war with Ethiopia, has sent its own contingent of troops to aid the ICU, Saudi Arabia has pledged support, and al Qaeda bigwig Ayman al-Zawahiri has called Somalia "the southern garrison of Islam." While the ICU might easily be routed by Ethiopia in a conventional test of arms, it will be much more difficult to defeat as a guerrilla or terrorist force.

No outside powers are likely to risk a repeat of the disastrous U.N. mission to Somalia of the early 1990s. So probably the best the U.S. can do is give tacit support to Ethiopia's incursion while using its leverage with Mr. Zenawi to demand that he agree to the U.N. demarcated border with Eritrea. The U.S. provides Ethiopia with economic as well as substantial military assistance.

In return, the Eritreans might be persuaded to cease their support for the ICU. The U.S. could also condition material support for a future TFG government in Mogadishu on its recognition of the autonomy of Puntland and neighboring Somaliland, which adjoins U.S.-allied Djibouti and has been relatively free of ICU interference. As with the former Yugoslavia, addressing the problem that is Somalia might ultimately mean breaking up that large country into smaller bits.

There is a material limit to what the U.S. can do for East Africa, and expectations for what the region can and will do it for itself cannot be high. Still, the Ethiopian offensive against Islamic Courts is an act of regional hygiene that we can hope is able to contain radical Islam from spreading to a far larger swath of Africa.

Iran's Strong Ties With Syria Complicate U.S. Overtures (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

DAMASCUS, Syria — Early next year, Syria's first domestically manufactured cars are scheduled to roll off an assembly line. They will have an Iranian name, be produced in a plant partly financed by a state-controlled Iranian car company and be made of parts from Iran.

Not long after that, Syria hopes to open two new multimillion-dollar wheat silos, add 1,200 new buses in Damascus, open another Iranian car factory in the north and start operating a cement plant — all in partnership with Iran. The two countries are also talking about building an oil refinery, opening a joint bank, constructing housing, developing electric generators and, someday, linking their rail systems through Iraq.

As the White House begins to rethink its strategy for dealing with the Middle East, particularly how to calm the chaos in Iraq, pressure to try to re-engage Syria has grown. Some Western analysts contend that Syria, with a government more pragmatic than ideological, can be pried away from Iran's influence and convinced that its long-term interests lie instead with the West.

But Washington has spent years trying to isolate Syria, while Iran has for decades moved to entwine itself with Syria on many levels — political, military, economic and religious.

Iran is a country of many power centers with different pools of money, from funds controlled by grand ayatollahs of Qum, to those in the hands of the Revolutionary Guards. They may not all be directed by the central government, but they all help promote Iranian influence in Syria.

As a result, some Western diplomats in Iran say that, even if the United States tried, it might be impossible to extricate Syria from Iran's orbit.

"Iranians have been working harder for longer than we realized," said a European diplomat based in Damascus who spoke on condition of anonymity to avoid antagonizing Syrian officials. "They have stronger links going back more years than we were aware of."

Syrian officials are extremely sensitive about the relationship with Iran. Part of the reason is fear of igniting sectarian tensions in Syria, which is about 80 percent Sunni Muslim. The president and his inner circle are from a minority Shiite sect, the Alawites, and Iran is Shiite.

While the Syrian power brokers have decided for practical reasons to align with Iran, political analysts in Syria say the government remains fearful of alienating the Sunni majority, especially amid widespread rumors that Iran is trying to convert Sunni Syrians to Shiism.

Concern among Sunnis is heightened because Syria is a major destination for Iranian religious tourists; as many as 500,000 a year visit Shiite sites in Syria. Iranian organizations have spent millions of dollars restoring, enlarging and maintaining Shiite shrines in Syria, from the center of Damascus, the capital, to the north, near the Turkish border.

Iran's efforts to spread its influence around the Middle East have increased in the last two or three years, regional analysts say. They have been propelled by rising oil prices and American policies in the region, which have neutralized Iran's enemies, Saddam Hussein in Iraq and the Taliban in Afghanistan.

"Iran has used this affluence of oil revenues over the last five or six years to play a beautiful game, from their perspective," said Osama T. Elansari, a director of the Dubai International Financial Exchange who lives in Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0109913

Iran's efforts have often been most evident in Lebanon, where it has set up an informal economy in the south. It needs only to provide money to its proxy, Hezbollah, which has a construction arm, called Jihad al Bina, and a vast network of social services that dole out money and build schools and hospitals.

According to some estimates, Iran has spent tens of millions a month over the years in Lebanon. Riad Salameh, the governor of Lebanon's central bank, said he had no idea how much money Iran had sent into Lebanon because it had gone via Syria, not through the central bank.

"Iranians bring in money donations over the border," he said.

In Lebanon, after Israel and Hezbollah fought for 34 days over the summer, Iran quickly delivered generators, and fuel, to villages without power, and was credited with providing the $12,000 that Hezbollah gave to each family whose home had been destroyed.

Iran offered an open checkbook to repair anything not covered by other sources — including roads, mosques, schools and houses. While there is no guarantee Iran will deliver on that pledge, it is already way ahead in the battle for the hearts and minds of many Lebanese.

"The Zionist enemy destroys and the Islamic Republic of Iran rebuilds," read banners in front of restored schools in Lebanon.

In Syria, relations with Iran are more formal and less public, but no less consequential. Diplomats say, for example, that Iran has developed very close ties with Syrian intelligence, providing gear and training, and sharing listening posts to monitor Israel. Iran also has one of the largest embassies in Damascus, political analysts said, and has assigned an ambassador there who served for seven years as chief of staff to Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

The United States, by comparison, maintains economic sanctions on Syria and withdrew its ambassador in 2005 after the assassination of the former prime minister of Lebanon, Rafik Hariri. The highest-ranking American diplomat in Damascus, Michael H. Corbin, the deputy chief of mission, has little access to Syrian officials.

But Iran's economic relationship with Syria is far more complicated than that with Lebanon. The Syrian economy is still struggling to overcome decades of corrupt central control, and to attract foreign investment and create jobs. Iran, meanwhile, has shifted in the other direction.

Iran's investments are relatively modest in value: just $120 million a year, the Syrian government says. But current and planned projects are considered significant.

"Iran is moving in the direction of investing in Syria, and of course Syria won't say no," said Samir Seifan, a Syrian economist in Damascus. "For Iran, it's about business and about cementing political ties."

Iran's ambassador to Syria, Muhammad Hassan Akhtari, acknowledged that Iran had had trouble working in foreign markets. But he said the experience of the past 10 years — especially in Syria — had helped improve Iran's business practices. And he said that he was not worried that Syria would abandon Iran, or even try to alter relations with it.

"Syria remains very steady in their principles of foreign relations," he said. "If the West wants to do something, we think they have to change their attitude."

Iran To 'Revise' Any Relations With Monitors In Nuclear Area (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

TEHRAN, Dec. 27 — By an overwhelming vote, Parliament passed a bill on Wednesday that could limit Iran's cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations monitor.

The measure was a response to the resolution passed Saturday by the Security Council, which imposed trade sanctions on goods and technology related to Iran's uranium enrichment and ballistic missile programs.

The Council's resolution is aimed at curbing those programs, which the United States and Europe contend are intended to make Iran a nuclear weapons state. Iran has repeatedly asserted that its development activities are for nuclear energy, not weapons.

The final draft of the bill in Parliament, approved after two days of debate, asserts that the government should "revise its cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency based on the interests of Iran and its people." The vote was 161 to 15, with 15 abstentions.

It is unclear what "revise its cooperation" means. But the measure was considered by some moderate members of Parliament to be less severe than earlier versions proposed by conservative members, who had wanted Iran to withdraw from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and ban all inspectors. The United Nations agency polices adherence to the nonproliferation of nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0109914

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who denounced the Security Council sanctions as a “superficial action,” is expected to sign the bill.

Although Parliament is dominated by conservatives, there has been a debate among lawmakers about the country’s nuclear policy under President Ahmadinejad, who has asserted that nuclear development is Iran’s inalienable right.

Some minority reformists believe his policy is doing more harm than good by isolating Iran economically.

One reformist lawmaker, Nouredin Pirmoazen, said in a debate on the bill, “The best solution is to establish a bridge with other countries to reduce the tension.”

Others said the bill could give the government a free hand to decide how to continue its relationship with the atomic energy agency. Alaedin Boroujerdi, the head of the foreign policy and national security commission, told journalists that the bill’s vague language meant “the government can do anything based on what it recognizes is for the country’s interests.”

In a gesture that suggested that religious authorities are united behind the bill, the Guardian Council of Islamic clerics immediately approved it, a step that is required for any bill to become law. The Guardian Council has rarely approved a bill so swiftly.

Iran’s chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, appointed a committee on Wednesday to examine how the country should “revise” its relations with the atomic energy agency. In a news conference later, Mr. Larijani said the Security Council resolution was aimed at “humiliating Iran.” But he also said Iran wanted to continue its nuclear program based on international regulations.

Persian . . . Or Iranian? (WSJ)

By Roya Hakakian

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Holiday parties always seem to bring out the semi-inebriated men who find their way to my corner. There is, as expected, an opening line, which hardly ever leads to a conversation. But if it ever does, and if that conversation shows signs of vitality, even a dim glimmering of erudition, a rhetorical question is sure to follow. They lean into me and murmur: "Did you say you were Persian or Parisian?" They count on the tie, the long-stemmed wine glass, or the exalted titles on their name tags to make flirtation pass as ethnographical inquiry.

The "compliment" is clearly a profound insult: When an Iranian proves to be sophisticated, she no longer qualifies as Iranian. She is exchanged into a creature whose cultural currency is tangible for the Westerner. If unfamiliarity with Iran is less shallow than "My college classmate's father was the personal pilot for the Shah" (Royal Pilot number 1,654 and counting), or "Our local Eyeraynian serves great tandoori," then the real biases begin to emerge. The unveiled and urbane Iranian jars the Western mind. For the Anglophone, Iran's history begins in 1979, and the model for an authentic Iranian male is bearded, preferably turbaned and robed; and the female is submissive and veiled. Fist-throwing, frenzied behavior is a plus. The rest are simply the have-beens: exiles who are at best irrelevant, if not thoroughly out of touch. Non-Shiites need not apply.

But the Westerner is not entirely to blame. The country's presidential machinery is dedicated to convincing the world of just that. The main task of every ideology is to create identity, which is what Tehran's taskmaster-in-chief is attempting. With the symbolic Palestinian scarf around his neck in the land where public support for the Palestinian cause has been consistently diminishing, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's existential mission is to recast the ethos of being Iranian. In truth, he is peddling a pan-Islamism, by regional extension a pan-Arabism, for which neither Iranians nor Arabs have an appetite. As uranium is enriched, the Iranian identity is plundered. Mr. Ahmadinejad's numerous spectacles, most recently the Holocaust conference, are meant to bring a sense of transcultural and transethnic unity through a common political purpose. On the domestic scene, this is an old act -- a familiar blunder to annihilate Iranian nationalism, or to force it to become subordinate to the Muslim, with Arab undertones.

The effort began by Ayatollah Khomeini. He made no secret of his contempt for the non-Muslim dimensions of Iranian life. He injected Persian with so many Arabic words that it confounded the ordinary listener, something for which he compensated by repetitiveness. He did all but officially ban Nowrooz, the traditional Iranian new year with its roots in the pre-Islamic era, and refrained from delivering a traditional Nowrooz message in March 1979 (weeks after the victory of the revolution). But as popular as he was in those early days, the public's backlash against his stance on Nowrooz was so powerful that he, who rarely relented, eventually caved in. Since then, and especially as a result of the arduous Iran-Iraq war, patriotism has been on the rise. Pre-Islamic holidays are being celebrated with unprecedented fanfare. The Persian lexicon has turned into a bastion of nationalism. Numerous Persian synonyms have been invented to replace the most commonly used foreign words, primarily Arabic ones. To everyone's wonder, the new words have caught on.

Yet even the ayatollah was borrowing a page from history. The battle to define the Iranian identity, Muslim versus Persian, is an old one. Since the Arab conquest of the 7th century, Iranians have struggled to maintain their heritage through language and tradition. Though the nation fully embraced Islam, the religion of the conquerors, they made it uniquely their own by Persianizing it, which, to a great extent, marks the historical beginnings of Shiism. A leading Iranian philosopher argues that failure and loss have branded the Iranian psyche. The loss here refers to the loss of the Sassanian Persian army against the Arab Muslim army in the year 636 at Qadesiyyah -- a battle which Saddam Hussein often invoked as he unleashed his army into the Iranian territory.

The tension is also a tension between simplicity and complexity. The ruling elite wants to summarize Iran in a formula -- that of another outpost of Islamic fundamentalism, whereas Iranians have always been elusive. The best definition that a typical Iranian would most likely offer of herself is as a poem, which can only compound the enigma. But the poem serves, as poems often do, as an invitation to being recognized as complex, a notion that the Westerner allows and can easily grasp about his European counterparts. The Westerner knows not to reduce its own politics to a few eccentric leaders -- the U.S. to Jerry Falwell, the Netherlands to the late Pim Fortuyn, or France to Jean-Marie Le Pen. To reduce Iran to Mr. Ahmadinejad would be just as grave an aberration. In tangible terms, it means to scratch the nuclear surface to let the light of the other Iran shine through. It means to report the Holocaust conference along with the student demonstrations against Mr. Ahmadinejad within the same week, or the new grass-roots initiative by women to ban stoning, or the astonishing statistics released by Tehran's Office of Cultural Affairs showing a dramatic drop in the number of Iranians who pray daily.

Today, the Westerner can no longer afford to be a bystander to this historical tension. Be it policy makers or ordinary citizens, the decision on Iran will be, on some level, a vote in this ancient referendum. To choose one side or the other is a declaration of the Westerner's position on a pressing political issue; but it is also his proof of recovery from the colonial mindset. To have transcended colonial thinking is not to embrace the displays of fanaticism as manifestations of authenticity. It is to recognize all global citizens as equals, and as such as deserving of the indisputable rights enjoyed in the West.

Whatever happens to Iraq and the dream of creating a democracy in the Middle East, Iran is already going through pains of transition. Iranians are turning to the notion of civil society and moderation, not simply as political necessities, but also as ways to define themselves as distinct, and thus to pay contemporary tribute to a past that has, despite the centuries, remained a formative force in their present.

Mr. Hakakian, author of "Journey from the Land of No: A Girlhood Caught in Revolutionary Iran" (Crown, 2004), is writing a book about the assassination of Iranian Kurdish leaders.

Israeli Plan Draws U.S. Criticism (AP)

By Barry Schweid, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

In a rare criticism, the Bush administration said Wednesday if Israel proceeds with construction of a settlement on the West Bank it would violate its peacemaking obligations.

But defending its construction plan, a spokesman for the Israeli embassy said "the settlement is not a new one." It was legally established in 1982, housed an army unit and a school and has had civilians living there for several years, said spokesman David Siegel.

The plan is to build within the confines of the existing settlement, he said.

A State Department spokesman, Gonzalo R. Gallegos, said, "The U.S. calls on Israel to meet its roadmap obligations and avoid taking steps that could be viewed as predetermining the outcome of future negotiations,"

"The establishment of a new settlement or the expansion of any existing settlement would violate Israel's obligations under the roadmap," the U.S. official said.

Israel agreed to the roadmap in 2003. It was devised by the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia in an effort to guide Israel and the Palestinians into an agreement that establishes a Palestinian state.

No new settlement has been established on the West Bank in 10 years. The plan has drawn Palestinian and European expressions of concern.

The Bush administration rarely criticizes Israel's actions and has gained Israel's support for establishment of a Palestinian state.

Opponents of Mahmoud Abbas, the moderate president of the Palestinian Authority, have criticized his cooperation with Israel in trying to get peace talks started. They have accused him of yielding to a U.S.-Israeli approach.

Gallegos said, "We are seeking an explanation from the Israeli government regarding this development."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is expected to go to the Middle East next month to try to spur peacemaking between Israel and the Palestinians.

It was not clear whether she had approved the statement.

"We will continue to work with Israel and the Palestinians to encourage President Bush's vision of two states" living side by side in peace, Gallegos said.

DOJ_NMG_0109916

The settlement plan, approved by Israeli defense minister Amir Peretz, calls for construction on the site of an Army base in the Jordan valley.

By contrast, Israel Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has endorsed Palestinian statehood and said he was agreeable to a large-scale Israel pullback on the West Bank to make way for a state.

Gallegos said the roadmap states "progress will require and depend upon the good-faith efforts of the parties."

U.S. Scolds Israel On Plan For West Bank Settlement (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 27 — In a rare public rebuke to Israel, the Bush administration said Wednesday that an Israeli plan to construct a Jewish settlement in the occupied West Bank for the first time in 10 years could violate the terms of an American-backed peace proposal.

"We are aware of reports about the Maskiot settlement," said Gonzalo Gallegos, a State Department spokesman. "The establishment of a new settlement or the expansion of an existing settlement would violate Israel's obligations under the road map."

The road map is the shelved plan that is supposed to lead to peace between Israelis and Palestinians and the establishment of a Palestinian state. Under the plan, Israel is not supposed to build more settlements in the West Bank.

"The U.S. calls on Israel to meet its road map obligations and avoid taking steps that could be viewed as pre-determining the outcome of final-status negotiations," Mr. Gallegos told reporters.

For the Bush administration, which has shied away from criticizing Israel, the rebuke was so unusual that State Department officials took pains to assure reporters that it represented official policy and had been cleared by senior members of the administration.

The criticism was made as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was expected to go to the Middle East early in 2007 to try to shore up support for Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president.

On Tuesday, Israel's Defense Ministry and settler groups announced plans for the construction of about 30 houses at Maskiot. Israeli officials said the settlement was not new, but a revival of a 1982 settlement, which had become a military training site by the mid-1990s.

"This was set up by the Israeli government nearly 25 years ago," said David Siegel, spokesman for the Israeli Embassy in Washington. "It's not a new settlement."

Israel essentially decided to stop building settlements in 1992 when Yitzhak Rabin became prime minister, although it has allowed settlements to grow, even as it has publicly promised to freeze settlement activity under the road map.

The road map calls for a freeze in settlement building in the first phase and a Palestinian push to dismantle terrorist groups. Israel says that the dismantling should come first and that it has not occurred. But Israel has separately promised the Bush administration that it will build only within existing settlement boundaries to account for natural growth, "thickening" the settlements but not expanding them physically.

The Israeli announcement has particularly confounded American diplomats because it appears to run counter to the prevailing effort by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who offered a series of gestures to the Palestinians several days ago, after meeting with Mr. Abbas.

Israel To Renew Attacks On Gaza Rocket Squads (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

The Israeli government on Wednesday ordered the military to resume targeting militants spotted firing rockets from the Gaza Strip but said its month-long ceasefire with the Palestinians would otherwise remain in force.

The government ended its policy of restraint in the face of ceasefire violations after one of eight rockets fired at Israel on Tuesday wounded two youths in the southern town of Sderot, one of them seriously.

A statement said the military was authorised to make pinpoint strikes against Palestinian rocket squads, apparently ruling out a wide-ranging response that would scupper the truce agreed in late November.

Ehud Olmert, prime minister, had been under pressure from inside and outside his cabinet to end the policy of restraint in the face of continuing rocket attacks, many of them claimed by the Islamic Jihad movement, which has no political role in the Palestinian Authority.

Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for a solitary rocket that landed outside Sderot on Wednesday as harsh weather conditions and low visibility limited the Israeli military's options.

DOJ_NMG_0109917

Militant groups have justified continued rocket attacks as retaliation for Israeli operations in the West Bank, where top members of Islamic Jihad and the Fatah-linked Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades were seized in recent days.

Wednesday's government statement said Israel would continue its policy of liaising with Palestinian security officials as part of efforts to stem the rocket fire.

The ceasefire followed a big Israeli incursion into the Gaza Strip, the latest of a series of operations this year in which hundreds of Palestinians, many of them civilians, were killed, but which nevertheless failed to end the rocket attacks.

A month of relative calm opened the way for a recent summit meeting between Mr Olmert and Mahmoud Abbas, the PA president, at which the Israeli leader agreed to unfreeze $100m of Palestinian tax revenues, around one-sixth of the dues it has withheld since the Islamist Hamas movement came to power.

The concessions offered to Mr Abbas failed to stir much excitement in the Palestinian territories, where the summit had given rise to hopes that Israel might be ready to release large numbers of detainees and substantially ease restrictions on Palestinian movement.

Mr Abbas has established a committee to negotiate prisoner releases but its prospects are limited until Palestinian militants free Gilad Shalit, an Israeli soldier abducted in June.

Ahmed Aboul Gheit, visiting foreign minister of Egypt, which is closely involved in co-ordinating security in Gaza, yesterday said Egypt was working for Corporal Shalit's release.

Mr Olmert told Mr Abbas at the weekend that Israel would remove up to 27 of several hundred military checkpoints in the West Bank.

Israel Says It Will Retaliate Against Rockets From Gaza (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

JERUSALEM, Dec. 27 — A day after two teenage boys were badly wounded by a rocket fired from Gaza, Israel ordered the military on Wednesday to resume attacks on Palestinians firing such rockets.

The order was issued a month after a cease-fire was declared between Israel and Palestinians in Gaza. The Palestinians promised to stop rocket fire on Nov. 26, and the Israelis promised not to carry out military activities inside Gaza.

But as of Wednesday night, according to the Israeli Army, 66 rockets had been launched toward Israel since then and 52 had landed there. The ruling militant group Hamas said it was respecting the cease-fire but was doing nothing to stop other militant groups, like Islamic Jihad and Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades, which is linked to Fatah, Hamas's rival.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel, encouraged by the United States to support the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and to restart talks with the Palestinians, had ordered the military not to respond, but political pressure to do so was growing. Mr. Olmert was being criticized from the left by his own defense minister, Amir Peretz of the Labor Party, and from the right by Benjamin Netanyahu, the leader of Likud.

That pressure heightened overnight, when a Qassam rocket launched by Islamic Jihad hit two 14-year-old boys walking home in Sderot, an Israeli border town. The youths were taken to a hospital in Ashkelon. One, Adir Ghasad, was in critical but stable condition, peppered with shrapnel, the hospital said; the other, Matan Cohen, was in serious condition. Matan had been injured once before by Qassam shrapnel, his friends told Israeli news media.

So on Wednesday morning Mr. Olmert ordered the military, including the air force, to resume action against those firing the rockets. The military will be permitted to strike before, while or after rockets are launched.

The military will not, however, be allowed to fire shells into open areas near the border to deter rocket-launching teams from entering them. Errant Israeli shells, usually from tanks or artillery, have in the past hit houses and other populated areas, killing uninvolved civilians. Nor will the air force be allowed to bomb weapons caches or individuals not involved in rocket firing.

Mr. Olmert said in a statement that otherwise, "Israel will continue to maintain the cease-fire and work with the Palestinian Authority so that immediate steps are taken to halt the Qassam firings."

The cease-fire was intended to break the cycle of violence, but Palestinian rocket fire continued intermittently. Islamic Jihad and Al Aksa — which supposedly is loyal to Mr. Abbas, who has opposed the rocket fire as counterproductive — say they are responding to Israeli military actions in the occupied West Bank, an area not part of the truce.

Mr. Abbas had said that he had the agreement of all Palestinian factions for the cease-fire, but Islamic Jihad, largely directed by Iran, has never respected such an agreement, and on Wednesday threatened to increase the rocket fire.

The Hamas government spokesman, Ghazi Hamad, criticized the Israeli decision as aggression, but he added, "We still believe this agreement is alive, and both sides should respect this agreement because it is in the interest of our people."

DOJ_NMG_0109918

A Labor Party minister and former defense minister, Benjamin Eliezer, told Israel Radio: “We cannot restrain ourselves anymore. It’s good that we did, because the entire world saw that we did above and beyond, but we cannot turn an entire town into a graveyard.”

Mr. Netanyahu called on the government to take over northern Gaza and occupy the areas from which rockets are fired and to take control over the border of Gaza with Egypt to stop arms smuggling.

The Egyptian foreign minister, Ahmed Aboul Gheit, was in a snowy Jerusalem on Wednesday preparing for a summit meeting on Jan. 4 in Sharm el-Sheik, an Egyptian Red Sea resort, between Mr. Olmert and President Hosni Mubarak.

Egypt has been trying to advance talks with the Palestinians and to secure the release of an Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was captured in June, in return for more than 1,000 Palestinians in Israeli jails.

“We oppose the Qassam attacks on Israel,” Mr. Aboul Gheit said. “We hope that Israel will continue to show restraint. We need to continue with the peace process because that is the way to progress.”

Mr. Abbas was in Cairo on Wednesday, where he met with Mr. Mubarak.

He said after the meeting that when he met with Mr. Olmert on Saturday night, he proposed what he described as backdoor meetings with Mr. Olmert, The Associated Press reported.

“It is the right time to talk,” Mr. Abbas told reporters. “We have the idea of a backdoor channel between us and the Israelis, with the participation of one or all members of the quartet to discuss all the issues of the final status,” he said. The quartet members are the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations, which oversee the peace efforts.

Israel Threatens To Renew Attacks (AP)

By Josef Federman, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

After weeks of restraint, Israel said Wednesday that it will renew attacks on rocket-launching militants in the Gaza Strip, threatening to derail an already shaky, month-old truce.

A new round of fighting in Gaza could undermine Israel's efforts to bolster the moderate Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, in his standoff with the Islamic militants of Hamas who control the Palestinian government and legislature.

The Israeli decision, made at a meeting of top officials, came hours after a Palestinian rocket seriously wounded two Israeli teenage boys in the southern town of Sderot, next to Gaza.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office said Israeli retaliation would be limited to "pinpoint" operations meant to foil rocket launches. "At the same time, Israel will continue to abide by the cease-fire," the statement said.

The truce was reached Nov. 26, ending five months of deadly fighting in Gaza. But since the cease-fire declaration, more than 60 rockets have been fired at Israel, the army said.

Israel has so far refrained from responding, but Olmert had warned in recent days his patience was wearing thin. The wounding of the two boys late Tuesday increased pressure on Olmert from political opponents and members of his Cabinet to take action.

Hamas government spokeswoman Ghazi Hamad denounced the Israeli decision to "continue their aggression against our people," but added: "We still believe that this agreement is alive, and both sides should respect this agreement because it is (in) the interest (of) our people."

Hamad's comments were directed not only at Israel, but also at the rival militant group Islamic Jihad, which has been responsible for most of the rocket fire. After the Israeli threat of retaliation, Islamic Jihad fired another rocket. There were no reports of damage or injuries.

The fate of the truce appeared to lie in the hands of Islamic Jihad, a tiny Iranian-backed group that wants to destroy Israel and replace it with an Islamic state. Over the past two years, Islamic Jihad has repeatedly sabotaged efforts to halt violence, firing rockets and carrying out a string of suicide bombings.

Islamic Jihad officials said the rocket fire was meant to avenge Israeli arrest raids in the West Bank, which is not covered by the truce. The group also believes that igniting conflict with Israel will help unite Palestinians after a bitter round of infighting that has killed 17 people this month.

"That's one of the main reasons for resuming attacks," said Abu Ahmad, a spokesman for the group.

The infighting has pitted Hamas, which also rejects Israel's existence, against Abbas' more moderate Fatah. Hamas, which won legislative elections early this year, controls most government functions. Abbas, who was elected in a separate presidential vote, hopes to restart peace talks with Israel.

Israel's threats of retaliation could harm its recent efforts to bolster Abbas in his standoff with Hamas. After meeting the Palestinian leader last weekend, Olmert agreed to release $100 million in frozen Palestinian tax money and to ease travel restrictions on Palestinians in the West Bank as goodwill gestures.

DOJ_NMG_0109919

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said limited military strikes in Gaza should not lead to widespread conflict.

"As long as operations are prudent and pinpointed, there is no reason for things to deteriorate," Livni said at a news conference with visiting Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit.

Aboul Gheit, in Jerusalem to prepare for a Jan. 4 summit between Olmert and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, urged Israel to show restraint. "We need to continue with the peace process because that is the way to progress," he said.

In Egypt, Abbas said he had proposed opening secret "backdoor" peace negotiations with Israel.

"It is the right time to talk about this issue seriously," Abbas told reporters after he talked with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Abbas said he raised the issue with Olmert last weekend, and the Israeli leader promised to consider it.

There was no immediate Israeli reaction.

The endangered truce in Gaza ended five months of fighting that erupted after Hamas-linked gunmen tunneled into Israel, killed two soldiers and captured a third. Egypt, which frequently mediates between Israel and the Palestinians, has been trying to negotiate the release of the soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit.

At Wednesday's news conference, Aboul Gheit said that "we are sure that he is still alive."

Shalit has not been seen or heard from since he was captured, though Israeli officials have said they believe the soldier is alive.

"What he said is nothing new," Noam Shalit, the soldier's father, told The Associated Press. "I hope there is more behind it ... I wish we could know more."

Abbas Proposes Closed Talks With Israel (AP)

By Salah Nasrawi, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas proposed Wednesday that he start closed-door talks with Israel on some of their most difficult disputes including the status of Jerusalem and the fate of Palestinian refugees.

"It is the right time to talk," Abbas told reporters after he met with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

Recent weeks have seen a growing momentum toward reviving Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert met Abbas on Saturday, and Olmert is expected to meet Mubarak next week at an Egyptian Red Sea resort. The bipartisan panel on Iraq headed by former U.S. Secretary of State James A. Baker III said progress on the Israeli-Palestinian dispute could help ease tensions in Iraq.

Egypt, the first Arab country to make peace with Israel, has hosted several rounds of talks among rival Palestinian factions over the years. It has been working to broker a deal between the Jewish state and Hamas for the release of an Israeli soldier captured in June by militants affiliated to the group.

Olmert said last week that he would consider releasing some of the thousands of Palestinian prisoners held by Israel before Cpl. Gilad Shalit is freed.

Abbas did not spell out why he was proposing that the negotiations with Israel be "backdoor." But as one of the architects of the 1993 Oslo peace accord between Israel and the Palestinians, he is known to champion quiet, informal diplomacy.

"We have the idea of a backdoor channel between us and the Israelis, with the participation of one or all members of the Quartet to discuss all the issues of the final status," Abbas said, referring to the Western powers — the United States, Russia, European Union and the United Nations — that oversee the peace process.

Abbas said he proposed backdoor negotiations to Olmert at their weekend meeting, and that the Israeli leader promised to consider the suggestion. He also said he planned to discuss the idea with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice when she comes to the Middle East next month.

Abbas made clear he wanted the talks to focus on the issues that have been the hardest to resolve in previous negotiations.

Those issues are the future of Palestinian refugees, the sovereignty of Jerusalem — which both Israelis and Palestinians claim as their capital — and the borders of the future Palestinian state.

It is not certain that Olmert would agree to tackle the thorniest issues rather than proceed cautiously with step-by-step negotiations and interim agreements. It is also unclear how the Palestinian government would view the results of backdoor talks with Israel by Abbas, who is in the opposition.

Hamas, which refuses to recognize Israel, is believed to favor a limited truce with the Jewish state in exchange for its complete withdrawal from the West Bank and east Jerusalem. Olmert is under pressure from hard-line Israelis opposed to withdrawing from the West Bank.

In a rare criticism, the Bush administration said Wednesday that if Israel proceeds with construction of a new settlement on the West Bank it would violate its peacemaking obligations.

DOJ_NMG_0109920

A spokesman David Siegel, a spokesman for the Israeli embassy, said that the planned construction would take place within the confines of an existing, 25-year-old settlement.

Olmert is expected to meet Mubarak in the Red Sea resort of Sharm el-Sheik on Jan. 4, Olmert's office said Wednesday. Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit met Israeli officials in Jerusalem on Wednesday to prepare for the summit.

Egypt has been trying to negotiate the release of an Israeli soldier whose capture by Hezbollah militants touched off the summer war in Lebanon.

A spokesman for President Mubarak, Suleiman Awad, told reporters Wednesday that the Egyptian leader had written to President Bush urging him to take advantage of the current climate to revive Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Tangled Finances: Hezbollah Fund-Raiser's Mission: Money For Bullets And Loans (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

As Israeli Planes Bomb Offices Microcredit Czar Endures;| U.S. Brands Him a Terrorist Mixing Violence and Virtue

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- Hussein al-Shami, custodian of cash for the Islamist militant group Hezbollah, has had a rough few months.

During Hezbollah's 33-day war with Israel this summer, Israeli warplanes obliterated the 10-story Beirut apartment building where Mr. Shami had lived with his family. They also targeted a credit agency he runs for Hezbollah. All but one of its nine branches were destroyed, he says. Then in September, the U.S. Treasury Department named him as a "Specially Designated Global Terrorist."

Now he's back at work in the Lebanese capital, pursuing his intermingled missions. He's shepherding funds for Hezbollah, which the U.S. brands a terrorist group. He's also running an enterprise that the U.S. normally supports: making microloans to nurture a culture of self-help capitalism.

Mr. Shami and U.S. officials agree on little -- not even the year of his birth, which he says is 1952 while the U.S. terrorist-designation notice puts it variously at 1948, 1954 and 1960. His activities confound U.S. efforts to strictly divide players in the Middle East into realms of good and evil, and his success helps explain the resilience of Islamist groups that mix violence and virtue.

America and Israel see Mr. Shami as a grave menace for his role in minding Hezbollah finances. They blame the Islamist group, an armed militia that also provides health care and other services, for terrorist attacks including the 1983 Beirut bombings of the U.S. Embassy and a Marine Corps barracks. Today, Hezbollah, emboldened by what it calls a "divine victory" over Israel this summer, is flexing its political muscle with a campaign to topple Lebanon's U.S.-backed government. One major fund-raising group Mr. Shami has helped run, the Islamic Resistance Support Organization, has mounted past appeals to support Hezbollah's armed combat.

Mr. Shami, speaking near the bombed-out ruins of his credit agency's headquarters, fumes against "Zionist aggression" and ridicules U.S. efforts in the region. He talks proudly of his role in setting up a "martyr's fund" to support the families of dead Hezbollah militants. At his side in a makeshift Hezbollah office is the group's flag, emblazoned with a green Kalashnikov rifle.

But Mr. Shami, holder of a graduate degree in business administration and father of five, also boasts of service to a more peaceable cause. Last year he provided financing to more than 26,000 clients through Hezbollah's credit agency, Al-Qard Al-Hassan Association, Lebanon's largest maker of tiny loans. "We should be encouraged, not cut to pieces," he says.

The loans averaged $865 last year, largely made to Shiite Muslims who support Hezbollah. Customers include people starting businesses, such as car body-repair shops and hairdressing salons, and homemakers buying furniture or paying school fees. The maximum loan was $1,500, but with gold or gold jewelry given as security, the ceiling went up to $3,000.

Washington has long identified economic development as the best cure for political extremism. It has financed its own microcredit agencies in Lebanon to do much the same work as Mr. Shami's. But they charge interest, and have far fewer customers. Mr. Shami's outfit follows the rules of Islamic finance, which proscribes interest and charges service fees instead.

Until war erupted in July, Washington hailed Lebanon as a beacon for its vision of the "new Middle East" -- a region committed to democracy, aligned with the West and eager to root out militant groups. Today, the country is a showcase for the growing clout of forces that America wants eclipsed: Hezbollah, Iran and Syria. Lebanon's government, headed by former banker Fuad Siniora, teeters under pressure from Hezbollah, which has organized a series of peaceful massive demonstrations. Pro-American ministers, fearful of assassination after one of their number was murdered last month, mostly work, eat and sleep in a fortresslike stone building ringed with razor wire and heavily armed troops.

Mr. Shami, meanwhile, moves easily around town in a white Ford Explorer sport-utility vehicle. He says he's "comfortable that America's project for the region will fail." He has set up small temporary offices to replace the destroyed branch network, and his 100-strong staff has contacted clients to assure them that the gold jewelry and other valuables deposited as collateral for their small loans are safe. Account details, stored on computers, all survived, he says.

Squeezing the finances of extremist groups has been a key front in America's "war on terror" since al Qaeda's 2001 attacks on New York and Washington. The U.S. crackdown initially focused on Osama bin Laden's network but has struck hard in recent months at Hezbollah. In addition to branding Mr. Shami a terrorist in September, the Treasury Department has targeted an Iranian state bank it says channeled funds to Hezbollah and a host of organizations and companies, including three Lebanese entities linked to Mr. Shami.

Washington argues that all Hezbollah-related money must be stopped, whether it is used to buy weapons, fund microcredits or run the group's network of clinics, schools and other services. "We don't buy into the frame of mind that you can distinguish between the military and social arms," says Pat O'Brien, assistant Treasury secretary for terrorist financing. "Money is fungible."

The U.S. approach carries a risk: It has strengthened the view of Hezbollah's supporters, many of whom come from Lebanon's most-impoverished areas, that America wants to keep them poor, not fight terrorism. Even Hezbollah's rivals say the U.S. strategy plays into the hands of Islamist propagandists, who blame America and Israel for economic and other woes.

"It's stupid and it doesn't work," says Ahmad Fatfat, one of Hezbollah's fiercest foes in Lebanon's beleaguered pro-American cabinet. A former interior minister, Mr. Fatfat says clamping down on Hezbollah's finances may disrupt its social services but won't limit its military capabilities. Hezbollah, say Mr. Fatfat and others, generally gets its rockets and other weapons free from Iran and Syria. Moreover, he says, Hezbollah's money "comes in suitcases, not through banks."

The crackdown has made little visible impact so far on Hezbollah's ability to find cash. Soon after the war ended in August, the group began handing out wads of dollars to people whose homes had been bombed. Estimates based on Hezbollah statements put the value of the handouts at roughly $180 million. Lebanese officials say the money was probably carried by hand from Iran via Syria. Mr. Shami says the cash came from the Imam Reza Foundation, a wealthy Iranian organization that controls a revered Shiite shrine and has vast business holdings.

The sole surviving original branch of Mr. Shami's credit agency is located in a mixed Sunni and Shiite area of west Beirut. Business is brisk, with a stream of customers, mostly women, arriving to make payments on their loans. A picture of Iran's late Ayatollah Khomeini hangs on the wall. On a marble counter are two boxes for donations for other organizations. One is for the Imam Khomeini Relief Committee, originally an Iranian charity now with huge welfare operations in Lebanon.

The second is for the Islamic Resistance Support Organization, the main Hezbollah fund-raising arm that Mr. Shami has helped run. It was blacklisted by the Treasury Department in August, after the war, for aiding terrorism. Its Web site and some of its leaflets have appealed for funds for ammunition. The Treasury Department also says they've solicited for money for weapons, including rockets.

Amal Dbouk, a 35-year-old housewife, said she came to the credit agency to pay off part of $1,000 she had borrowed to cover school fees for two of her three children. Abir Mansara, 27, a self-employed hairdresser, said she needed money to buy hair dye and cover other costs. She's taken out two loans, depositing three gold bracelets, a necklace and a gold ring as collateral.

Lebanon's mainstream banks, the two women say, would never give them loans. Both support Hezbollah and both took part in the recent street demonstrations against Lebanon's American-backed government. Ms. Mansara says she adores Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah, comparing him to a "rock star." "He fights for his country and fights for us," she says. Ms. Dbouk complains that America helps only Israel. "Hezbollah," she says, "helps us."

Hezbollah has all along mingled charity with violence. When Israel invaded Lebanon in 1982 at the start of what became an 18-year occupation, previously weak Islamist forces merged to form Hezbollah, or the Party of God, mobilizing both military resistance and welfare work. The Israeli assault uprooted the secular Palestine Liberation Organization, which had used Lebanon to launch attacks against Israel. Hezbollah, fired by Shiite zeal, filled the void.

A turning point came in 1983 in Mr. Shami's hometown of Nabatiyeh. A riot broke out when an Israeli military convoy drove into a crowd commemorating Shiite Islam's most sacred festival. The incident inflamed religious passions -- and helped set in motion a Shiite resurgence that is now shaking Lebanon, Iraq and the whole Middle East. That same year, more than 300 people were killed in the Beirut bombings of the U.S. Embassy and Marine Corps barracks, America's biggest loss of life to terrorism until 2001. Hezbollah denies carrying out the attacks but nonetheless hailed the slaughter.

Working at the time as a manager in a refrigerator company, Mr. Shami joined Hezbollah. He got to know Mr. Nasrallah, who then was a newcomer to the group, and took charge of its social services, which grew in tandem with its military wing. An early concern, he says, was to ensure that Lebanon's large Shiite population avoided becoming "hostages to aid" like Palestinian refugees, who lived off humanitarian handouts in camps around Lebanon.

Calculating that loans would "force people to be productive, to work," he set up a tiny credit agency in his Beirut apartment. "People in the West don't think people in the East have a vision, or are capable of looking ahead," he says. "But people in Lebanon make plans."

The microlender gave 150 loans its first year, says Mr. Shami, who at the time sat on Hezbollah's governing council. In 1985 the credit agency moved to a rented office in Harat Hreik, a squalid Beirut suburb flooded with Shiite refugees from the south. The agency, he says, was initially called Bayt al-Mal, an Arabic term that means "House of Money." It was registered with Lebanon's Interior Ministry in 1987 as Al-Qard Al-Hassan Association, or "The Good Loan Association" -- in other words, conforming to Islamic rules.

Microfinance has since become celebrated as a tool for poverty relief in developing countries. An early pioneer in Bangladesh, Muhammad Yunus, recently was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

In the 1980s, Mr. Shami also set up associations to aid the war effort against Israel and to cement loyalties to Hezbollah. Among these was the Martyr's Foundation, which provided money to the widows and children of suicide bombers and others killed fighting Israel's occupation. It mimicked an Iranian organization set up during Iran's 1980-88 war with Iraq.

U.S. and Israeli officials today describe the Martyr's Foundation as one of the conduits used by Iran to send money to Hezbollah. Some of it, they say, has been funneled through Iran's state-owned Bank Saderat. In September the Treasury Department ordered the bank cut off from all access to the U.S. financial system, saying Saderat had made $50 million in payments to Hezbollah since 2001. Iranian officials say Bank Saderat hasn't transferred money to Hezbollah.

Mr. Shami says Hezbollah gets most of its donations directly from its own fund-raising efforts. Public anger at Israel is so strong that even Mr. Fatfat, the politician opposed to Hezbollah, says he's donated to "resistance" social causes in the past. A Hezbollah activist and others familiar with the organization say Mr. Shami still runs the main fund-raising arm, the Islamic Resistance Support Organization. Mr. Shami says he is just a financial consultant to Hezbollah.

The support organization's methods can often elude U.S.-led efforts to stem the flow of cash. By cart, bicycle or car, volunteers transport a fleet of mobile donation boxes, each fitted with a yellow Hezbollah flag. The group also raises money through Hezbollah's television station, al-Manar. During the July-August war with Israel, al-Manar solicited funds by directing donors to specific bank accounts and cellphone contact numbers.

The general manager of one bank to which the broadcast directed donations, Mounir Karam of MEAB SAL, placed advertisements in Lebanese newspapers to deny any link to Hezbollah, but an American bank that gave MEAB access to U.S. dollars severed its ties. "What can I do, sue Hezbollah?" asks Mr. Karam. Hezbollah activists answering several of the phone numbers this month said the group is no longer taking direct bank deposits, and instead asked for checks to be made out to a courier who would pick them up, rather than to the organization.

Before the Israeli airstrikes this summer, Mr. Shami worked from a huge office in the headquarters of Al-Qard Al-Hassan Association, which occupied three stories in a building opposite his apartment block in Harat Hreik, Hezbollah's principal stronghold in southern Beirut. Unlike leaders of Hezbollah's military wing, who shun outsiders, Mr. Shami has for years received visitors from outside the Islamist orbit.

The operations manager of his biggest U.S.-funded rival, Ameen, met with Mr. Shami to try to satisfy his curiosity about his business. Judith Palmer Harik, an American academic who has lived in Lebanon since the late 1970s and has written a book about Hezbollah, says she first met Mr. Shami in the early 1990s, when he was running the group's social services. "I expected another mullah-type with a big beard" and found a "businessman up to his ears in projects," she says. She recalls pushing through a throng of people seeking Mr. Shami's help with "clogged drains, rain damage, medical prescriptions.... All the stuff that a government is supposed to handle, he was doing."

In 2000, Mr. Shami got a visit from Imad Hamzé, a Lebanese-Canadian expert in microfinance who had been commissioned to write a report for the United Nations on credit and poverty reduction. Mr. Shami, he says, outlined ambitious expansion plans, which included a proposed branch in a mostly Christian area.

Mr. Hamzé's report described Mr. Shami's operation as "a very creditable organization" comprising then two groups: the Al-Qard Al-Hassan Association credit agency, and a sister outfit called Yousser for Finance and Investment, which the report says was established in 1990 to "serve entrepreneurs with microenterprises or investment ideas." These two entities, together with an accounting center and research branch, were collectively known as Bayt al-Mal, the report said.

In its September terrorist designation of Mr. Shami, the Treasury Department named both Yousser and Bayt al-Mal as terrorist fronts. They were functioning as Hezbollah's "unofficial treasury, holding and investing its assets and serving as intermediaries between the terrorist group and mainstream banks," said Stuart Levey, undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence, in a statement at the time. Treasury didn't designate Al-Qard Al-Hassan Association as terrorist, but a list of seven locations it gave for Bayt al-Mal matches six of the eight credit-agency branches destroyed by Israel.

Mr. Shami said Yousser closed amid problems with partners, but declined to give details. A senior Lebanese central bank official said he believed Yousser wound down after 2001 because partner banks feared retribution from the U.S. for working with a Hezbollah outfit. Several people who have worked with Yousser say it did handle investments and work with mainstream banks in the 1990s before it shut down.

The owner of a children's-clothing store in the southern port city of Tyre, for example, says he set up his business in 1999 with a loan from Yousser, which he said worked with local banks to provide credit. The Tyre businessman, who identified himself as Abu Ali Hassan, 39, said Yousser also provided him with a checkbook issued by a licensed Lebanese bank but bearing Yousser's name.

When Israeli ground troops attacked Bint Jbeil and other parts of southern Lebanon this summer, they seized documents related to Yousser and Hezbollah's financing. A document written in Arabic bearing Yousser's name in English and seen by The Wall Street Journal was described by an Israeli security expert as a recent receipt for a donation to Hezbollah. Israeli officials say Mr. Shami's branches were targeted in an effort to cripple Hezbollah's finances.

Mr. Shami jokes that he's "flattered" by all the attention but derides what he says is faulty intelligence about his activities. The Treasury declined to detail evidence against Bayt al-Mal and Yousser, saying the information is classified.

13 Acquitted In Attack On U.S. Troops (AP)

AP, December 28, 2006

Thirteen villagers were acquitted Wednesday of attacking U.S. troops with stones and eggs after an errant U.S. Tomahawk missile fell near their village three years ago.

The Turkish court ruled the villagers' actions did not constitute a crime. Defense lawyer Seyhmus Ulek said the incident was "a democratic reaction against American soldiers."

Some 75 villagers from the southeastern town of Sanliurfa hurled eggs and stones at a group of about a dozen U.S. soldiers going to retrieve pieces of Navy-fired missile, which was intended for Iraq but crashed into an empty Turkish field in March 2003.

The villagers broke the windows of four Humvees and injured one soldier, a spokesman for U.S. forces in Turkey said at the time.

The Tomahawk missile was the third U.S.-fired missile to crash into Turkey that week.

Tomahawk missiles are fired from warships and submarines and have a range of nearly 1,000 miles. The soldiers who went to retrieve the missile came from Incirlik Air Force Base, a major base in southern Turkey that had been used by the U.S. to launch operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The United States and Turkey are traditionally close allies and field the two largest armies in the NATO military alliance.

Al Qaeda Threat Chases Tourists From India Sites (WT)

TEL AVIV -- Israeli backpackers in India are heeding a government warning of an al Qaeda terrorist attack over the New Year's holiday on beach resorts and rave parties in the state of Goa.

The two-week-old warning from Israel's Headquarters for the War on Terror has raised concern that al Qaeda wants to repeat the 2002 bombing in the Indonesian resort island of Bali that killed 202 persons, most of them Australian tourists.

It also marked the first time Israel's counterterrorism authorities warned of a "concrete threat" of an al Qaeda attack in India.

"Travelers in Goa are under a severe terror threat of al Qaeda attacks," the agency warned, and recommended staying away from popular sites in Goa frequented by Western tourists.

Every New Year's Day, Goa is flooded with thousands of Israeli tourists attracted by the stunning beaches and electronic-music dance parties. The warning sent hundreds of 20-something Israeli travelers headed south or inland from the villages where they usually can be found.

"Many people in this area have picked up and gone southward," said Manoach Shmeltz, who operates a government-supported backpacker center in Goa. "They are already planning to come back on January 2."

As many as 30,000 Israelis a year obtain entry visas for India, making the country one of the most heavily visited locations for Israeli tourists. With a reputation dating to the 1960s for attracting bohemian travelers, Goa's New Year's Eve raves are a big draw for Israeli backpackers.

Indian defense and police officials rejected the warning.

"We have not received any specific threat or intelligence on such a threat either from New Delhi or any international agency," Goa state police Chief B.S. Brar told Agence France-Presse in the state capital, Panaji. "Goa is one of the safest places in the world."

An official at the Indian Embassy in Tel Aviv declined to comment.

It's not the first time Israel's counterterrorism authority has warned travelers abroad about the locations frequented by large numbers of Israelis. In the past, Israeli tourists have been warned not to go to Egypt's Sinai Peninsula or to tourist spots in Turkey. Both locations are known for attracting droves of Israelis.

In April, the warning proved correct and bombers thought to be linked to al Qaeda detonated explosives at the Sinai town of Dahab, which is popular with Israelis, killing 23 persons, most of them Egyptians.

In November 2002, al Qaeda tried to shoot down an Israeli plane taking off from Nairobi, Kenya.

Sudan Raises Doubts On U.N. Peace Effort (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

Sudan raised new questions Wednesday about its commitment to a U.N. peace effort in the violence-wracked Darfur region as its ambassador ruled out any U.N. peacekeeping troops — an element of the world body's proposal.

The surprise statement came just minutes after the U.N. Security Council announced that it welcomed the Sudanese president's acceptance of the U.N. plan to help end the escalating conflict — a plan that includes deployment of a "hybrid" African Union-United Nations force.

Secretary-General Kofi Annan had told Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir in a letter earlier this month that every effort would be made to find African troops for a hybrid force of 17,300 military personnel and 5,300 police, but if that proved impossible the U.N. would use "a broader pool of troop contributing countries."

But Sudan Ambassador Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem told reporters on Wednesday evening that the hybrid force must be smaller and have no U.N. peacekeepers, only U.N. technical and logistical experts supporting African troops.

"The force is African, the leader is an African," he said. "There is support and logistical support staff by the U.N., wearing their own helmets, but they are not going to engage in peacekeeping activities."

The U.N. is seeking its own force for Darfur because African Union peacekeepers currently in the region have been unable to quell nearly four years of fighting which has killed more than 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million in the region.

Fighting began in February 2003 when rebels from black African tribes took up arms, complaining of discrimination and oppression by Sudan's Arab-dominated government. The government is accused of unleashing Arab tribal militia known as the Janjaweed against civilians in a campaign of murder, rape and arson — a charge the government denies.

The envoy's comments came as a surprise because al-Bashir said in a letter to Annan released Tuesday and discussed by the council on Wednesday that Sudan is ready "to start immediately" to implement two recent agreements that endorsed the three-step U.N. plan to beef up the beleaguered 7,000-strong African Union force in Darfur.

Annan emerged from Wednesday's council meeting telling reporters that "the president has accepted the three-phased approach as a package," and that council members "are encouraged by the positive tone" of al-Bashir's letter.

In a press statement later, the council welcomed al-Bashir's letter in which he reconfirmed his commitment to peace efforts approved in recent international meetings in Ethiopia and Nigeria.

Annan told reporters the first phase of the U.N. package was already being implemented "and we're going to accelerate that — and, of course, that's a way of testing the government's willingness to cooperate."

It would add 105 military officers, 33 U.N. police, 48 international staffers, 36 armored personnel carriers to the African Union force, according to a U.N. report last month.

A second, larger support package would include the deployment of several hundred U.N. military, police and civilian personnel to the African Union mission. The third phase is the deployment of the hybrid force.

Abdalhaleem said that under the Darfur Peace Agreement the government and one rebel group signed in May, a 20,000-strong force from the government and former rebels will be created. That force plus 7,000 troops from the AU will provide "an overwhelming number" that can ensure security, he said.

In Khartoum, the Sudanese government confirmed it was permitting the first U.N. experts to head to Darfur. But the numbers it gave were lower than those mentioned by the U.N.

Sadeq Al-Magli, a Foreign Ministry spokesman, said 18 military experts and 20 policemen would soon head to Al Fasher, capital of North Darfur.

Annan Says Sudan's Overture Could Pave Way For Peacekeepers (NYT)

By Elissa Gootman

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 27 — Secretary General Kofi Annan said Wednesday that the Security Council was "encouraged" that a recent message from the Sudanese government could pave the way for a large-scale peacekeeping operation in the country's war-ravaged Darfur region.

But Mr. Annan noted that some diplomats remained skeptical of Sudan's overtures, and he urged the Security Council to press ahead quickly with its plans to test the government's intentions.

"Obviously, when there have been so many disappointments, it's only natural that there will be some doubts and hesitations, and this is a challenge for the Sudanese government to prove to the international community that it means business," Mr. Annan said. "We are going to press ahead, and I hope this time there will not be disappointments."

Mr. Annan's remarks followed a Security Council briefing at which a top United Nations envoy, Ahmedou Ould-Abdallah, discussed a letter Saturday to Mr. Annan from Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir.

The significance of the letter remains a matter of debate. While it seems to welcome a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force for Darfur, it also suggests that Sudan should have veto power over how the effort is carried out.

Even on Wednesday evening, Sudan's representative at the United Nations, Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem Mohamad, played down the significance of Mr. Bashir's letter, saying that Sudan had agreed not to a "joint force" of peacekeepers but to a "hybrid operation," in which the United Nations would simply provide technical support.

"It is backstopping, logistical, technical support," he said. "It is not a joint force, let there be no confusion of that."

This is not the first time that United Nations officials and diplomats have expressed hope for a peacekeeping effort in Darfur. More than 200,000 people have died in Darfur, many of them from hunger and disease, since the government moved to crush a rebellion there in 2003. More than 2.5 million have been forced from their homes. The Bush administration and others have called the events there genocide.

In November, the Sudanese government agreed in principle to allow a joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping force into Darfur. Since then, there has been disagreement on a range of issues, from the size of the force to who would command it to what kind of uniforms its troops would wear.

Mr. Annan said he believed that some of those issues had been resolved and that most Council members interpreted Mr. Bashir's letter "as a positive indication that we should build on."

"We need to be persistent, we need to be determined, we need to test it and press ahead," Mr. Annan said.

After the meeting, the Council issued a statement describing Mr. Ould-Abdallah's report as "encouraging" and saying it "remains convinced that the continued cooperation between Sudan, the Security Council and the African Union" would "ensure lasting peace and stability in Darfur."

Alejandro D. Wolff, the acting American ambassador to the United Nations, was more circumspect. While Mr. Bashir's letter may turn out to be a "welcome development," he said, "The proof of this will be action on the ground, and whether or not we will actually see a force that can take its place in Darfur to address the humanitarian crisis there and help deal with the fighting."

Atomic Alliance: U.K. Village Is Home To Secretive Agency (WSJ)

By Cassell Bryan-Low And Carrick Mollenkamp

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

Aldermaston Adopts Policy Of Peaceful Coexistence With Weapons Facility

ALDERMASTON, England -- A few years ago, Margaret Dadswell, a 78-year-old retired nurse, had to sign Britain's Official Secrets Act -- a measure that makes it illegal to disclose sensitive national-security information.

The reason: Like several people in this small village, Ms. Dadswell is indirectly linked to the Atomic Weapons Establishment -- Britain's nuclear-weapons agency that, for the most part, peacefully coexists with residents here. Due to the hypersensitivity of its work -- designing and making nuclear weapons -- all AWE employees must sign the official secrets act. And some nonemployees who visit the site, like Ms. Dadswell, who helps AWE coordinate local activities, are asked to do so as well.

In recent weeks, though, the super-secretive agency has given the public a glimpse of what its labs do. AWE's specialists identified polonium 210 as the radioactive poison that killed former Russian intelligence agent Alexander Litvinenko on Nov. 23. Now, AWE's scientists are playing a vital role in Scotland Yard's investigation into the suspected murder by testing for radiation in places that Mr. Litvinenko or his associates went in the weeks before.

DOJ_NMG_0109926

On the day of Mr. Litvinenko's death, for instance, officials from AWE and Scotland Yard set out for the Millennium Hotel in Mayfair where he had met two associates on Nov. 1 -- the date he fell ill. There, AWE discovered extensive evidence of polonium, a naturally occurring element that can be deadly when man-made.

An AWE spokesman confirmed that AWE discovered the polonium, but declined to comment further on the investigation.

Locals here, some of whom blithely refer to the AWE as "The Atomic," have become used to its secretive ways. It is the largest employer in this part of West Berkshire, a district with gently rolling hills about 40 miles southwest of London. According to AWE, the agency contributes about $313 million a year to the local economy. With roughly 4,000 employees and hundreds of contractors, it dwarfs Aldermaston village, which has a population of about 500 and is built around a main street, lined with red-brick cottages, that runs from the Hinds Head pub to the village green.

Some villagers say they are concerned about potential health risks and that it can be disturbing to see convoys of highly guarded vehicles marked with warnings about radioactive materials leave the site. But many locals shrug off concerns with jokes about glowing in the dark. Generally, they claim confidence in the AWE's efforts to monitor the local environment.

Jean Chapman, a retired caterer who lives with her husband near the heavily guarded entrance to AWE, says she frequently sees men in white suits with face masks taking samples of an underground waterway across the street from her house.

John Surridge, a local maker of cricket bats, says water in the stream outside his workshop is tested weekly. And Rob O'Brien, a member of the parish council, which runs village affairs, says that every five years AWE employees bring Geiger counters around town to monitor for radiation.

"They came around and they sort of said, 'Do you mind if we leave this in your garden?' " said Mr. O'Brien. "I said, 'Yeah, no problem.' "

In a 2005 review of defense sites, the U.K. Environmental Agency and other government safety groups found minimal environmental impact from AWE after testing of waterways and food in the area.

For decades after it opened, AWE did almost nothing to ingratiate itself with the local community, keeping to itself behind a metal 10-foot fence topped with barbed wire. "Everybody was aware it was to do with atomic weapons" but not much more than that, says Alan Caiger-Smith, a local potter, who has lived in Aldermaston since 1941.

Locals say the agency has made a greater effort to interact with them over the past five or so years. That was about the same time that a contract to manage the facility on behalf of the Ministry of Defence was awarded in 1999 to a coalition of private and public entities: BNFL Group, Lockheed Martin Corp., the U.S. defense company, and Serco Group PLC. The contract was valued at $3.7 billion.

Over the past few years, the Cedars primary school in Aldermaston has won almost $6,000 in prize money from science competitions sponsored by AWE. It spent it on books, software and a microscope that plugs into a computer, says head teacher Jane O'Halloran.

She adds that a parent who works at AWE acts as a liaison if the school wants to borrow equipment such as light boxes and models of human skeletons. "For a small school like us that's an excellent offer," says Ms. O'Halloran.

Despite the increased involvement, many villagers say they know not to ask too much about what AWE employees -- even their own friends -- do. "It's not a business that people chat about over coffee," says villager Sally-Anne Martin. But AWE's managing director, Don Cook, an American nuclear scientist transferred from Lockheed Martin, is becoming a familiar face around the village.

Ms. Martin hosted a recent meet-and-greet drinks party for Mr. Cook and his wife, Peggy, with about 20 or so villagers. Mr. Cook expressed curiosity about the history of the village and community events, says Ms. Martin. Locals, meanwhile, were keen to ask about the nonresident demonstrators who often appear outside the facility's gates to protest the building of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Cook also attended the village's two largest annual events: the summer vegetable competition and the Nativity play, which is put on by local parishioners in medieval costumes and in medieval English.

Mr. Cook's office referred requests for comment to the AWE press office. A spokeswoman said AWE strives to build a good relationship with the community.

And yet there remain some points of friction as the village and the AWE continue to co-exist. Locals fear that an AWE plan to expand and upgrade buildings on its site will add to traffic. They are lobbying the local council for a relief road that would bypass the village. Residents acknowledge the chances of success, at least in the near term, are slim but want the village to at least win some concessions, such as traffic warning signs outside schools and a cycle path. David Shirt, a villager and chairman of the parish council, is hopeful about the latter request: the AWE also would like to see a bike path so that its employees can cycle to the nearby train station.

Malnutrition Is Cheating Its Survivors, And Africa's Future (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

SHIMIDER, Ethiopia — In this corrugated land of mahogany mountains and tan, parched valleys, it is hard to tell which is the greater scandal: the thousands of children malnutrition kills, or the thousands more it allows to survive.

Malnutrition still kills here, though Ethiopia's infamous famines are in abeyance. In Wag Hamra alone, the northern area that includes Shimider, at least 10,000 children under age 5 died last year, thousands of them from malnutrition-related causes.

Yet almost half of Ethiopia's children are malnourished, and most do not die. Some suffer a different fate. Robbed of vital nutrients as children, they grow up stunted and sickly, weaklings in a land that still runs on manual labor. Some become intellectually stunted adults, shorn of as many as 15 I.Q. points, unable to learn or even to concentrate, inclined to drop out of school early.

There are many children like this in the villages around Shimider. Nearly 6 in 10 are stunted; 10-year-olds can fail to top an adult's belt buckle. They are frequently sick: diarrhea, chronic coughs and worse are standard for toddlers here. Most disquieting, teachers say, many of the 775 children at Shimider Primary are below-average pupils — often well below.

"They fall asleep," said Eteafraw Baro, a third-grade teacher at the school. "Their minds are slow, and they don't grasp what you teach them, and they're always behind in class."

Their hunger is neither a temporary inconvenience nor a quick death sentence. Rather, it is a chronic, lifelong, irreversible handicap that scuttles their futures and cripples Ethiopia's hopes to join the developed world.

"It is a barrier to improving our way of life," said Dr. Girma Akalu, perhaps the nation's leading nutrition expert. Ethiopia's problem is sub-Saharan Africa's curse. Five million African children under age 5 died last year — 40 percent of deaths worldwide — and malnutrition was a major contributor to half of those deaths. Sub-Saharan children under 5 died not only at 22 times the rate of children in wealthy nations, but also at twice the rate for the entire developing world.

But below the Sahara, 33 million more children under 5 are living with malnutrition. In United Nations surveys from 1995 to 2003, nearly half of sub-Saharan children under 5 were stunted or wasted, markers of malnutrition and harbingers of physical and mental problems.

The world mostly mourns the dead, not the survivors. Intellectual stunting is seldom obvious until it is too late.

Bleak as that may sound, the outlook for malnourished children in sub-Saharan Africa is better than in decades, thanks to an awakening to the issue — by selected governments, anyway.

South Africa provides nutrient-fortified flour to 30 million of its 46 million citizens. Nigeria adds vitamin A to flour, cooking oil and sugar. Ethiopia's government hopes to iodize all salt by year's end. United Nations programs now cover three in four sub-Saharan children with twice-a-year doses of vitamin A supplements.

Ethiopia may, in fact, have the most comprehensive program in all Africa — a joint venture with United Nations agencies that regularly screens nearly half of its 14 million children under 5 for health and nutrition problems. Since 2004, the program has delivered vitamin A doses and deworming medicine to 9 in 10 youngsters, vaccinated millions against childhood diseases and delivered fortified food and nutrition education.

Unicef's Ethiopia representative, Bjorn Ljungqvist, said the effort sprang from a disastrous 2003 drought in which global aid agencies fed 13.2 million Ethiopians — the most costly aid undertaking ever in Ethiopia. When the aid effort ended, he said, international donors and government officials decided that "we have to ensure that we don't get into this situation again."

The program may be a model for Africa: similar ones try to improve youngsters' health, but none, Dr. Ljungqvist said, addresses the nutritional deficiencies that leave children with lifelong disabilities. The effort saves 100,000 lives a year, by Unicef estimates. And because it focuses not just on handouts, but on preventive care and nutrition education, the effects could be lasting.

Beyond that, as African nations develop Western-style mass markets, with brand names and national distribution networks, sales of vitamin-fortified foods are slowly becoming common in urban areas, just as in the West decades ago.

But much of the continent has far to go.

Well over half of sub-Saharan children under 5 lack iron, vital to developing nervous systems, the Micronutrient Initiative, a Canadian research organization, reported in 2004. They often have trouble concentrating and coordinating brain signals with movements, like holding a pencil, that are crucial to education.

Another 3.5 million children lack sufficient iodine, which can lower a child's I.Q. by 10 or more points. More than a half million suffer vitamin A deficiency, which cripples young immune systems; merely ensuring adequate vitamin A can lower child mortality by more than one- fifth. Children lacking vitamin B12, regularly measured nowhere in Africa, have impaired cognitive skills and do poorly on tests.

In most foods, these vital nutrients exist in traces — vitamins A and B12, iron, iodine, folic acid. Denied them in the womb and in infancy, children suffer irreversible brain and nervous-system damage, even if they appear well fed.

"Even trained people can't always see them," said Mark Fryars, the director of program services for the Micronutrient Initiative. "You may see a kid whose skin is very pale. You may go into a classroom where a child wanders off, or falls asleep, or doesn't go out to play because he's too tired. Multiply that into whole villages, and that translates into an impact on the society."

In richer parts of the world, nutritional deficiencies are a nonissue. Three percent of American children are malnourished. American flour and cereals have been fortified with vitamins and iron — by law — since the 1930s.

In sub-Saharan Africa, however, lost productivity from vitamin and mineral deficiencies costs nations $2.3 billion a year, Unicef reports, and losses of productivity in Mozambique, Zambia and Malawi exceeded 1 percent of gross domestic product.

Many African children sometimes receive nutrient supplements, courtesy of the World Food Program, Unicef and charities. Still, donors cannot meet the need. In Ethiopia, for example, a venture between the government and United Nations agencies is caring for 20,000 acutely malnourished children at 100 sites.

"But we can count 70,000," said Iqbal Kabir, the chief nutrition expert at Unicef offices in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia's capital. "We can't treat them all."

Shimider is but a hundred or so stone and reed homes, one room each, in a mountain valley in the Amhara region, 250 miles north of Addis Ababa. The slopes here have been intensively farmed for thousands of years, and their soils are exhausted.

Twenty-two years ago, a famine here killed more than one million people. Today, hunger is measured in squandered lives.

Thirty percent of Amhara's children under 5 are stunted, with another 26 percent severely stunted, evidence of lifelong, acute hunger. One in 15 pregnant women experiences night blindness, indicating vitamin A deficiency and a diet devoid of protein and red or yellow fruits and vegetables.

Among both malnourished children and their mothers, the impact of such privation is achingly evident.

One recent Sunday, Tewres Beram, a woman in her early 20s, carried her daughter Mekdes to a free immunization clinic. Mekdes, severely malnourished, sat suckling fruitlessly at her mother's breast. "We don't have enough food," her mother said, "so there's not enough milk to feed her." A year old, Mekdes does not crawl. Her sister, 2, has barely begun to crawl. "Both of them are like little dead bodies," their mother said.

Sirkalem Birhanu, 40, clasps Endalew, age 2 and unable even to hold up his head. "He's always sick," she said. Endalew has company, she said; his 13-year-old brother "is very tiny, and he loses weight."

"And he's always been sick," she added.

And there is Berhane Gebeyew, 36, whose malnourished 18-month-old daughter, Genet, is a lump in her lap, despite receiving six months' worth of fortified food last May from the governments.

Mrs. Gebeyew split the food among Genet and her four siblings, ages 6 to 15. "The other children, when they stare at my eyes, I give it to them," she said.

She and her husband feed their children two daily meals of injera, a spongy flatbread of fermented barley, occasionally with four ounces of bean sauce. When the children attend Shimider Primary, each gets 10 ounces of vitamin-fortified meal mixed with cooking oil. But attendance is spotty, especially when they help harvest crops in November and December.

And by the time children reach school age, much of malnutrition's damage has already been wrought.

Wondewosen Fekadu is the headmaster at Shimider Primary. Mr. Fekadu worked last year in Tseta, a lowland village where families eat better and drink milk. The difference in their students, he said, is striking. "Children there are relatively smarter and more active," he said. "There are students here who are up to fourth grade and they cannot even read and write, even attentively following the classes."

Three of Mrs. Gebeyew's children attend Shimider Primary. Mogus, a 10-year-old third grader, is three and one-half feet tall — wide-eyed, sweet and flummoxed by academics.

"He's on the poor level — very slow," his teacher said. "He doesn't give attention when I'm teaching. He doesn't concentrate." In a classroom of 60 children, Mogus ranks 46th.

Mulu, 13, her ribs prominent through rips in her green school dress, races from home to get to her beloved third-grade class. But Mulu is 47th in a class of 60.

Fifteen-year-old Yirgalem, about two inches taller than Mulu, has a teenager's diffidence toward school. "It's not that tough," he said. His second-grade teachers differ. "When he comes to school, I don't even think his mind is normal," one of his teachers, Amelework Ejigu, said.

There is great promise that this region's future youngsters will not be hobbled by mental disabilities. Virtually all nutritional deficiencies can be easily and cheaply prevented, sometimes for pennies per child, through programs like universal salt iodization, fortification of flour and semiannual doses of vitamins.

Such efforts already are under way in some nations, and they are a foundation of most United Nations children's programs. But in just as many places, they remain a promise.

At Tefera Hailu Memorial Hospital in Sekota, across a mountain from Shimider, the nutrition ward's 10 beds are filled with worried mothers and shrunken babies. Among them are Adna Berhanu and her 5-month-old son, Agnecheu.

Mrs. Berhanu's huge goiter is decorated with blue tribal tattoos. Her skeletal baby is severely iodine deficient, surely impaired for life should he survive.

Although iodine deficiency is endemic in Amhara Province, "I've been here a year, and we have no iodine in this ward," the nurse on duty said. Beyond a blood test to estimate iron content, the attending physician said, no one even analyzes children's nutritional status. Such tests, he said, are luxuries.

"We focus on saving lives; that's our long-term focus," he said. "We can't focus on what happens to them afterward."

Moscow Links Poisoning Inquiry To Yukos Case (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 27 — Russia's Prosecutor General's Office on Wednesday produced a startling new twist in the investigation of the killing of Alexander V. Litvinenko, the former K.G.B. officer who died in London in November of radiation poisoning. It announced that it was investigating the possible involvement of former executives of Yukos Oil, the company dismantled by a prosecutorial assault last year.

In a statement released Wednesday evening, the prosecutor's office said its investigation indicated a link between the poisoning of Mr. Litvinenko and criminal cases under way against Yukos executives. It singled out Leonid B. Nevzlin, a major shareholder and partner of the company's jailed chief executive, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky.

The statement did not elaborate on any evidence that might link Mr. Nevzlin and others to Mr. Litvinenko's death, which was caused by a high dose of a radioactive material, polonium 210.

The accusation nevertheless was an effort on the part of the Russian government to tie Mr. Litvinenko's death to accusations of a convoluted web of economic and other crimes that destroyed Yukos, once Russia's richest company.

The prosecution of Yukos and Mr. Khodorkovsky was widely seen as a Kremlin-led campaign against a company seen as defiant of President Vladimir V. Putin and against a man seen as a potential political threat.

A spokesman for Mr. Nevzlin, a close associate of Mr. Khodorkovsky who is wanted on charges in Russia and lives in self-imposed exile in Israel, dismissed the new accusations as a continuation of that campaign.

"We all know the methods of the K.G.B.," the spokesman, Amir Dan, said in a telephone interview, referring to the defunct Soviet security agency. "The statement is ridiculous. It is not worth any comment."

When Mr. Litvinenko fell ill on Nov. 1, officials in Russia ridiculed the accusations of Russian involvement. But when he died on Nov. 23 from the effects of radioactive poisoning, investigators here agreed to assist British detectives, who visited for several days this month.

The statement from the Prosecutor General's Office said the investigations of Yukos had now been combined with that of Mr. Litvinenko's killing.

"A version is being verified according to which the contractors of these crimes may be one and the same group of people whose names are on the international wanted list" for committing grave crimes, the prosecutors' statement said. It specified Mr. Nevzlin as one of them but did not identify any others.

Mr. Nevzlin has long evaded Russian requests for extradition — a source of diplomatic irritation between Russia and Israel. On Sunday he arrived in the United States on vacation, Mr. Dan said, prompting new demands by the Russians that the Americans arrest him.

A United States government official who has been briefed on the case and spoke on condition of anonymity because of privacy regulations said Mr. Nevzlin arrived at Newark Liberty International Airport in New Jersey on Sunday and was questioned by Customs and Border Protection officers. He had a valid visa and was allowed into the country, the official said. A Justice Department spokesman said the department had no information about Mr. Nevzlin.

The prosecutors' statement said Russia would prepare new requests for extradition, though it did not identify the countries to which the requests would be made.

Mr. Nevzlin's name has surfaced in connection with the Litvinenko case before. He met with Mr. Litvinenko in the weeks before his poisoning, evidently in October. After Mr. Litvinenko's death, Mr. Nevzlin said that Mr. Litvinenko had provided him with a dossier that "shed light on most significant aspects of the Yukos affair."

DOJ_NMG_0109930

The dossier's contents remain unclear, but Mr. Nevzlin said he had provided them to British investigators. It was also unclear how Mr. Litvinenko, who fled Russia in 2000, could have come to possess incriminating information about a case that unfolded after his departure.

In another aspect of the Litvinenko case, investigators in Germany discovered traces of polonium at places visited by Dmitry V. Kovtun, another businessman and former security officer who was one of two Russian businessmen who met Mr. Litvinenko in London on Nov. 1, the day he was evidently poisoned.

The traces found in Germany appeared to have been left in the days before Mr. Kovtun flew from Hamburg to London on that morning.

Prosecutors here say they are investigating Mr. Kovtun's poisoning as an attempted murder committed in conjunction with Mr. Litvinenko's killing. That would suggest that Mr. Kovtun was a victim, not a suspect.

Mr. Kovtun is said to be in a Moscow hospital being monitored for symptoms of radiation poisoning, though his condition and whereabouts are shrouded in mystery. He and the other businessman, Andrei K. Lugovoi, were questioned by Russian and British investigators. Nothing is known of the nature of their responses.

The man at the center of the Yukos affair, Mr. Khodorkovsky, the company's former chairman, has also come under new prosecutorial scrutiny. Convicted last year on charges of fraud and tax evasion that his supporters described as politically motivated, Mr. Khodorkovsky was transferred over the weekend from the remote Siberian prison where he was serving an eight-year sentence to a regional detention center in Chita.

On Wednesday prosecutors preparing new criminal charges against him questioned him and his jailed business partner, Platon A. Lebedev, Mr. Khodorkovsky's lawyer said in a statement. The lawyer, Yuri M. Schmidt, said investigators accused his client of laundering money by making contributions to Open Russia, a social and educational charity Mr. Khodorkovsky founded. The authorities have since closed the charity.

Mr. Schmidt said the timing of the new questioning amounted to "moral and physical pressure" on his client, whose current sentence does not end until 2012.

Moscow Trying To Kill Investigation By Targeting Nevzlin: Litvinenko Friend (AFP)

AFP, December 28, 2006

Russian allegations against the main shareholder in oil giant Yukos that he is connected to the poisoning of ex-spy Alexander Litvinenko are an attempt to deflect responsibility from the true perpetrators, a friend of the dead spy told AFP.

"It's total nonsense... accusing (Leonid) Nevzlin, The Kremlin is just trying to cover up," said Alex Goldfarb, who was also Litvinenko's former spokesman, speaking by telephone from New York.

The Russian public prosecutor's office said on Wednesday that it had information which might help clear up Litvinenko's murder involving Nevzlin, a former close associate of jailed Yukos chief Mikhail Khodorkovsky.

"All evidence seems to show that the two Russians (Andrei Lugovoi and Dmitri Kovtun, who met with Litvinenko on the day he fell ill) are responsible" for the former spy's poisoning, Goldfarb said.

The accusation "just raises the suspicion that the government is trying to hide its responsibility," he added.

Nevzlin and billionaire Russian businessman Boris Berezovsky, the former exiled in Israel, the latter in London, "are the two person that can stand up to Russia, they have the money," Goldfarb said.

Nevzlin was one of the closest associates of Khodorkovsky, who is serving an eight-year prison sentence for tax evasion, a conviction largely suspected to have been politically engineered by the Kremlin.

Goldfarb said he was not close to Nevzlin.

Litvinenko, a former member of the Russian secret services and a fierce critic of the Russian government from his exiled home in London, died on November 23, three weeks after he felt the first symptoms of poisoning by the radioactive substance polonium-210.

Russia Probes Ex-Yukos Owner In Spy Case (AP)

By Henry Meyer, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 28, 2006

Russian prosecutors said Wednesday they are investigating the possible role of a former owner of the Yukos oil company in the radiation poisoning death of one-time Russian intelligence agent Alexander Litvinenko.

They did not explain the basis for the allegations against Leonid Nevzlin, who now lives in exile in Israel.

Russia has unsuccessfully pressed for the extradition of a number of Kremlin critics in recent years, including Nevzlin and tycoon Boris Berezovsky, who lives in Britain.

Amir Dan, a spokesman for Nevzlin, dismissed the prosecutors' allegations.

"We all know the ways of the KGB and the Russian government, and these claims are ridiculous and are not worthy of comment," he told The Associated Press.

Alex Goldfarb, a friend of Litvinenko's active in London's community of Russian expatriates and Kremlin critics, called the charges against Nevzlin a "clumsy effort" by Moscow to shift blame from itself.

"This is sheer nonsense," he told the AP. "Everybody knows that all evidence points to Russia. The way the Russian government, the Russian prosecutors are handling it is only adding to that suspicion that it is the Russian government behind this."

Litvinenko died in London on Nov. 23 after he was exposed to a rare radioactive element, polonium-210. In a deathbed statement, he accused President Vladimir Putin of ordering his murder, allegations which the Kremlin has dismissed.

Nevzlin fled Russia after authorities launched a criminal investigation against Yukos, once Russia's top oil producer, in 2003.

Nevzlin told the AP last month that Litvinenko had given him a document related to Yukos. He said he believed the poisoning death was tied to Litvinenko's investigations of the Russian government's dismantling of the company.

On Wednesday, the Prosecutor General's office said Nevzlin and other Yukos figures wanted by Russia could have ordered Litvinenko's killing as well as the poisoning of another former agent, Dmitry Kovtun.

"We are checking the possibility that these crimes could have been ordered and organized by the same group of people who are wanted internationally, one of whom is Leonid Nevzlin," prosecutor's spokeswoman Marina Gridneva said on state television.

The statement said prosecutors had formed a special investigative unit and were preparing to file international requests for assistance in the case and possible extradition demands.

Britain sent Scotland Yard detectives to Moscow this month to interview witnesses but they were allowed only to sit in on questioning by Russian prosecutors.

Russia also launched its own investigation, seen as a bid to keep control of the politically explosive case, which has threatened to drive relations between Britain and Russia to post-Cold War lows.

Meanwhile, Russian authorities on Wednesday questioned the imprisoned Mikhail Khodorkovsky, the former chief executive of Yukos oil, as a suspect in a new criminal inquiry, his lawyer said.

Yuri Schmidt said Khodorkovsky was questioned on suspicion of involvement in money-laundering — allegations the lawyer dismissed as politically motivated.

Khodorkovsky, once Russia's richest man, is currently serving an eight-year sentence on fraud and tax evasion charges in a prison in eastern Siberia.

"The new case is a continuation of selective justice aimed at applying moral and physical pressure on Mikhail Khodorkovsky, further destruction of Yukos and the confiscation of assets," said Yuri Schmidt, Khodorkovsky's lawyer, in a statement posted on a Web site for the tycoon's supporters.

Nevzlin, who according to Forbes magazine had a net worth of about $2 billion before Yukos' collapse, has been charged by Russia with ordering the 2002 murder of a married couple.

A former Yukos security officer has been jailed since mid-2003 in the case, which was allegedly business-related.

Litvinenko fell ill after meeting with Russian businessman Kovtun, Andrei Lugovoi, also an ex-Soviet agent, and Vyacheslav Sokolenko, head of a private Russian security firm, at a bar at the Millennium Hotel in London.

All three men have denied involvement in the former spy's death. Kovtun himself has been contaminated with radiation and is undergoing treatment at a Moscow hospital.

The unexplained murder has inspired widespread speculation about who may have been behind it.

Many Western analysts suspect the Kremlin, though there is no evidence that the Russian government was involved.

Pro-Kremlin lawmakers have suggested — also without offering evidence — that Berezovsky was responsible, as part of a plan to blacken the reputation of Putin and the Kremlin.

Mario Scaramella, an Italian who also met with Litvinenko the day he fell ill, is seeking release from prison, his lawyer said Wednesday. His arrest is not believed to be directly connected to Litvinenko's murder.

Scaramella was questioned for about six hours by Italian prosecutors in a Rome jail, where he is being detained.

His lawyer, Sergio Rastrelli, said his client is accused of slander. Scaramella's father and Italian news reports say the suspect was accused of international arms trafficking.

"We intend to seek his immediate release from prison," Rastrelli told reporters. "My client will respond to all questions and will clarify any ... misunderstanding."

Russians Open New Probe Of Oil Baron (WP)

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 27 -- Imprisoned Russian oil tycoon Mikhail Khodorkovsky is a suspect in a new money-laundering investigation, raising the possibility that the Kremlin foe, already serving an eight-year sentence for tax evasion and fraud, could spend many more years in prison, his attorney said Wednesday.

Khodorkovsky, his imprisoned partner Platon Lebedev, also a suspect, and their attorneys were summoned to a detention facility in the remote Siberian city of Chita to undergo questioning Wednesday. Both Khodorkovsky, founder of Yukos Oil Co., and Lebedev refused to answer questions, their attorneys said, rejecting the case as the continuation of a government vendetta that landed them in prison in the first place.

"A new case is the logical continuation of the selective justice aimed at putting moral and physical pressure on Mikhail Khodorkovsky, further destruction of Yukos and seizing its property," Khodorkovsky attorney Yuri Schmidt said in a statement.

"Because of the lack of any independent investigation and the direct link of investigators and the head of the group to the Kremlin administration, Mikhail Khodorkovsky demanded that the entire investigation group be removed." He is serving his sentence in an isolated Siberian camp 3,000 miles from Moscow.

Prosecutors provided no details about the probe. But Russian press reports said the case relates to the alleged sale of oil at below-market prices between subsidiaries of Yukos between 2000 and 2003. Prosecutors apparently allege that billions of dollars in undeclared profits were shifted to offshore accounts before being redistributed to other parties.

Among the suspected recipients of some of the money is Khodorkovsky's now-defunct foundation, Open Russia, which spent millions of dollars on programs aimed at strengthening democracy and education in Russia. Critics of Khodorkovsky's prosecution say he was targeted because his political activity, particularly his ability to fund opposition activity, was seen as a threat to the rule of President Vladimir Putin.

The Kremlin and prosecutors here say they reined in a rogue oligarch who defrauded the state.

Russian authorities have driven Yukos into bankruptcy, stripping it of its prime assets, pursuing remaining assets held abroad and launching investigations against company officers, including foreign executives.

In Moscow on Wednesday, prosecutors said they were investigating former Yukos shareholder and Khodorkovsky partner Leonid Nevzlin for possible involvement in the Nov. 23 poisoning death in London of former Russian intelligence agent Alexander Litvinenko, the Associated Press reported. A spokesman for Nevzlin, who lives in exile in Israel, called the probe "ridiculous."

Two years ago, the state oil company Rosneft, which is chaired by a senior Kremlin official, acquired 76.79 percent of Yukos's largest production unit for $9.3 billion after a murky government-run auction in which the unit was initially purchased by a front company.

The Yuganskneftegaz unit was pumping 1 million barrels of oil a day at the time of the sale and now accounts for 60 to 70 percent of Rosneft's oil production. Rosneft was valued at more than $70 billion when it sold a 14.8 percent stake in the company in an initial public offering in July in London. Yukos continues to fight the sale of Yuganskneftegaz in Russian courts.

Yukos's Russian assets are under the control of a Moscow court, and its foreign assets are held by a Dutch foundation, which is planning to sell them to pay off creditors, including Group Menatep, the largest. In the Dutch courts, the Russian authorities unsuccessfully fought the planned sale of Yukos assets, including a refinery in Lithuania.

If Menatep is paid an estimated $800 million in debts, Khodorkovsky and other shareholders would be left with a significant nest egg, something Russian officials appear determined to prevent.

Gazprom Warns Of Wider Cutoffs If Belarus Interferes With Gas (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, December 28, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 27 — Gazprom, the Russian energy monopoly, reacted fiercely on Wednesday to a suggestion from Belarus that it would pull natural gas out of export pipelines rather than pay a higher price for the fuel.

Reversing course from its assurances of Tuesday, Gazprom warned Poland, Lithuania and Germany of possible supply disruptions. About 8 percent of the European Union's gas imports pass through Belarus.

The country, whose alliance with Russia has turned rocky, both imports natural gas for domestic consumption and transships fuel to markets farther to the West. Its president, Aleksandr G. Lukashenko, is often referred to as Europe's last dictator.

"We are interdependent," the deputy prime minister of Belarus, Vladimir I. Semashko, said of the two countries' energy ties in remarks Wednesday on Russian state television. "If I don't have a domestic gas supply contract, Gazprom won't have a transit deal."

DOJ_NMG_0109933

Mr. Semashko brushed aside Gazprom's threat to halt supplies for the domestic market in Belarus. "Gazprom will not reduce the amount of supplies," he predicted. "With Ukraine there was an attempt like this. After two days, everything fell back into place."

He was referring to the showdown at the beginning of the year when a price dispute between Ukraine and Russia and a two-day embargo caused jitters across Europe, which relies on Russian gas, especially in the winter.

Gazprom's chief executive, Aleksei B. Miller, responded by issuing a deadline to shut off the gas. "If a contract for supply next year is not concluded, Gazprom will have no basis to supply gas after 10 a.m. on Jan. 1, 2007," he said in televised remarks. He also suggested that Russia should impose export duties on sales to Belarus, raising the price to $260 per 1,000 cubic meters.

Earlier, Gazprom had offered Belarus gas for $105 for the same volume, a combination of cash and equity in a key export pipeline.

"You shouldn't expect New Year's presents from Gazprom," the company's spokesman, Sergei V. Kupriyanov, said after the Belarussian implied threat of disrupting Gazprom's exports to Europe, the source of most of the corporation's income. "Gazprom is not Santa Claus."

As in the dispute with Ukraine, the bargaining has become a test of Belarus's leverage as a transit country for Russian energy and its willingness to risk the energy supplies of its neighbors farther down the pipelines.

"Each of the former republics has a different set of circumstances in terms of what leverage the Russians have, and what relations these countries have with their neighbors," Jérôme Guillet, a Paris-based banker and an authority on Gazprom's business practices, said in a telephone interview.

Ukraine, for example, will pay $135 per 1,000 cubic meters next year. By contrast, Georgia, led by a pro-Western government, will pay $235. Belarus currently pays $46.68 per 1,000 cubic meters, the lowest price in the former Soviet Union outside of Russia itself.

About 20 percent of Gazprom's exports to Europe pass through Belarus, and 80 percent via Ukraine. The 25 countries in the European Union, taken together, import 40 percent of their gas from Russia. Gazprom said its average price in Western Europe in the first half of 2006 was $265.

Mr. Kupriyanov of Gazprom said Wednesday that Belarus wanted to pay just $75 per 1,000 cubic meters and asked that Gazprom front the entire $2.5 billion for a 50 percent share in the pipeline company, Beltransgaz. That proposal is "very unlikely" to satisfy Gazprom, he said.

Gazprom Readies To Halt Delivery Of Gas To Belarus (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2006

MOSCOW -- Russian state gas monopoly OAO Gazprom will halt supplies to Belarus on Jan. 1 if no new contract is signed and has warned European countries of potential problems with deliveries via Belarus, the Interfax news agency quoted the company's chief as saying Wednesday.

Gazprom, which is demanding Belarus pay more than twice the current price for gas next year and hand over a 50% stake in its gas distribution system, refused to back down after Minsk threatened to siphon off Russian natural gas bound for Europe in the event of a suspension of supplies to Belarus.

"If a gas supply contract for next year is not reached, Gazprom will have no grounds for deliveries of gas to Belarus as of 10 a.m. Moscow time on Jan. 1, 2007," Gazprom Chief Executive Alexei Miller said in televised comments.

Mr. Miller said that Gazprom would supply gas for European consumers to the Russia-Belarus border "in full volume and in full compliance with its contracts," but a Belarusian official hinted earlier that Belarus could hinder supplies to Europe across its territory if Gazprom suspends deliveries meant for Belarus.

Mr. Miller said Gazprom has sent letters to Germany, Poland and Lithuania informing them "of possible problems in the transit of gas through Belarus," according to the ITAR-Tass news agency. About 30% of Russian gas supplies to Europe go through Belarus.

Gazprom will also ask the government to introduce export duty on its supplies of gas to Belarus, the news agency Prime-Tass reported Mr. Miller as saying Wednesday. He said the Russian government was losing $1.3 billion a year by not levying export duty on supplies to Belarus.

If adopted, the measure would mimic one taken two weeks ago by the Russian government to start applying export duties on deliveries of crude oil to Belarus.

The two sides remain at variance over the price of Gazprom's deliveries. Gazprom wants $200 per 1,000 cubic meters, or an equivalent deal that would combine a smaller cash payment and up to 50% of pipeline operator Beltransgaz. That would represent a quadrupling of the price Belarus paid this year.

The Belarusian government says it can't afford the increase, which would bring its gas price into line with other Gazprom customers in central Europe. Belarus will buy around 20 billion cubic meters of gas this year from Gazprom.

Belarusian Deputy Prime Minister Vladimir Semashko was reported by local media Wednesday as saying that, in the absence of a new deal, Belarus would assume that the old contractual terms for 2006 remain in place. A Gazprom spokesman said this was tantamount to a declaration of intent to steal transit gas, Prime-Tass reported.

Gazprom Price Row Threat To European Gas (FT)

By Arkady Ostrovsky

Financial Times, December 28, 2006

Gazprom, Russia's state-controlled gas giant, on Wednesday warned that its spiralling price dispute with Belarus could disrupt supplies to Poland, Germany and Lithuania following an implicit threat by Belarus to stop the transit of Russian gas.

Gazprom and Belarus exchanged strongly-worded threats on Wednesday which echoed Russia's stand-off with Ukraine a year ago when Moscow turned off gas supplies to Kiev, interrupting transit to Europe.

Gazprom said that unless a new deal is signed in the next four days it will turn off gas supplies to Belarus from January 1, while Belarus said it would stop the transit of Russian gas to Europe. Analysts said Gazprom's reputation could suffer further from the dispute.

"We are inter-dependent. If I don't have a domestic gas supply contract, Gazprom won't have a transit deal," said Vladimir Semashko, deputy prime-minister of Belarus.

Gazprom admitted it would not be able to fully compensate its European customers if Belarus started siphoning off gas from the pipeline, which transports 20 per cent of its gas to Europe.

Alexei Miller, Gazprom's chief executive, told Russia's state television channel: "Gazprom has today sent letters to its partners in Lithuania, Poland and Germany about the gas supply situation occurring with Belarus."

Belarus currently pays Russia just $46 per thousand cubic meters of its gas – the same as Russian domestic customers and five times lower than European levels.

Gazprom initially threatened to raise prices for Belarus to $200, wiping out a multi-billion subsidy that helps sustain Alexander Lukashenko, its authoritarian leader, in power.

However, Gazprom subsequently agreed to drop its price to $105 per thousand cubic meters, with a caveat that Belarus pays $75 in cash and the rest in shares of Beltransgaz, the country's gas pipeline and distribution network.

Belarus accepted the price of $75 per thousand cubic meters and reluctantly agreed to sell 50 per cent of Beltransgaz to Gazprom. But it wants Gazprom to pay up front $2.5bn for its stake in Beltransgaz.

Gazprom says it is "no Santa Clause" and would not make any more concessions. But the Russian company is in a difficult position, partly induced by its own policies towards Ukraine and other former Soviet republics over the past year.

If Gazprom turns off gas supplies to Belarus, disrupting supplies to Europe, its reputation for unreliability would suffer further. If it caves in to Belarus's demands, however, it would lose face at home, while also displaying a selective approach to different political regimes in the former Soviet Union.

Russia has been blamed for using gas pipelines as a weapon against west-leaning Ukraine and Georgia. In contrast to both those countries, Belarus has no ambition to join NATO or the European Union. But while Mr Lukashenko has been labelled "Europe's last dictator" by the US and is widely considered a pariah in Europe, he ahs adopted a tough line in gas negotiations with Russia, giving Gazprom a taste of its own medicine.

While Mr Lukashenko has little to lose in terms of his reputation, "the damage caused to Gazprom's status as a reliable gas supplier may theoretically be greater than last time round [with Ukraine]," Deutsche UFG, a Russian arm of Deutsche Bank, said on Wednesday.

Gazprom said it would deliver all contracted gas to the Russian border with Belarus, which could allow it to shift any blame for disruption onto Belarus. But "this would unlikely be of comfort to European consumers, who may miss 1/5 of their Russian gas imports," Deutsche UFG said.

U.S. Ups Port-security Exchanges (WT)

By Richard Halloran

The Washington Times, December 28, 2006

HONOLULU -- The U.S. Coast Guard is quietly expanding exchanges with Chinese maritime-security agencies in a move that reflects the boom in seaborne trade between the two countries.

Chinese law-enforcement officers ride Coast Guard cutters patrolling North Pacific fishing areas. Chinese and American officers scrutinize port security on each other's coasts. Chinese take part in joint training drills.

DOJ_NMG_0109935

Chinese, along with Canadians, Japanese, South Koreans, Russians and Americans, attend an annual North Pacific Coast Guard Forum in Alaska.

And the Coast Guard has posted a Chinese-speaking officer, Capt. Barney Moreland, to the U.S. Embassy in Beijing to liaise with Chinese officials, including those dealing with port security.

Coast Guard officials think the cooperation is justified by growing trade links in spite of often uneasy political relations between the United States and China. Most of the $207 billion worth of Chinese exports to the United States in the first nine months of 2006 moved by ship.

"We put politics aside to focus on the mission," said Rear Adm. Sally Brice-O'Hara, who commands Coast Guard ships and sailors from Hawaii west to the shores of Asia.

The exchanges also are part of a broader U.S. effort to rebuild military exchanges with China, which lapsed after Chinese authorities crushed a pro-democracy movement at Tiananmen Square in 1989 and a Chinese fighter plane collided with a U.S. reconnaissance plane off Hainan Island in 2001.

Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates indicated to the Senate Armed Services Committee ahead of his confirmation that he would continue those exchanges. "I believe that expanded military exchanges with China can be valuable, but should be based on China's willingness to reciprocate."

The reasons for the exchanges are several. At the workaday level, the two sides exchange information on "best practices," on how well things are done, said Adm. Brice-O'Hara.

Strategically, the Pacific Command seeks to reassure the Chinese, who are suspicious of foreign powers, that the United States is not planning to attack. Conversely, the United States seeks to deter the Chinese from miscalculating and planning a war with the United States.

Down at deck level, the Coast Guard Cutter Rush called at the Chinese port of Qingdao recently to pick up an official of the Fisheries Law Enforcement Commission, Tan Lizhou.

He came aboard to work with the crew as they checked on whether fishing boats in the North Pacific were operating in accord with international agreements intended to conserve dwindling stocks of fish there.

"We made him part of the crew," said Capt. Dana Ware, then the skipper of the ship. He assigned Mr. Tan the rank of lieutenant commander, which made him relatively senior among the ship's 20 officers.

Mr. Tan mustered to quarters, ate with the officers in the wardroom where he didn't much care for American food, and had computer connections with his home base in China.

Mr. Tan's main duty, however, was to communicate by radio with Chinese fishing vessels that Capt. Ware thought should be inspected, then to go with the boarding party to verify the vessel's registration, equipment records and catch log.

"We let him do most of the talking," Capt. Ware said, noting that Mr. Tan's English got better as time passed so that he could explain more to his American hosts.

An e-mail to Mr. Tan asking whether his voyage on the Rush had been worthwhile and served the purposes of his government went unanswered.

Ashore, port security has taken high priority since the September 11 attacks in New York and Washington. The possibility that a terrorist could hide a bomb in a shipment of Chinese exports to the U.S. causes anxiety -- as does a shipment of imports into China from anywhere.

Thus, says Adm. Brice-O'Hara, "We want to see their port-security standards. And the Chinese come look at our ports so that we can share best practices."

For Eco-Entrepreneurs In China, No Simple Way To Grow A Business (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

SHANGHAI -- Except for its paint job, green to symbolize environmental friendliness, the bus looked ordinary enough as it bumped along a suburban Shanghai street late one recent morning. But it was strangely quiet. Only a distant hum accompanied the rattles and passengers' conversations.

The hum came from a hydrogen fuel cell providing clean, renewable energy to the demonstration vehicle, manufactured by Shen-Li High Tech Co. Ltd., a private Shanghai company that set out to make its fortune from hydrogen power for buses, taxis and generators in the giant Chinese market.

Shen-Li, launched here by a Clemson University-trained engineer, Hu Liqing, found encouragement in a campaign by the Chinese Communist Party to promote bold departures such as hydrogen power.

Party leaders have decided that the Chinese people, steeped in tradition and educated to obey party directives, must learn to initiate and innovate, because the future of the Chinese economy depends on it.

DOJ_NMG_0109936

Most of China's current economic boom has come from young men and women working for low wages in factories that use technology and product designs from abroad. As the economy matures, China's government has warned, it must rely increasingly on new technology invented by the Chinese themselves, who are being urged to turn assembly plants into laboratories blooming with a hundred flowers of new ideas.

"We must speed up the construction of an innovative nation," the Communist Party's Central Committee declared after a Dec. 5-7 meeting.

But the experiences of Shen-Li and other companies with ambitions to market hydrogen power suggest that China's one-party system and pervasive controls hamper innovation in many fields, from arts to sciences. In a nation where the party retains a monopoly on power -- economic and otherwise -- bursting from the official mold with a new idea and bringing it to market is never easy.

Although the need for pollution-free vehicles and renewable energy is clear in China's increasingly choked cities, the future of hydrogen power has remained in the grasp of a powerful officialdom that decides on budget allocations. The government's senior levels repeatedly have endorsed alternative forms of energy but have yet to take decisive steps toward getting hydrogen-powered vehicles onto the streets.

The Shanghai municipal government and party apparatus, proud of a can-do attitude that helped make their city China's most prosperous, promised big-time investment in a hydrogen-powered bus and taxi fleet. But the local leadership went down in a corruption scandal in September, raising doubts about their plans.

"In China, it all depends on the government," said Mao Zongqiang, one of the country's leading experts on hydrogen and other alternative fuels at Tsinghua University's Nuclear and New Energy Institute.

Hu Liqing, 43, made hydrogen power his mission years ago, even before the Communist Party struck up its innovation theme. After postdoctoral studies at Clemson and two years working in Vancouver, B.C., he returned and founded Shen-Li in 1998 with the idea of attacking the pollution in his native China and making money as well.

"We are trying to do something good for human beings," he said in an interview at his factory in Shanghai's suburban Longyang Industrial Garden. "Even in Canada, we are losing paradise. Of course, Chinese people face an even more serious situation, and so that's why I came back and tried to get people to focus on the future."

Hydrogen cell power is under development at major automobile companies around the world. Shen-Li has put together its version by drawing on foreign parts and know-how and its own research. It hopes to make its mark by finding a way to economically mass-produce the propulsion systems.

The beauty of hydrogen power, Hu said, is that a simple chemical reaction in the fuel cell combines hydrogen and oxygen to make water, producing electric current to power a vehicle, with water the only emission. Moreover, he noted, there are potentially boundless supplies of hydrogen and oxygen, unlike petroleum.

The problem is that producing, storing and distributing the hydrogen costs money and requires an infrastructure of filling stations that does not exist, he acknowledged. In addition, the price of manufacturing a hydrogen-powered vehicle exceeds that of producing a traditional gasoline-powered one.

Until recently, that problem looked like it was on the way to being addressed. The activist Communist Party secretary for Shanghai, Chen Liangyu, and the Shanghai mayor, Han Zhen, visited Shen-Li in July and told Hu they were serious about his technology.

The city government had put up about $200 million for hydrogen cell research and development, some of which kept Shen-Li and its 150 employees going. Shanghai officials announced a plan to put 1,000 hydrogen-powered vehicles on the streets here by 2010 and 10,000 by 2015. After that, mass production would be on the horizon, they suggested, and Shanghai would be at the forefront of the world's search for affordable, environment-friendly transportation.

Under the plan, the state-owned Shanghai Automotive Industry Corp. would produce a good share of the cars, and a company in nearby Suzhou would produce the buses. Some officials suggested General Motors Corp. would get a part of the deal as well. But that would still leave a lot of business for Shen-Li.

"In Shanghai, I am very lucky," he said then. "The politicians want to make an investment in the future."

But party secretary Chen was implicated in a pension fund scandal and removed from power three months later. Shanghai officials and business leaders waited for Chen's replacement, wondering whether he would be as enthusiastic about hydrogen-powered vehicles.

Eminent Chinese scientists with connections to the government then warned Beijing that hydrogen fuel-cell technology may not be advanced enough to warrant large-scale investment. As a result, official enthusiasm cooled.

Lower-level Shanghai officials say they remain interested, but in the meantime they've shrunk their ambitions. A new plan recently announced called for only 100 environmentally friendly vehicles of all kinds on the streets by 2008, 1,000 by approximately 2012 and the capability to mass-produce them -- but no commitment to do so -- by 2015. No money has been allocated.

"It's not a very good sign for us," said Shi Tao, who manages administration and outside relations at Shen-Li. "We are a little frustrated."

A subsidiary of Fosun Pharmaceutical Corp., meanwhile, purchased a 36 percent share of Shen-Li late last summer. Since then, Shi said, the company has focused on electricity generators, which offer hope for more immediate sales in China and abroad. Private venture capital for an iffy project like hydrogen vehicles is hard to come by in China, he explained.

From the headquarters of his Fuyuan Century Fuel Cell Power Co. Ltd. in suburban Beijing, Zhong Jialun has watched the ups and downs of hydrogen power plans in China with a practiced eye. Zhong, 63, has seen many things come and go in his time, and now he has put his money on hydrogen power.

"I've always been an optimistic guy," he said. "Everybody says China is the world's factory. But it's just a factory. We haven't mastered the key technologies. But we aren't going to allow things to stay that way. I agree with the government. We must have our own innovative technology. We can't just sell cheap labor."

Born into a prominent family of Red Army officers, Zhong commanded a submarine in the early days of the Chinese navy. During the Cultural Revolution of 1966 to 1976, he said, he ran into trouble with the authorities by pointing out that the upheavals of the times were a poor mix with the exacting standards of submarine technology. He was sentenced to death. His sentence was reduced to life in prison, then to 25 years. He served five years until the military brought an end to the Cultural Revolution.

After prison, Zhong found his way into business, following the advice of China's leader of the time, Deng Xiaoping. He went into metals, then restaurants and clothing. Another death sentence, for alleged corruption, was repealed. By the end of the 1980s, he was in the innovation business.

At Fuyuan Century Fuel Cell, he hired a research staff to find a way to make membranes, which are the key and most expensive element in hydrogen fuel cells. The U.S. company DuPont dominates the market for these components.

A Canadian-based Chinese scientist joined the team in 1999 and, in 2000, the company succeeded in making its own membrane, Zhong said, using a manufacturing process that is different from DuPont's. "The next step was to turn it into a product we could sell, to make money," he added.

The Beijing city government's plans for the 2008 Summer Olympics seemed to offer promise. Municipal authorities acquired three hydrogen-powered demonstration buses, assigning them to run a 12-mile route from the Summer Palace to the Wudaokou university district. Eager to show environmental credentials, it also has encouraged the building of two hydrogen filling stations, one of which produces its own hydrogen.

But the buses were bought from DaimlerChrysler. Zhong and his 60 workers have yet to get the orders they need to move their technology into production. While the government reevaluates, officials said, there are no plans for large-scale fuel-cell production in the capital.

Annan And The U.N.'s Limits (WP)

By William Shawcross

The Washington Post, December 28, 2006

Kofi Annan deserves a good sendoff. For 10 years he has persevered with unfailing grace in what really is "a job from hell."

I am biased -- I've admired Annan since the early 1990s, some years before he became secretary general of the United Nations. Like the U.S. government, I welcomed his replacing Boutros Boutros-Ghali in 1996. Annan had been the one U.N. official brave enough to give Washington the green light to bomb the Serbs to the negotiating table in the summer of 1995. His intervention then was crucial.

It is easy to forget now that Annan's first five-year term was widely seen as a great success. He presented a wise, compassionate approach and a breath of fresh air. He also showed unprecedented honesty -- commissioning independent inquiries into the disasters of Rwanda and Srebrenica and accepting all criticism from them, including criticism of himself.

Kofi Annan was (and is) pro-American, and he mended the United Nations' relations with Congress. He persuaded international businesses to help promote development. He concentrated much attention on the ravages of HIV-AIDS.

Not surprisingly, he was reelected by acclamation in the middle of 2001. But then Sept. 11 changed everything. As Annan himself said, the world entered the 21st century through a gate of fire. That fire still rages, especially in Iraq and other countries in the Middle East.

Unlike Annan, I was and remain in favor of the decision to remove Saddam Hussein from power in Iraq. But the Security Council was and remains divided on the whole Iraq issue. The United Nations being what it is, no secretary general could have ignored that division.

Tragically for Annan and the United Nations, more than 20 of his best people were brutally murdered in Baghdad by al-Qaeda in August 2003. This assault, together with the political divisions, have crippled the United Nations in Iraq ever since. But Annan insisted that the United Nations help stage the successful January 2005 election in which so many millions of Iraqis voted freely for the first time in their lives.

The U.N. role in Iraq has been further complicated, if not diminished, by the oil-for-food scandal. This was indeed a disaster; the secretariat was incompetent, a few officials behaved corruptly and the perversion of the program by Saddam Hussein (as Charles Duelfer showed in his magisterial Iraq Survey Group report) enabled the dictator to prop up the Iraqi economy in the last years of his misrule.

But it is wrong to blame all this on Annan -- members of the Security Council, particularly France, Russia and China, were all busily corrupting the program for their own ends. Even the United States and Britain turned a blind eye to sanctions-busting when it helped their ally Jordan.

Annan tried hard to reform the U.N. system. He has had less success than he'd hoped. In the spring he devised a complicated reform plan that, though supported by John Bolton, then the U.S. ambassador, and agreed on by the Security Council, was scuttled at the last minute by the "Group of 77" developing states. To put it crudely, too many ambassadors and their presidents were frightened of losing too many jobs for their "nieces" in the cozy U.N. system. Annan was deeply disappointed. Blame the members, not him.

Annan has worked endlessly on myriad, often unseen problems. Traveling with him to countries around the world, I was astonished at the number of international calls he had to take daily from leaders begging for help in settling disputes. He dealt with such requests in a calm and conscientious manner that inspired confidence and conciliation.

Darfur has been an agony for Annan the past two years. I was with him in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, in November; at a meeting of the Security Council's "permanent five," he was desperate to get agreement to send a U.N. peacekeeping force into Darfur to stem the mass murders and ethnic cleansing promoted by the Sudanese government.

After a long day of negotiations, hopes rose that Sudan had finally agreed to Annan's plan, but it was a trick: Soon after the meeting, Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, announced that he would allow no such thing.

The bottom line is that, like Slobodan Milosevic, Saddam Hussein and all too many other leaders of member states, Bashir is a gangster and a murderer. It is not Annan's fault that the world has failed to confront Bashir effectively -- the truth is that he has far too much support, tacit if not overt, among African, Arab and other governments. It's the same with Robert Mugabe in Zimbabwe and other despots.

Millions of people around the world place hope in the United Nations. It all too often disappoints. It does do vital things, but there is much it cannot do, and it is stuffed with cronyism and hypocrisy. It reflects the horrors of the world, as well as trying to keep those horrors at bay. Annan has dealt with such problems with more skill, patience and decency than any recent secretary general. If he was unable to create the decent, reformed, efficient and humane organization he sought, that is because far too few of its members want any such thing.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Holiday Publishing Notice. In observance of the federal New Year's Day holiday, the Attorney General's News Briefing will not be published on Monday, January 1. News from the holiday will be included in your Tuesday, January 2, briefing.

Five New York Terror Convicts Moved To Indiana Prison. The Buffalo News (12/29, Herbeck) reports, "Five of the six members of the Lackawanna Six have been transferred to a federal prison in Indiana, and their families are trying to find out why." The News continues, "Their attorneys confirmed Wednesday that Shafal A. Mosed, 28; Mukhtar al-Bakri, 26; Yasein A. Taher, 29; Faysal H. Galab, 30; and Sahim Alwan, 34; were all recently moved to the Federal Correctional Institution in Terre Haute, Ind. The U.S. Bureau of Prisons also verified that the men are being held there." The News adds, "Family members of the five men are upset because most of them were held previously in facilities much closer to Western New York. Now family members will have to drive 570 miles - more than nine hours - to visit the convicted conspirators in Terre Haute. They also could take a flight to Indianapolis, about 70 miles from Terre Haute. … Some supporters of the men wonder if the move is part of a government effort to toughen the punishment they already are receiving for traveling to Afghanistan and training with the al-Qaida terrorist group. … 'They were all snatched up and moved [earlier this month],' said Alwan's attorney, James P. Harrington. 'This makes it extraordinarily hard for their families to visit them. From what we understand, their telephone and visitation time are being drastically cut, too.' … Harrington and other defense attorneys are trying to find out the reason for the move and whether it is punitive." The News notes, "Harrington said he has heard that the government wants to keep all federal prisoners from terrorism-related prosecutions in one facility. … 'This is very unusual, because the Bureau of Prisons rarely puts multiple defendants from one criminal case in the same prison,' said Galab's attorney, Joseph M. LaTona. 'They usually keep them separated.' … Aside from verifying that the five men are at the medium-security prison in Terre Haute, U.S. Bureau of Prisons officials had no comment on the move Wednesday. A prison spokesman, Michael Truman, said he was unaware of any plan to move all the convicts from terrorism-related cases to one facility."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Panel Report Says DOJ, FBI Mishandled OKC Bombing Probe. CNN's American Morning (12/28, M. O'Brien) reported, "In our closer look this morning, the bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City, eleven years ago now. A congressional subcommittee is out with a new report blasting the Justice Department and the FBI for mishandling the case." CNN (Franken) added, "This new report does not conclude there was foreign involvement. It does charge that federal investigators did not fully pursue those possibilities, even though the report states – 'there are multiple witnesses who place McVeigh with another person at the scene of the bombing. It is reasonable to question,' it continues, 'if all leads were thoroughly pursued, all evidence gathered and properly analyzed.' … But the FBI insists that all involved have been prosecuted, that 'every bit of information was investigated and reviewed.' So comes the question, why have another investigation? Well according to Republican Congressman Dana Rohrbacher…there are just too many questions that remain unanswered so long after the bombing." Meanwhile, in a story posted on local TV news Web sites, Internet Broadcasting (12/28) reported that the "investigators chastised the FBI for how it handled the investigation" and includes excerpts from the subcommittee's conclusions.

Rohrabacher Says FBI Showed Pre-9/11 Mindset In OKC Probe. Interviewing Rep. Dana Rohrabacher on CNN's American Morning (12/28), host Miles O'Brien asked, "You didn't get very far in this report; was it a waste of time?" Rohrabacher: "No, it wasn't a waste of time," and "while we didn't come to the conclusion that we have proven a foreign connection, we have at least broken some new ground by analyzing the FBI and Justice Department original investigation and perhaps some of the deficiencies there that led -- that could possibly have led to 9/11." Rohrabacher added later in the interview that "the FBI called off the investigation into John Doe two months after the bombing. That was premature and its left questions unanswered."

O'Brien: "Why did they do that? Why do you feel the FBI is stonewalling, hiding information from you?" Rohrabacher: "Well, I didn't say they're stonewalling or they're hiding information. What I said was that they called off this investigation. I think it represents a mindset we saw also at play in the pre-to 9/11, when we had FBI investigators calling up the main office of the FBI saying, oh, my gosh, they're taking pilot lessons, and the FBI headquarters had a mindset of debunking and ignoring things like this. That same mindset we found present during the Oklahoma City Bombing investigation."

McVeigh, Nichols Prosecutors Defend FBI Investigation. The Denver Post (12/28, Pankratz, 256K) reported, "Two former federal prosecutors who tried Oklahoma City bombers Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols said Wednesday that they disagreed with a report by a congressional subcommittee slamming the FBI for failing to follow up on potential leads. One of McVeigh's defense lawyers also said he placed little credibility in the report by the House International Relations investigative subcommittee. A second McVeigh lawyer, however, said he agreed with the report's speculation that foreign conspirators might have been involved." The Post added, "Sean Connelly, a Denver-based lawyer who prosecuted Nichols and McVeigh, said the FBI did 'an exceptionally thorough' job in investigating any foreign links to the bombing. … But Stephen Jones, the lawyer who represented McVeigh during the Denver trial, said he believes the circle of conspirators extended beyond Nichols, McVeigh and Fortier to others both in the U.S. and abroad."

FBI Cracked Sophisticated Kaczynski Code, Revealing Catalog Of Bombings. KPIX-TV San Francisco (12/28, Werner) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "A decade after the feds tracked him down, CBS 5 Investigates has uncovered exclusive new information about Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, including a secret code he developed, and the confessions revealed as the code is broken. When Federal Bureau of Investigation agents swooped down on Kaczynski's Montana cabin in 1996, they found much more than they expected, according to lead agent Max Noel. There were 'lots of writings, lots of journals, lots of notebooks,' recalled Noel, now retired. … Noel believes Kaczynski wrote in code out of concern that someone might break into his cabin and discover his current and past activities, which may have included plans for future attacks." Cryptography expert Bruce Schneier "described the code as so complicated that 'it would not surprise me if this was the most complex cipher the FBI has seen since World War II.'" KPIX noted, "The FBI's decoding of the notebook revealed a virtual catalog of destruction."

Idaho Professor Charged In Hoax Threat To Bankruptcy Trustee. The AP (12/29, Dobner) reports, "An Idaho professor was charged with falsely claiming that he had mailed a dangerous substance to a trustee overseeing his bankruptcy case in Utah, federal authorities said Thursday. Thomas Hale warned the trustee Nov. 16 that she would be exposed to hantavirus," but "the white substance turned out to be baby powder, said Dennis McKone, assistant to the Salt Lake City fire chief. Hale, 61, pleaded not guilty in federal court Thursday, two days after he was arrested at Salt Lake City International Airport after a flight from Chicago." The AP notes trustee Elizabeth Loveridge "received the envelope on Nov. 20 and contacted Salt Lake City police. A bomb squad and the fire department's hazardous-materials team took the envelope and found it contained nothing harmful, FBI spokesman O. Scott Wall said." KTVX-TV Salt Lake City (12/28, Jones) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "The FBI says they quickly tracked the fax back to Hale. Hale filed for bankruptcy in 1996 and Loveridge was appointed trustee over the case. Investigators say she later determined that Hale had lied about his assets." Yesterday, "a federal judge ordered that Hale be released from jail pending trial."

The Salt Lake Tribune (12/29, Westley, Stettler) reports, "Hale's attorney, Larry Keller, said his client simply was seeking redress for an unresolved termite and mice problem. He said the act was 'inappropriate' in today's terrorism-charged climate, but not criminal." The Tribune notes, "Hale, a tenured professor and attorney, has taught history at Idaho State University for 23 years, according to ISU officials. … ISU Provost Robert A. Wharton said the university has not taken action against Hale or changed its class schedule." The Deseret Morning News (12/29, Winslow) adds, "Hale was arrested by the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force on Tuesday at the Salt Lake City International Airport after stepping off a flight from Chicago. 'He was surprised to be arrested,' FBI Special Agent-in-Charge Tim Fuhrman said. … Keller questioned why the FBI waited more than a month to arrest his client. 'If I'm a terrorist and I threaten somebody, they're going to want to get me off the streets right away,' he said."

California Man Indicted For Alleged Anti-Semitic Bomb Threats. The Paradise (CA) Post (12/29) reports, "A Paradise man is being held in Sacramento in relation to alleged threats made to hotels, Jewish museums, and other locations. According to a Department of Justice press release, a federal grand jury returned a nine-count indictment Thursday charging Scott R. Hudson, 52, with making a series of threatening phone calls between August and November of this year." The Post notes, "The FBI is investigating the case with the help of police departments in New York City, Rochester, Minn., Philadelphia, Penn. and Riverside and Irvine." Assistant US Attorney Benjamin B. Wagner "said Hudson is charged with calling in bomb threats to two hotels in New York City, making threatening calls to a Rabbi in Long Beach, New York, the National Museum of American Jewish History in Philadelphia and a Jewish congregation in Irvine. He also allegedly made threatening calls to a graduate school in Minnesota."

Spies Regularly Transmit Coded Messages Over Short-Wave Radio. The Washington Post/New York Daily News (12/29, A25, Meek) reports on the coded messages transmitted by spies over short-wave radio. "Chris Smolinski runs SpyNumbers.com and the 'Spooks' e-mail list, where 'number stations' hobbyists log hundreds of shortwave messages transmitted every month. … While hobbyists guess at the meaning of each cryptic message or which spy service sent it, it's no mystery to intelligence officials, who confirmed the purpose is espionage." The Daily News notes, "In Miami last week, Carlos and Elsa Alvarez pleaded guilty to lesser charges after the United States accused them of spying for Cuba. A prosecutor alleged in a court hearing this summer that they received shortwave 'messages in five-digit groupings.' An FBI interview transcript shows Alvarez admitted going into his bathroom 'on Fridays to listen at 11' for messages aimed at the couple."

DNI Issues Grants For Secret Intelligence Projects. The Washington Post (12/29, A25, Williamson, 690K) reports Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte "awarded $200,000 grants earlier this month to 10 scientists in the intelligence community, one of whom could not be named and several of whom declined to be interviewed, for projects whose details remain secret. The DNI office issued a news release with nine of the recipients' names, agencies, job titles and educational backgrounds. One awardee's information was omitted 'because of the sensitive position he occupies in his organization,' the release said. This is the second annual DNI Fellows award program. Last year's recipients, the release says, 'made significant progress with technology to locate terrorists and to extract intelligence from remote areas.' How they did that remains secret."

Short-Wave Radio Used To Openly Broadcast Intelligence. The Washington Post (12/29, A25, Meek, 690K) reports on the use of low-tech short wave radio broadcasts by intelligence agencies such as the Cuban Intelligence Directorate, Russian FSB, British MI6, or Israeli's Mossad, to communicate coded messages parsed in number or letters. Chris Smolinski "runs SpyNumbers.com and the 'Spooks' e-mail list, where 'number stations' hobbyists log hundreds of shortwave messages transmitted every month. 'It's like a puzzle. They're mystery stations,' explained Smolinski, who has tracked the spy broadcasts for 30 years." The Post adds, "While hobbyists guess at the meaning of each cryptic message or which spy service sent it, it's no mystery to intelligence officials, who confirmed the purpose is espionage."

Henke To Leave DHS For Ashcroft's Firm. McClatchy Newspapers (12/29, Dine) reports, "Tracy Henke, the Missourian who stirred controversy in a top homeland security job, has left the government to join her former boss, John Ashcroft, at The Ashcroft Group." McClatchy continues, "Earlier this year, President Bush appointed Henke to coordinate U.S. national-disaster and anti-terrorist efforts with state and local officials. Lawmakers of both parties questioned her experience, as well as Bush's bypassing of the Senate confirmation process. … But that criticism was nothing compared to the uproar when Henke, from Moscow Mills, Mo., decreased homeland security grants for New York and Washington, while increasing them for some smaller cities and towns. … 'SHE GAVE US THE AX: New York's money cut by a woman from the sticks,' complained a headline in The New York Daily News." McClatchy adds, "Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., then-chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said: 'As far as I'm concerned, the Department of Homeland Security has declared war on New York City. … A Washington Post columnist blasted the decision to reduce funding for the two cities hit on Sept. 11 while increasing it for 'those terrorism magnets of Kansas City and St. Louis - both by happenstance in Henke's home state of Missouri.' … In a telephone interview this week from Moscow Mills, Henke said that though she had held several high-profile positions in government, she was taken aback by the criticism. … 'One of the things that was surprising was the level of animosity and the personal attacks as it related to grant awards,' she said. … She said even with the reductions, New York still got the most money of any city for homeland security. She also noted that Congress had provided $600 million less in homeland security funding than the year before, making some cuts necessary."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Meets With "War Cabinet," Says More Consultations Ahead. ABC World News (12/28, story 3, :40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported President Bush "met at his Texas ranch with his national security advisers, including the Vice President and the secretaries of State and Defense," to consider changes to Iraq policy. Bush "says before he unveils his plan, there will be even more consultations." Bush: "Obviously, we'll continue to work with the Iraqi government. The key to success in Iraq is to have a government that's willing to deal with the elements there that are trying to prevent this young democracy from succeeding."

The CBS Evening News (12/28, story 2, 2:35, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported Bush "said he is close to a decision on a fresh strategy for Iraq, a strategy that could call for thousands of additional US troops." CBS (Martin) added, "With 100 US troops dead in Iraq this month, the second-worst of the year, President Bush met with his top national security advisers at the Texas White House to hammer out a new war strategy. One of the options is to send another 20,000 US troops into Baghdad, which would almost certainly mean more American casualties."

NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 2, 2:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported Bush "met with his war cabinet today to finalize a new strategy for Iraq." NBC (O'Donnell) added, "Unprepared to say how or what he will do differently on Iraq just yet, the President relied on hard to define phrases, saying he is making good progress and coming close to closure on a revamped strategy. Called to Crawford, Texas, the President's most senior wartime advisors, including his new Defense Secretary, just 10 days on the job. After a three-hour meeting the President said he wants more consultation." Bush: "We are making good progress towards coming up with a plan. We think it will help us achieve our objective." O'Donnell: "Intending this to be more than a high profile photo op, advisers are trying to thread a needle, saying no decisions have been made, but still claiming a plan is taking shape. The President described the enemy as extremists and radicals but made no mention today of Al Qaeda. He appeared push more burden on the Iraqi government."

The New York Times (12/29, Cloud, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports Bush "is considering an increase in troop levels in Iraq of 17,000 to 20,000, which would be accomplished in part by delaying the departure of two Marine regiments now deployed in Anbar Province." The option was among those President Bush addressed at a Thursday meeting with his national security team, "and it has emerged as a likely course as he considers a strategy shift in Iraq," Pentagon officials said. Most of the additional troops "would probably be employed in and around Baghdad." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (12/29, A3, Abramowitz, Wright, 690K) reports Bush "is considering new economic initiatives to go along with a possible increase in troops to help stabilize the country." Among the steps being considered "are short-term jobs and loan programs aimed at winning back the waning local support for the U.S. presence in Iraq."

The AP (12/28, Riechmann) reports Bush "worked nearly three hours at his Texas ranch today to design a new U.S. policy in Iraq," adding that "more consultation" would be required to "craft the plan he'll announce in the new year." The Washington Times (12/29, Curl, 88K) also reports on Bush's statement, noting that "the president said he is continuing to compile information and build a plan to deal with rampant sectarian violence that has left 100 American troops dead this month. 'I'm making good progress toward coming up with a plan that we think will help us achieve our objective,' said Mr. Bush. … The president's approval rating has plummeted, and Americans delivered both chambers of Congress last month to the Democrats in an election widely viewed as a rebuke of the administration's Iraq policy."

The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Gerstenzang, 850K) also reports on Bush's announcement "that he was 'making good progress' toward redrawing his strategy for Iraq, a plan aides said would encompass economic and political elements as well as new security procedures to stem sectarian violence and counter a thriving insurgency. It appeared increasingly likely, but not certain, that the latest effort to shore up the Iraq campaign would include sending additional U.S. troops there, and that the president would launch his strategy in a speech to the nation when Congress returns to Washington next Thursday or soon after." The Times suggests that the administration is eager for the ultimate plan to be well received by the public.

Little Innovation Seen In Surge Plans. The Washington Times (12/29, Scarborough, 88K) reports on the various troop "surge" options being studied, noting that "one official who was sent the briefing slides for various surge options said he was struck with the lack of new ideas after an intense three-month review process inside the Bush administration. 'Some of this stuff is what the old Coalition Provisional Authority looked at,' said the official." The Times suggests that possible troop increases being considered range from 5,000 to 30,000, noting that pacifying Baghdad would be the aim "if Mr. Bush, who met yesterday at his Texas ranch with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and other national security advisers," opts for the higher troop level, adding that under this scenario "the Army will have to keep some units in Iraq longer than their normal 13-month deployments, and accelerate the redeployment of brigades who already have served there."

Lieberman Argues For Troop Surge. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (12/29, A27, 690K) headlined, "Why We Need More Troops In Iraq," Sen. Joseph Lieberman writes about his recent trip to the Middle East, which "has made one thing clearer to me than ever: While we are naturally focused on Iraq, a larger war is emerging. On one side are extremists and terrorists led and sponsored by Iran, on the other moderates and democrats supported by the United States." Lieberman characterizes the war as "winnable," and urgent, arguing that despite public frustration with the war, "what is needed now, especially in Washington and Baghdad, is not despair but decisive action -- and soon." Lieberman cites security as "the most pressing problem," and suggests that Iran and al-Qaeda are interested in "a full-scale civil war" in Iraq, "the central front in the global and regional war against Islamic extremism. To turn around the crisis we need to send more American troops while we also train more Iraqi troops and strengthen the moderate political forces in the national government. After speaking with our military commanders and soldiers there, I strongly believe that additional U.S. troops must be deployed to Baghdad and Anbar province."

Saddam Likely To Be Executed "This Weekend." Saddam Hussein is nearly certain to be executed before the close of 2006, according to reports late Thursday. NBC Nightly News (12/28, lead story, 1:15, Engel, 9.87M) reported the US military "has received a formal request from the Iraqi government to transfer" the former dictator "to Iraqi authority. That would be one of the last steps required" before the execution, which "could take place within the next 48 hours or perhaps as early as tomorrow." On the CBS Evening News (12/28, lead story, 2:25, Pinkston, 7.66M), Iraqi National Security Adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie was shown saying, "I think the sooner the better." Rubaie told CBS the execution would be videotaped, but CNS said it is "unclear whether the video will be shown." CNN.com (12/29) says "Bush administration officials told CNN Hussein is expected to be executed 'this weekend.'"

The New York Times (12/29, Glanz, 1.16M) says preparations for the execution "began taking on a sense of urgency late Thursday." A "senior administration official said that the execution would probably not take place in the next 24 hours, but that the timing would be swift. 'It may be another day or so,' the official said." The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) says Hussein "met with two of his half brothers and his lawyers Thursday" as the preparations continued. Hussein "seemed in high spirits Thursday as he shared untitled poems he wrote recently and well wishes for the Iraqi people with his visitors over lunch, said attorney Wadood Fawzi, one of those who met with Hussein." The New York Post (12/29, 631K) headlines its report "Saddam: Dead By Sunday." The AP (12/28, Frayer) has a straightforward report.

More Commentary On Saddam Execution. The New York Times (12/29, 1.16M) editorializes, "The important question was never really about whether Saddam Hussein was guilty of crimes against humanity. … What really mattered was whether an Iraq freed from his death grip could hold him accountable in a way that nurtured hope for a better future. … Toppling Saddam Hussein did not automatically create a new and better Iraq. Executing him won't either."

The Washington Post (12/29, A26, 690K) editorializes, "This was not the accountability that one would hope for Saddam Hussein. For one thing, the crime for which he has been condemned -- the killing of 148 men and boys from the town of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him there in 1982 -- will be but a footnote in the volume detailing his atrocities. And his execution will cut short his trial for the crimes that would fill out that volume: the so-called Anfal campaign, in which tens of thousands of Kurds were murdered. What's more, his trial was in no sense the model of civilized justice that would have showcased a new, democratic Iraq. … Still, there is something unreal about the cries of foul from human rights groups demanding perfect procedural justice from a country struggling with civil war, daily bombings and death-squad killings."

US Death Toll In Iraq "Edges Closer To 3,000." NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 4, 2:00, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "More on Iraq today where we learned of the deaths of four more Americans. As the death toll edges closer to 3,000 we take a look at the challenges for US troops on the frontlines in Baghdad." NBC (Maceda) added, "On every street corner, behind every door of every house these US troops could be facing death. A Sunni gunman or Shiite sniper, they are caught in the middle and focused on coming home alive in one piece. … The reality is brutal, attacks on US forces and Iraqis at an all-time high. Today 60 Iraqis were killed in Baghdad alone. Almost daily US troops come under fire."

Marine Officials Say Ramadi Raid Did Not Include Air Strikes On Insurgents. The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Moore, 850K) reports, "A large-scale U.S. military operation in Ramadi last month did not target suspected insurgents with airstrikes, U.S. military officials said. Witness statements reported by The Times on Nov. 15 indicated that a U.S. airstrike might have killed at least 30 people, including women and children. But Marine spokesman Lt. Col. Bryan Salas said in a written response to inquiries about the incident that an airstrike Nov. 14 hit a bridge about 10 miles east of Ramadi and resulted in no casualties."

Suspect In Soldiers' Torture, Murder Apprehended Near Baghdad. The New York Times (12/29, Santora, 1.16M) reports US and Iraqi officials said the man believed to be behind the June kidnapping, torture, and murder of Pfc. Kristian Menchaca and Pfc. Thomas L. Tucker "was seized in a raid in a town just south" of Baghdad Tuesday. The "abduction of the two Americans, who were captured when insurgents ambushed a traffic checkpoint their platoon had set up in the town of Yusufiya, set off one of the largest manhunts of the war, with 8,000 troops involved." USA Today/AP (12/29, 6A) also reports on the apprehension of the suspect.

Baghdad's River Patrol Works To Recover Bodies Of Insurgency's Victims. The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Hennessey-Fiske, 850K) profiles Baghdad's river patrol, which guards the stretch of the Tigris River flowing through the city. The group's members routinely pull bodies from the waters. "Death on the Tigris is almost always violent, the river patrol commander says. Some causes of deaths are unchanging: People jump from bridges, or get tangled in weeds while swimming and drown. And then there are the dumped bodies, an increasingly frequent sight and a barometer of violence in a city that has become the epicenter of the country's sectarian strife: stripped of identification, blindfolded, handcuffed, shot and often badly decayed. The river patrols, created by Saddam Hussein to retrieve casualties of his regime from the Tigris in the 1970s, have returned to body detail because of the city's civil war."

Heroic Navy Corpsman Severely Injured By Sniper Fire. The New York Times (12/29, Chivers, 1.16M) reports Navy corpsman Dustin Kirby, "whose efforts to save a wounded marine in Iraq were covered in an article published Nov. 2 in The New York Times, was severely wounded by an Iraqi sniper on Christmas afternoon." A bullet "struck the left side of his face while he was on the roof of Outpost Omar" in Anbar. Kirby's jaw and upper palate "were damaged extensively, but after several operations he was conscious and on a ventilator in a military hospital in Germany."

Iraqis Face Major Housing Crisis. The New York Times (12/29, Luo, 1.16M) writes that "along with its many other desperate problems, Iraq is in the midst of a housing crisis that is worsening by the day." It began "right after the toppling of Saddam Hussein, when many landlords took advantage of the removal of his economic controls and raised rents substantially." And now, "after more than 10 months of brutal sectarian reprisals, many more Iraqis have fled their neighborhoods, only to wind up often in places that are just as wretched in other ways. While 1.8 million Iraqis are living outside the country, 1.6 million more have been displaced within Iraq since the war began. Since February, about 50,000 per month have moved within the country."

British Prince Harry To Deploy To Basra. The London Daily Telegraph (12/29) reports that Great Britain's Prince Harry, a second lieutenant in the nation's military, is scheduled to deploy with his unit to Basra, "and will likely be assigned to patrol the border with Iran." Prince Harry "is determined to go, despite reports of resistance from many in the military who fear he would be a fat prize for terrorists. They're also worried he would attract attention and put his fellow soldiers in greater danger."

Great War Leaders' Hypothetical Iraq Strategies Considered. In the Los Angeles Times, four scholars consider how "four of the greatest war leaders in history" would have handled Iraq. Macalester College anthropologist Jack Weatherford says Genghis Khan would have recognized "that victory came by conquering people, not land or cities." Historian Adrian Goldsworthy writes, "What would Julius Caesar do in Iraq? 'He'd win' is the simplest answer." Author Harold Holzer says Abraham Lincoln would "focus on the real enemy: terrorists," "embrace flexibility," communicate objectives "with frequency, passion and precision," "spend more time at the front," and "abandon the notion of divine will to justify war." As for George Washington, historian Joseph J. Ellis said he "would recognize the strategic problem immediately" -- that the US faces the same situation as the British that Washington fought. No matter "how many battles the British army won, it could not sustain control over the countryside unless it was enlarged tenfold, at a cost that British voters would never support."

Karzai Denounces Pakistan's Plans For Border Mines, Fences. The New York Times (12/29, Gall, 1.16M) reports Afghan President Hamid Karzai "voiced strong opposition" to Pakistan's plans to "lay mines and erect fences along its border with Afghanistan. He said the moves would only hurt the people living in the region and would not stem cross-border terrorism."

Aid Groups Assisting In Iraq, Afghanistan Reconstruction Praised. In his "Wonder Land" column in the Wall Street Journal (12/29, A8, 2.04M), Daniel Henninger writes about the efforts of Spirit of America, a group "organized by Jim Hake, to provide citizen-supported aid to the troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan" and similar organizations to overcome public disengagement with the wars and to raise money to continue their efforts. "Jim Hake says Spirit of America's contributions have fallen off since 2004 owing to general fatigue with Iraq, 'but under the circumstances people continue to be quite generous.' An end-of-the-year funding request raised more than $150,000." Henninger concludes, "Groups such as the Spirit of America and the Business Council for Peace may yet be driven out. It is to this country's credit that early on, they voted with their feet to go in, and regret nothing."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple Probe Finds No Options Misconduct By Managers. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, Goldstein) reports, "Apple Computer Inc. said in a filing to the Securities and Exchange Commission that CEO Steve Jobs was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable stock-option grant dates, but didn't personally benefit from it." The Journal continues, "In a delayed annual filing made with the SEC, the company said a special committee of the board of directors appointed to look into past stock-option grants concluded that while Mr. Jobs was 'aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates, he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants or appreciate the accounting implications.'" The Journal adds, "The special committee of Cupertino, Calif.-based company also found that the investigation had raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock-option grants. … Apple is also restating financial statements from 2004-2006. In total, Apple is restating earnings after tax by $4 million in 2006, $7 million in 2005 and $10 million in 2004. The company also plans to take an $84 million noncash charge as a result."

The New York Times (12/29, Markoff, Helft) reports, "Apple Computer and its charismatic chief executive, Steven P. Jobs, are expected to make a big announcement about a new product at the Macworld conference next month. Before that, however, the company has some other highly anticipated information to share." The Times continues, "The company is likely to answer questions about backdated options granted to Mr. Jobs and other executives in a delayed annual report that Apple said it would file with securities regulators on Friday." The Times adds, "Apple is among dozens of companies, many of them in Silicon Valley, which have come under scrutiny for assigning favorable grant dates to stock options to inflate their value. … So far, Apple, which is known for obsessively guarding information about new products, appears to have applied the same secrecy to its handling of the stock option issues. Publicly, it has confined its response to a few terse statements. This week it continued to maintain its silence as reports about possible falsified documents rattled shareholders. … The company has said that Mr. Jobs knew of some backdated grants, but that he did not knowingly receive any of them and had not benefited from the practice."

The AP (12/29, Wong) reports, "Apple is among nearly 200 companies ensnared in the scandal and that have disclosed SEC, Justice Department or internal investigations. … In June Apple began an internal review of its grants, including one to Jobs. Apple said in October that it found 15 misdated grants from 1997 to 2002. The Recorder, a San Francisco-based legal newspaper, first reported Wednesday on the discovery of possibly falsified documents related to options." The AP adds, 'Full details of Apple's options troubles have yet to emerge, but the Cupertino, Calif.-based company largely exonerated Jobs in October when it said an internal investigation had not found any misconduct by current management. The investigation did raise serious questions, however, about two former officers, the company said. … Experts who would speak only generally without any facts about the Apple imbroglio say that if Jobs knew about the falsification of documents, he could be in trouble."

The San Francisco Chronicle (12/29, Guynn, Writer) reports, "Rarely before in the business world has the filing of a company's annual report been as widely anticipated as the one Apple Computer Inc. is expected to submit today amid a deepening stock options scandal that has raised questions about CEO Steve Jobs." The Chronicle continues, "Apple was rocked this week by reports of forged documents connected with an award Jobs received in 2001 of millions of options to buy Apple stock. What happens to Jobs, one of the technology world's commanding figures, could depend on what he knew about options problems at Apple and when he knew it. … Apple watchers will pore over Apple's filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission in search of assurances that Jobs had no direct involvement in any stock-options shenanigans." The Chronicle notes, "Jobs holds an unusual place in corporate America. He is more cult than corporate leader, credited with creating must-have products and reinvigorating the Cupertino maker of iPods and Macintosh. … But Jobs and his company have been plunged into scandal in recent months after disclosures that Apple may have improperly granted stock options to Jobs and other executives."

Pixar Is Also Subject Of Options Probe. The Financial Times (12/29, Nuttall) reports, "Another company founded by Steve Jobs - Pixar, the animation studio - is also being investigated by the SEC over stock option awards but Mr Jobs never received any options himself." The Times continues, "Walt Disney, which acquired the company in May, said last month that its board was carrying out an independent review of stock option practices at Pixar after receiving inquiries from the SEC and Justice Department, although it played down any likely financial impact from the issue." The Times adds, "Richard Farmer, Merrill Lynch analyst, in a research report earlier this year into whether Steve Jobs might have been involved in options regularities, said: 'Our review of Pixar disclosures does not allow us to rule out the possibility, given Jobs was a member of the board that made options decisions, and our analysis suggests these may contain irregularities.' .. His research found that, between 1997 and 2004, four out of seven awards were recorded at the lowest possible price in the fiscal years they were granted - with the odds of this happening by chance being 112m to one."

Compensation Packages Allow Executives Low-Risk Departures. The New York Times (12/29, Creswell) reports, "It's called the 'golden hello.' … For a chief executive of a large corporation, it is the one thing — more than the corporate jet or any other perk — that must be guaranteed before the executive will move to run another company." The Times continues, "W. James McNerney Jr., a former superstar manager at General Electric, received not one, but two such deals in recent years, worth tens of millions of dollars. In each deal, he was given any bonuses, stock options, restricted stock and pension benefits that he would have abandoned by leaving his previous employer." The Times adds, "Such golden hello payments are intended to make the executive 'whole' — in essence to treat the executive as if his career were one smooth ascent with no costly interruptions. And these multimillion-dollar payments and perks are used to draw in not only chief executives, but virtually every member of the executive suite. If 'golden parachutes' — rich exit packages of extra cash, stock or retirement benefits — are needed at times to kick out chief executives, golden hellos are increasingly needed to get them in the door." The Times notes, "Such golden hellos are not new, but lawyers representing executives at the negotiating table are constantly coming up with quirky ways to make clients whole. Matching salaries, guaranteed bonuses and millions of dollars in stock options are typical. On top of that, chief executives are made whole on lucrative pension benefits, often being credited at the new company for years of service elsewhere — a perk rarely available to nonexecutive employees. … These days, though, some executives are demanding that companies make up losses they may face from the sale of a home if they relocate, or that they receive price protection on losses they might incur in stock they own in the company they are leaving."

GE To Disclose More Information On Pay Advice. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, A2, Whitehouse) reports, "General Electric Co., agreeing to an effort by some investors to increase scrutiny on executive pay, will disclose more information on the advice it gets from compensation consultants." The Journal continues, "The Fairfield, Conn., conglomerate agreed to go beyond regulatory requirements and disclose any business ties it may have with the firms that advise it on how to pay its top executives." The Journal adds, "Under new Securities and Exchange Commission rules put in place this year, companies will be required to disclose in public filings the name of their compensation consultants, but not their other business relationships. … In 2006, GE's board of directors used the services of New York compensation consulting firm Frederic W. Cook & Co., which also advises the company's human resources on its broader pay programs, said Peter O'Toole, a GE spokesman. The company will make this information available in its coming proxy statement, he said."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Domestic Violence Rates In US Fall Sharply. The Washington Post (12/29, A14, Hsu) reports, "Domestic violence rates in the United States dropped sharply between 1993 and 2004 but showed recent signs of a rebound, the Justice Department reported yesterday." The Post continues, "The number of domestic homicides fell 32 percent from 1993 to 2004, and the frequency of nonfatal violence between domestic partners dropped by more than 50 percent, from 5.8 attacks per 1,000 U.S. residents age 12 or older, to 2.6 attacks, according to the Bureau of Justice Statistics." The Post adds, "Men benefited from the decline more than women, and black victims more than white women. The number of women killed by current or former partners fell from 1,572 in 1993 to 1,159 in 2004, or 26 percent. The number of men killed dropped from 698 to 385, or 45 percent. … 'The best news overall is that 'intimate partner violence' has declined since 1993, but there's still too much of it,' said bureau statistician Shannan M. Catalano, author of the Justice Department online report. The report did not address violence among other household members or relatives." The Post notes, "Noting that current or former partners account for 22 percent of violence against women, but 3 percent of violence against men, Catalano said, 'It still is a crime against women. . . . Women are more often victimized by someone they know. Men are more often victimized by strangers.' … The report did not offer an explanation for the trend, but experts said it continued a decline in domestic violence recorded since 1976 and mirrored a drop in violent crime overall in the past decade."

The AP (12/29) reports, "Some experts attribute the decline to better training for police and more funding for prosecution, two key elements of the 1994 Violence Against Women Act. Investigators increasingly are better trained to handle abuse cases and bring them to court. … 'For the first time, there are entire domestic violence units in law enforcement,' said Lonna Stevens, director of the Sheila Wellstone Institute, a Minnesota-based domestic violence organization. 'We've had protocols and policies developed for responding to this.'" The AP notes, "In 1993, there were about 5.8 incidents of nonfatal violence for every 1,000 U.S. residents above the age of 12. By 2004, that number had fallen to 2.6, the agency said. Homicides fell by about 30 percent, from 2,269 in 1993 to 1,544 in 2004. … The Justice Department defines intimate partner violence as violence by a current or former spouse, boyfriend or girlfriend or a same-sex partner. … Stevens said police have been less successful responding to and deterring abusive behavior in some minority communities, where racism and cultural differences can keep reporting rates low." The Washington Times (12/29, Apuzzo, 88K) also reports this story.

International Cooperation Brings War Crime Indictments For Two Bosnian Serbs. The Christian Science Monitor (12/29, Kampschror) reports from Sarajevo, Bosnia-Herzegovina, "Mladen Blagojevic and Zdravko Bozic would probably be living unassuming lives as Bosnia Serb refugees in the Arizona desert if it weren't for a landmark international detective effort to track down war-crime suspects. … Instead, they're in custody in wintry Bosnia, where they were charged last week in connection with the 1995 Srebrenica massacre." The Monitor continues, "The case, say court sources, marks a precedent in international cooperation in the prosecution of war crimes, and could show the way forward for both the US and other countries that may be unwittingly hosting war-crimes suspects on their territory. … 'I would describe the cooperation with the US as unprecedented, as these are the first cases where war-crimes suspects have been returned to the country where the crimes were committed to face charges,' says Toby Cadman, counsel to the prosecutor at Bosnia's war-crimes chamber." The Monitor adds, "Mr. Blagojevic and Mr. Bozic were deported to Bosnia earlier this year after being arrested in the US for not disclosing their service in the Bosnian Serb military when its forces overran the Bosnian Muslim enclave of Srebrenica and killed up to 8,000 men and boys - a crime ruled genocide by the UN war-crimes tribunal in The Hague. On Dec. 21, they were indicted for crimes against humanity by Bosnia's war-crimes chamber and charged with the detention, murders, and forcible transfer of Srebrenica Muslims. International cooperation led to 56 arrests … In the past two years, 56 Bosnian Serbs have been arrested on charges of similar immigration fraud or making false statements over omitting their military service on immigration applications. Agents from the Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) most recently raided homes in at least five US cities earlier this month, bringing in at least 16more people . Mr. Cadman says the ICE's Operation No Safe Haven could prove a model for other countries, which, like the US, took in large numbers of refugees and asylum seekers from the former Yugoslavia during and after the 1990s Balkan wars."

Duke Rape Case Prosecutor Charged With Ethics Violations. The AP (12/29, Beard) reports, "The North Carolina bar filed ethics charges Thursday against the prosecutor in the Duke lacrosse case, accusing him of saying misleading or inflammatory things to the news media about the athletes under suspicion." District Attorney Mike Nifong "was accused of violating was a prohibition against making comments 'that have a substantial likelihood of heightening public condemnation of the accused.' In a statement, the bar said it opened a case against Nifong on March 30, a little more than two weeks after a 28-year-old woman hired to perform as a stripper at a lacrosse team party said she was gang-raped." The CBS Evening News (12/28, story 4, 0:20, Mitchell) noted, "He could face disbarment. Last week, Nifong dropped rape charges," but the three lacrosse players "still face charges of kidnapping and sexual offense."

The New York Times (12/29, Barstow, Wilson) adds, "In perhaps the most serious accusation, the bar also said Mr. Nifong had engaged in 'dishonesty, fraud, deceit or misrepresentation' by suggesting to reporters that a condom was used in the alleged attack when he had in his possession a sexual assault examination report that indicated otherwise. Mr. Nifong spoke about condoms after laboratory tests failed to find semen from any Duke player on the accuser." Newsday (12/29, Maloney) also reports on the ethics charges, and the Washington Post (12/29, A8) runs the AP story.

Jones Hopes To Discuss Duke Case With Gonzales. WLFL-TV, Raleigh, Durham, NC (12/28, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "Meanwhile North Carolina Congressman Walter Jones hopes to meet with Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez about the Duke case when Congress reconvenes in two weeks. Jones has written letters to Gonzalez, calling on him to investigate Durham DA Mike Nifong's conduct." WTVD-TV, Raleigh, Durham, NC (12/28, 11:00 p.m.) also broadcasted this story.

Former CyberNet Executive Pleads Not Guilty To Fraud Charges. Grand Rapids Press (12/28, Agar) reported, "A former vice president at the collapsed firm CyberNET in Grand Rapids pleaded not guilty Wednesday to federal charges related to an $81.7 million fraud case." Paul Nathan Wright "is accused of conspiracy, bank fraud, money laundering and mail fraud." The Press noted, "Last week, James Horton, the former CyberNET president, was sentenced to 7 1/2 years in prison. He pleaded guilty to conspiracy, bank fraud and money laundering, and has cooperated with the government. … The government alleges that CyberNET deceived lending institutions to obtain financing under false pretenses, and expended 'a substantial amount of effort to prevent lenders from discovering that they had been deceived,' the indictment said."

FBI Says North Carolina Woman Took Abducted Children To Canada. WRAL-TV Raleigh (12/28) reported on its Web site, "The FBI said Thursday that 17-month-old twins allegedly taken by their birth mother last week were spotted crossing the Canadian border. According to a news release issued early Thursday evening, FBI investigators have determined that Allison Quets crossed the border last Saturday with the toddlers, Tyler and Holly Needham. All three are believed to still be in Canada, investigators said." WRAL added, "FBI officials said they are working jointly with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the FBI legal attache's office in the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa, and the Durham Police Department. They also have enlisted the assistance of the National Center for Missing/Exploited Children, along with Child Find Canada." The AP (12/29) notes, "Quets, 49, of Durham, is suspected of taking Tyler Lee and Holly Ann Needham, who had lived in Apex with their adoptive parents, FBI officials said Thursday in a written statement. … Quets had monthly visitation rights as a part of a custody agreement, but now faces federal charges of international parental kidnapping." McClatchy (12/29, Ovaska) reports the story, under the headline "FBI: Missing Kids Were Taken To Canada."

Sheehan Arrested Outside Bush Ranch In Texas. CNN.com (12/29) reports, "Anti-war protester Cindy Sheehan was arrested Thursday afternoon outside President Bush's ranch, according to a law enforcement official." Sheehan, "who in the past has camped out for weeks in protest outside the ranch in Crawford, Texas, was arrested for blocking the road leading to the property, Texas Department of Public Safety's Tela Mange told CNN. Four others were also arrested after law enforcement officials asked the group to move and they refused, Mange said." Mange "said Vice President Dick Cheney's motorcade was delayed leaving the ranch while officers removed the protesters."

Seven New Orleans Policemen Face Murder Charges Over Katrina Shootings. The New York Times (12/29, Dewan, 1.16M) reports, "Seven New Orleans police officers were indicted Thursday on charges of first-degree murder or attempted murder in connection with the deaths of two men on a bridge six days after Hurricane Katrina struck." Four other civilians "suffered gunshot wounds in the episode, which took place on Sept. 4, 2005. No officers were hurt." The shootings "occurred while much of the New Orleans area was still under water, communication among officers was poor and the city was chaotic. The New Orleans Police Department's initial account — that officers were responding to reports of snipers firing on contractors — seemed to confirm fears of rampant lawlessness in the city."

NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 5, 0:40, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "A New Orleans grand jury indicted four police officers on charges of first degree murder and three others on charges of attempted murders in the bridge incident stemming from the shooting of two men during the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. The men were killed in what police say was a gun battle with officers claiming they were fired upon and appropriately returning fire. Witnesses dispute that account. No guns were found on the victims, and the coroners report showed a man was shot five times in the back." The AP (12/29) and the New Orleans Times-Picayune (12/29, Maggi) also report this story.

CIVIL LAW:

FEC Doubles Civil Penalties Imposed In 2006. The AP (12/29) reports the Federal Election Commission "more than doubled its civil penalties in 2006, imposing $6.2 million in fines for campaign-law violations." More than half – "$3.8 million -- came from penalties against Freddie Mac, the federal mortgage corporation, accused of making illegal contributions to political committees, according to year-end numbers released yesterday." But even "without the record Freddie Mac fine, the FEC issued 12 penalties of more than $100,000, or almost a quarter of all six-figure fines in the agency's 31-year history." FEC Chairman Michael Toner said, "I'm very pleased with the vigorous enforcement record the FEC compiled in 2006. The numbers speak for themselves." The AP adds advocates, 'however, said the numbers 'don't tell the whole story.'"

WPost Criticizes FEC For Pursuing NASCAR Driver. The Washington Post (12/29, A26, 690K) criticizes the FEC in an editorial for considering the case of Kirk Shelmerdine, the NASCAR driver who pasted a Bush-Cheney '04 bumper sticker on his race car. Shelmerdine's "decal resulted in a complaint to the FEC that he had violated federal election law by failing to file the report required of anyone who makes an independent expenditure valued at $250 or more in support of a candidate for federal office." The FEC "agreed -- in an action made public this week -- to take the step that ought to have been obvious from the start: to send Mr. Shelmerdine a letter of admonishment warning him not to do it again. Our customary criticism of the FEC is for doing too little to go after election law violations, not too much. But l'affaire Shelmerdine seems simply silly."

Court Praised For Ruling Issue Ads Permissible Before Elections. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "A federal court decision last week upheld the right of citizens to petition their government -- a right taken for granted before the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law codified speech restrictions." The ruling "is overly narrow but welcome all the same. And if it's appealed, as expected, the Supreme Court will have another chance to weigh in on Congress's efforts to chip away at First Amendment free-speech guarantees in the name of 'reform.'" The 2004 case resulted "when Wisconsin Right to Life ran television and radio spots informing the public that U.S. Senators were filibustering President Bush's judicial nominees." In "a 2-1 opinion, the court held that certain 'issue' ads are permissible during campaign season, even if they (gasp) refer to candidates seeking re-election. And while we agree with the result, the justification for the court's finding is still troublesome and revealing of McCain-Feingold's assault on political speech."

FEC Fines Taylor For 2004 Campaign Violation. Roll Call (12/28, Duran) reports on its Web site that the FEC "fined the 2004 campaign of Rep. Charles Taylor (R-N.C.) $91,000 for failing to properly comply with provisions of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act." Taylor won in 2004 but was defeated this year by Democrat Heath Shuler.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Man Sues St Paul Over Alleged Police Assault. The St. Paul Pioneer Press (12/29, Prather) reports, "A man who alleges he suffered an 'inhumane beating' during a traffic stop two years ago in St. Paul sued the city this week." The Pioneer Press continues, "Leon Nins filed a federal civil rights suit Wednesday, two years to the day after the Dec. 27, 2004, confrontation. Nins was 85 at the time. … In the suit, Nins makes a variety of claims, including excessive force, battery and assault. The filing states Nins suffered permanent damage to his eyes and legs as well as psychological injuries, including depression, anxiety and panic attacks. … Nins seeks more than $50,000, plus punitive damages." The Pioneer Press adds, "The incident, involving a black motorist and a white police officer, riled local civil rights leaders. Police Chief John Harrington, relying on witness statements and a squad car audio recording, defended officer Michael Lee, who said Nins kicked and spit at him. … Nins, who was arrested, spent three days in jail. Prosecutors charged Nins with assaulting the officer and obstructing the legal process, but dropped the charges and allowed him to admit to driving without a license. Nins had no criminal record. .. According to a criminal complaint originally filed by prosecutors, Nins would not open his window for the officer. Lee opened the vehicle door and Nins began yelling that he would not show his driver's license, began swearing and refused to get out of the car. Nins spit at Lee as the officer pulled him out of the car, handcuffed him and placed him in the back of the squad car. … Subsequent investigations by the Bloomington Police Department and the U.S. Justice Department cleared Lee of criminal wrongdoing."

Judge Says DC Juvenile Detention Improvements Too Slow. The Washington Post (12/29, Cauvin) reports, "A D.C. Superior Court judge said yesterday that the District had failed to do enough to improve conditions for juvenile offenders, particularly at the long-troubled Oak Hill detention facility." The Post continues, "Judge Herbert B. Dixon Jr. said the city's slow progress in making changes that were agreed to more than two years ago left him no choice but to step squarely back into the case, which began in 1985 as a class-action lawsuit filed on behalf of juveniles held at the city-run Oak Hill facility in Laurel. … 'In light of the recurring delays meeting the requirements imposed in this case, and the impact such delays have on the children in defendants' custody, the court concludes that its more direct and active oversight of the remedial process is warranted,' Dixon wrote in a nine-page order." The Post adds, "The lawsuit -- Jerry M. vs. the District of Columbia-- has cast a long shadow over the juvenile justice system. A consent decree, reached in 1986, was supposed to settle the suit, but problems persisted. The case appeared on its way to resolution in spring 2004, when the plaintiffs and the city agreed to the appointment of an independent monitor who would report back to Dixon. The D.C. government's appointment in early 2005 of a highly regarded juvenile justice director added to the optimism that changes were near. … But Dixon, who has overseen the case since 2001, felt compelled to act after receiving the most recent reports from the monitor, Grace M. Lopes. Although noting 'clear progress,' she found the city's efforts wanting in many areas, from a failure to ensure pest control services at Oak Hill despite 'chronic infestations' to persistent staffing problems even in new, more-therapeutic units. … Oak Hill's population has dropped from an overcrowded 245 youths in February 2005 to fewer than 100 in recent months as the city has found alternatives to housing juveniles there for extended periods."

WSJournal Criticizes Massachusetts Court Over Gay Marriage Amendment Decision. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Nearly three years ago, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts read between the lines of the state constitution to discover a right to same-sex marriage previously undetected across the decades. The court then gave the legislature six months to rewrite state law to accommodate its diktat. On Wednesday, however, the same court suddenly rediscovered the humility so lacking in its previous foray into the marriage debate." The Journal criticizes the court for not compelling the state legislature to vote on petitions to amend the state constitution to ban same-sex marriage, noting it "agreed that the legislature's duty to vote on the measure was 'unambiguous.' But it claimed to be powerless to compel a vote. So the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, whose own arrogation of power created this mess, has suddenly discovered the limits of its power to clean it up."

AT&T Offers New Concessions To Get Merger Approval From FCC. The AP (12/29, Dunbar) reports, "AT&T Inc. has offered a new set of concessions that are expected to satisfy the two Democrats on the Federal Communications Commission and lead to approval of the company's $85 billion buyout of BellSouth Corp. … Approval by the full commission could happen as soon as Friday." The AP continues, "AT&T filed a letter of commitment with the agency Thursday night that adds a number of new conditions to the deal, including a promise to observe 'network neutrality' principles, an offer of affordable stand-alone digital subscriber line service and a promise to give up some wireless spectrum. … Final approval still requires a vote of the commissioners, which can happen at any time via computer. The proposed deal is the largest telecommunications merger in U.S. history." The AP adds, 'AT&T offered the concessions after a little more than a week of marathon negotiations with lawyers who work for the two Democrats on the commission, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, documents show. … Consumer advocates are praising the compromise. Gene Kimmelman, vice president of federal and international affairs for Consumers Union, who has worked closely with the Democrats, said AT&T's new concessions are 'an enormous improvement from where we were a month ago.' … The agreement came together 10 days after Republican Commissioner Robert McDowell announced that he would not vote on the deal, despite being authorized to do so by the FCC's general counsel."

The Wall Street Journal (12/29, A3, Schatz, Grant) reports, "In a 19-page letter filed with the agency last night, the phone giant promised to observe numerous "network neutrality" principles so it would treat all Internet content equally. Consumer groups and some Internet companies have been pressing the FCC for weeks to make this a condition of approving the merger." The Journal continues, "In addition, AT&T agreed to do such things as upgrade the availability of high-speed Internet service in the areas it serves and adhere to price caps on high-volume data lines used by business customers. In a concession to labor unions, the company agreed to repatriate 3,000 jobs outsourced by BellSouth outside the U.S., locating at least 200 of them in the New Orleans area. … The deal has some longer-term implications for all phone companies because of the focus by the FCC's Democrats on net neutrality and rates charged to businesses for high-volume data lines. Democrats felt emboldened to take a hard line during negotiations because of their new control of Congress, where Democrats have been riled up about the net-neutrality issue."

Bloomberg (12/29, Stern, Peterson) reports, "The offer may end a three-month stalemate between FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, fellow Republican Deborah Taylor Tate and the panel's two Democrats, who have sought price controls and other concessions. Buying BellSouth lets San Antonio-based AT&T expand its local service to 22 states, gain full control of Cingular Wireless LLC and compete with cable television companies offering phone service as well as Web access and TV. … 'AT&T really wanted to get it done this year,' said Paul Glenchur, an analyst with Stanford Washington Research Group, an investor advisory firm. 'I suspect the Democrats didn't want to look like they were standing in the way.'" Bloomberg adds, "The concessions by AT&T go beyond those the company proposed in October. AT&T offered, for example, to sell fast Internet access known as DSL for $19.95 a month without requiring customers to buy phone service, the letter said. … The company also said it would repatriate 3,000 BellSouth jobs now outside the U.S.

and pledged 200 jobs for New Orleans. … Democratic Commissioners Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein gained leverage in seeking tougher conditions after the fifth commissioner, Republican Robert McDowell, said he would abstain from voting because of his past work as a lobbyist for smaller companies that compete with AT&T."

FTC Challenges General Dynamics' Purchase Of Canadian Ammo Maker. The Washington Post (12/29, D3, Merle) reports, "Federal antitrust authorities, citing concerns about higher prices and less competition, challenged General Dynamics' plans yesterday to buy a Canadian ammunition maker." The Post continues, "The Federal Trade Commission ruled that to buy SNC Technologies of Quebec, General Dynamics must divest its interest in one of the two other competitors in the market. Otherwise, 'General Dynamics could unilaterally raise prices or otherwise engage in anticompetitive conduct,' the FTC said in a statement. … The company, headquartered in Falls Church, has agreed to those terms." The Post adds, "It is at least the third time this year that federal regulators have expressed concern about diminishing competition among military contactors. The agency took more than a year to approve a plan by Lockheed Martin and Boeing to merge their government rocket businesses, acknowledging that creating a monopoly in a multibillion-dollar market would probably lead to higher prices and lower quality. The FTC approved General Dynamics' $2.2 billion acquisition of technology firm Anteon in June only after Anteon agreed to sell a unit that raised conflict-of-interest concerns. … In February, General Dynamics announced that it would buy SNC Technologies for $275 million. SNC is one of three makers of mortar rounds, relatively inexpensive shells used by infantry troops, for the U.S. military. The others are Day & Zimmerman of Philadelphia and American Ordnance of Pittsburg, Kan., which is jointly owned by General Dynamics and Day & Zimmerman."

Judge Orders Intel To Produce International Evidence In AMD Suit. The AP (12/29) reports, "Chip-maker Intel Corp. said it would not object to a court order to produce documents related to its international business practices, as part of an antitrust case filed by rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. .. AMD said the court order issued Wednesday was a 'significant legal victory.'" The AP continues, "In a letter to Judge Joseph Farnan in the U.S. Federal District Court in Delaware, Intel said it plans to cooperate with the court order and that it does not plan to file an objection. … Intel also noted that a court-appointed Special Master explicitly said it was not making decisions about whether the evidence would be admissible in court." The AP adds, "In September, a federal judge ruled that if AMD wins the antitrust case filed in the U.S., it cannot receive damages for Intel's alleged monopolistic practices overseas."

Market Watch (12/29, Andrejczak) reports that Judge Farnan "had previously sided with Intel, opining that the court lacked jurisdiction over AMD's foreign conduct claims. But a special master appointed to oversee discovery disputes in the case agreed with AMD that the PC-chip market is global, with 68% of the world's computers sold to non-U.S. customers. … Sunnyvale, Calif.-based AMD said it thinks this latest development will bolster it claims that Intel used anticompetitive practices in the sale of PC chips worldwide." Market Watch adds, "AMD has subpoenaed roughly 70 parties so far in the case, and as a result of this court order, it is likely AMD will target Intel's business partners in Japan, where antitrust regulators there have suggested Intel abused its position as the world's No. 1 computer-chip maker. … AMD originally filed its antitrust suit against Intel in June 2005. The suit accused Intel of bullying a range of computer makers, distributors and retailers from Europe to Asia into not selling or supporting AMD products. Intel has denied the charges."

US Charges Massachusetts Bus Company With Breaking Pollution Law. The Boston Herald (12/29, Goodison) reports, "Chelsea-based Paul Revere Transportation faces federal penalties for alleged repeat violations of a state law forbidding buses from idling more than five minutes." The Herald continues, "The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and the U.S. Justice Department filed suit in district court on Tuesday, alleging the transportation company left its diesel buses idling for a total of more than 100 hours at its Roxbury bus yard and a shuttle bus location on Brookline Avenue. … 'Given the extremely high asthma rates in Roxbury, it is unacceptable that diesel buses and other vehicles are left idling for more than an hour at a time,' Robert Varney, New England EPA administrator, said in a statement. 'Diesel pollution is very harmful, especially for sensitive populations such as the young, elderly and people who suffer from asthma.'" The Herald adds, "The EPA witnessed the alleged idling during eight weekly inspections in April and March. At times, more than 20 vehicles were found idling - some for more than an hour and, in one case, for more than two hours, according to the agency."

FDA Approves Cloned Animals Products For Human Consumption. The FDA announced Thursday that it has approved meat and milk products from cloned animals fit for human consumption. ABC World News (12/28, story 7, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) called the move "controversial," noting that "a recent poll shows a majority of Americans, 64%, are uncomfortable with the whole idea of cloned animals -- much less eating food that comes from them." The CBS Evening News (12/28, story 3, 2:05, Mitchell, 7.66M) noted the FDA's decision is "not going down well with critics who say the government is going too far, too fast."

On its front page, the New York Times (12/29, Pollack, Martin, 1.16M) says the moved "touched off an immediate storm of criticism from consumer groups, as well as some concerns from meat and dairy companies worried about consumer reaction." The Washington Post (12/29, A1, Weiss, 690K) says the decision "represents a crucial milestone" for biotech companies, but noted that "in apparent recognition of consumer distrust of cloned food," the FDA "took the unprecedented step of posting all the raw scientific data it used to come to its conclusion." The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Kaplan, 850K) notes the report "didn't address the contentious issue of whether products derived from clones would require special labeling."

Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 10, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) noted that it "could be years before cloned food shows up on store shelves." USA Today (12/29, 5B, Weise, 2.27M) says the announcement is "just the beginning of what will be a year or more process of public input and discussion before these products can be sold." However, the Washington Times (12/29, A1, Lopes, 88K) reports food products made from cloned animals could be "on grocery shelves late next year."

In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (12/29, Zhang, Kilman, Etter, 2.04M) says federal regulators have "opened the door to far-reaching changes in livestock production," which may limit US meat exports, "already buffeted by concerns in some countries about mad-cow disease." The Financial Times (12/29, Cookson) and the Christian Science Monitor (12/29, Spotts, 59K) also report on the FDA's announcement.

LATimes Says Polar Bears Could Force Global Warming Policy Shift. The Los Angeles Times (12/29, 850K) writes in an editorial, "Is it possible that the polar bear can do what the scientists cannot? What the polar bear could do, essentially, is force the administration to take steps to curb global warming. With its proposal, announced Wednesday, to list polar bears as a threatened species, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service for the first time acknowledged that global warming is the driving force behind an animal's potential extinction. If the polar bear is listed as endangered, then the U.S. government would be bound by law to protect it -- and protecting it may require regulations to reduce greenhouse gas emissions. … If the administration wants to avoid more than a few legal and political headaches, it should use the time to revisit its antiscientific approach to the world's most pressing environmental problem."

In Virginia, Two Plead Guilty In Sheriff's Department Corruption, Racketeering Case. There are more than 100 media references to guilty pleas entered in connection with a Henry County Sheriff's Office drug conspiracy case. The AP (12/29) reports two former officers with the sheriff's department "pleaded guilty Thursday to charges that they took part in a scheme with their boss and ten colleagues to sell drugs seized from criminals." The two are among 20 people "indicted in October in the investigation of corruption and racketeering conspiracy. Former deputy David Allan King pleaded guilty to charges of racketeering conspiracy and drug conspiracy. James Alden Vaught, a former sergeant, pleaded guilty to racketeering conspiracy." Former Henry County Sheriff H. Franklin Cassell "has pleaded not guilty to impeding investigation and money laundering." FOX News, the Washington Times, San Diego Union Tribune, and Houston Chronicle are among the news outlets that used the AP story.

The Roanoke (VA) Times (12/29) reports a DEA investigation out of Philadelphia "led authorities to Vaught in early 2005, court records show. When the DEA delivered a package containing the sedative ketamine to a house in Martinsville, William Randall Reed accepted delivery and was arrested. Reed, who did not work for the sheriff's office, told police he rented the house from Vaught and paid the sergeant in drugs and money to use the house as a drug drop, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant."

The Richmond (VA) Times-Dispatch (12/29) reports King and Vaught "were among 20 people indicted in October after prosecutors alleged that members of the sheriff's department were reselling drugs they had seized from dealers, trafficking in steroids and prescription pills, pilfering firearms from the evidence room and covering up their illicit activities by lying to federal investigators. … Vaught agreed to cooperate with federal investigators and secretly recorded more than 90 conversations with 25 people," Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant said. Bondurant "added that Vaught is now receiving federal protection."

More Charges Filed Against Former Sergeant. The Martinsville (VA) Bulletin (12/28) reported a federal grand jury "has issued a new, six-count indictment against former Henry County sheriff's sergeant Robert Keith Adams in connection with alleged corruption in the sheriff's office. … That indictment, filed in U.S. District Court in Abingdon, alleges that Adams, who worked as a school resource officer and as sergeant in charge of investigations in the criminal division of the sheriff's office, helped cover up the crimes of former sergeant James Alden Vaught and lied to FBI agents who were investigating alleged drug and racketeering crimes at the sheriff's office."

Tennessee Doctor Accused Of Conspiring To Peddle OxyContin Surrenders License. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (12/29, Satterfield) reports a Knoxville doctor "accused of peddling powerful pain-killing pills surrendered his license to dispense legal dope Thursday. Sanford K. Myers appeared before U.S. District Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton Thursday and voluntarily surrendered his U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration certificate that authorized the Knoxville physician to issue prescriptions for narcotic drugs. … In the nine-count indictment, Myers, who operated a clinic on Kingston Pike in West Knoxville, is accused of conspiring with Jay Christopher Ridenour, Charles Ridenour and William Larry Cummings to peddle OxyContin from February 2005 to December 2005."

One-Year Suspension Recommended For Tucson Attorney Indicted On Federal Drug Charges. The Arizona Daily Star (12/28) reported a Tucson attorney who "was indicted on federal drug charges along with a doctor later convicted of conspiracy in a murder case should be suspended for a year," according to the recommendation of a hearing officer. The State Bar of Arizona "filed a complaint against Lourdes Lopez in November 2005, saying she had engaged in criminal conduct that 'reflects adversely on the lawyer's honesty, trustworthiness or fitness as a lawyer in other respects.'" Maret Vessella, deputy chief bar counsel, "said that not only did Lopez commit prescription drug fraud and insurance fraud, lie to the DEA and violate a federal judge's order…but the former Pima County prosecutor also discussed the plot to kill" a man.

MLB Players' Union To Fight Court Ruling On Drug Tests. The AP (12/29) reports Major League Baseball's players association "will fight a federal appeals court's decision to give prosecutors access to the names and urine samples of about 100 players who tested positive for steroids in 2003. If Wednesday's decision 'is allowed to stand it will effectively repeal the Fourth Amendment for confidential electronic records,' wrote Donald Fehr, executive director of the Major League Baseball Players Association."

The Washington Post (12/29, E5, Shipley) reports Fehr "said…he would consult with legal counsel to determine how to keep [the] records out of the hands of federal investigators. … The ruling means more professional baseball players could be ensnared in the drug probe known as BALCO that has already resulted in more than a dozen athlete suspensions and five criminal convictions. San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds is the subject of a perjury investigation in connection with BALCO."

Bloomberg (12/28, Rosenblatt) reported Fehr "said in a statement that prosecutors investigating steroid use seized records for every player as well as 'confidential records of thousands of other people with no connection to baseball, including many with no connection to sports.' … Fehr reiterated arguments the union made in court that the seizure violated the players' constitutional rights against unreasonable searches and seizures."

Report: Federal Agencies Aren't Linking Information To Track Drug Trade, Immigration. The Inland Valley Daily Bulletin (12/29) reports, "In 2005, the Border Patrol apprehended approximately 1.2 million people in the U.S. illegally. Of those, 165,000 were from countries other than Mexico, and roughly 650 were…from special-interest countries, according to the Border Patrol. Those interviewed by the Daily Bulletin say agencies including the FBI and CIA are not using information from Border Patrol and Drug Enforcement Administration agents to make connections between the drug trade, illegal immigration and terrorist organizations. … 'The DEA has made a conscious effort to generate predictive intelligence so policy makers can be aware and plan ahead for significant changes in narcotics and smuggling operations,' said a DEA official who asked to remain anonymous. 'Anytime you send in a predictive piece of intelligence that has merit and it's ignored, then the consequences of that can be devastating to national security.'"

Government Officials Accused Of Remaining In "Willful Ignorance." The Inland Valley Daily Bulletin (12/29) editorializes, "The increased smuggling of drugs, humans and who-knows-what-else through a burgeoning international trade route through Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, and Laredo, Texas, is unsettling. So is the human carnage in the all-out battles among Mexican drug-smuggling cartels to control the Mexican trade route. … But perhaps most unsettling is the disconnect between those on the border's front lines and the higher echelons of the U.S. government, where a seemingly willful ignorance persists. … The FBI and CIA are not using information from Border Patrol and Drug Enforcement Administration agents to make connections among the drug trade, illegal immigration and terrorist organizations."

In Bolivia, US Senators Meet With Morales, Discuss Drug Trafficking. The AP (12/29) reports a delegation of six U.S. senators "led by incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid met Thursday with Bolivian President Evo Morales, seeking to smooth relations with the South American country's left-leaning government." Morales "announced earlier this month that he would seek to significantly expand the area for the legal cultivation of coca. The announcement drew sharp criticism from Washington, which has strenuously objected to any increase in coca production. The two nations, however, signed an agreement guaranteeing $34 million in U.S. anti-narcotics aid for next year." Reid "said the Andean country was 'moving forward' in its fight against drug trafficking."

Authorities Say 19 Killed In Attacks By Brazil Drug Gangs. The AP (12/29) reports drug gangs "set fire to buses and opened fire on police stations and posts around Rio de Janeiro early Thursday in a wave of violence that killed 19 people and wounded 21," according to the state's top law enforcement officer. The victims "included seven who were burned to death in one of four torched buses and two policemen, said Roberto Precioso, head of Rio's Public Safety Department. … Precioso said the attacks were apparently a show of force staged before a new governor is sworn in on Jan. 1. Police intelligence had warned the gangs were planning the attacks for some time." The Wall Street Journal used the AP story.

The New York Times (12/29, Rohter) reports drug gangs "unleashed a wave of attacks on police stations and public roads …Thursday, and at least 19 people were killed in the confrontations. … Brazilian news organizations said the wave of violence was meant as a warning to the new governor of the state of Rio de Janeiro, Sérgio Cabral. Elected in October after a hard-hitting campaign in which crime, drugs and public insecurity were the principal issues, Mr. Cabral takes office on Monday."

BBC News (12/28) reported officials "said the coordinated attacks had probably been planned from jail by imprisoned gang leaders. … Two police officers were among the dead, as well as seven gang members," Precioso said. He "said three suspects had been arrested and added police had occupied ten shantytowns, or favelas, which were controlled by drug gangs."

Bloomberg (12/29, Brasileiro, Blount) reported the violence "comes just four days before New Year's beach festivities and two months before February's Carnival parades, two of the world's largest events and key sources of revenue for the Brazilian city's tourism industry. 'The attacks were meant to destabilize the power of the state, but we have the situation under control and we're prepared to protect the population with added troops,' Precioso said. Rio won't cancel events planned for the weekend because of the attacks, he added."

The UK's Guardian (12/29) reports, "The city's prison secretary suggested that the violence had been planned by criminals from the Mangueira shantytown, a community thought to have links with the First Command of the Capital crime faction in Sao Paulo."

The UK's Independent (12/29) reports Rio's Mayor, Cesar Maia, "said gangs appeared to be retaliating against militias - reportedly run by off-duty police officers - that in recent months have been battling the gangs in slum areas and charging residents for protection."

Three Former Students Plead Guilty To Alabama Church Arsons. The AP (12/21, Rawls) reported, "Three former college students pleaded guilty Wednesday to federal arson charges for burning nine churches in a series of blazes that alarmed rural congregations across Alabama. Matthew Cloyd, Benjamin Nathan Moseley and Russell Lee DeBusk entered the guilty pleas to federal arson and conspiracy charges in the string of church fires set on two nights in February." US District Judge David Proctor "told them they all face minimum seven-year sentences." The AP noted, "The three are also charged with state crimes," and "defense attorneys have been discussing a similar plea deal with county prosecutors, but none has been reached."

Judge Rules Against IRS In Keeping Asset Case In State Court. The Buffalo News (12/29, Habuda) reports, "Rebuffing the Internal Revenue Service, a federal judge Wednesday returned the receivership case involving St. Augustine Center to state court." The News continues, "The nonprofit human services agency that served Buffalo's black community was ordered closed in February by State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek because of financial problems. .. Since then, attorney Adam W. Perry, a court-appointed receiver, developed a plan to pay off creditors and obtain compensation for 85 employees who worked months without pay." The News adds, "After Perry presented his report last month about distributing the center's available assets - including more than $127,000 in unpaid wages - the IRS sought to move the case to federal court. … The IRS argued that the actions contemplated by the receiver would be adverse to the IRS's tax lien of almost $900,000 against St. Augustine and that the receivership action has become one 'against' the United States. … Further, attorneys for the U.S. Justice Department, representing the IRS, threatened last week to sue the former employees and the receiver if the lien wasn't honored." The News notes, "Perry argued before U.S. District Judge John V. Elfvin on Friday to keep the case in Michalek's court. … Elfvin agreed. In a decision issued Wednesday, Elfvin concluded that removing the case from state court had been improper. The judge also denied a conditional petition/motion for emergency injunctive relief that was filed by the IRS after the court clerk's office closed Friday for the holiday weekend. The IRS sought to prevent the receiver from distributing any St. Augustine assets until 10 days after the state court decides another IRS motion."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Vows To "Try To Do Big Things" Despite Lame Duck Status. USA Today (12/29, Page, Jackson, 2.27M) writes on its front page that President Bush, "embattled by the Iraq war, barred from seeking another term in office and facing an emboldened, Democratic-controlled Congress," fits the "textbook definition" of "a lame duck. His final two years in the Oval Office seem destined to be dramatically different and more difficult than his first six. Republicans in Congress, once loyal, have begun to fracture. Democrats in Congress, once powerless, vow to use their new authority to investigate the administration, challenge its policies and chart their own course." But Bush, "calculating how to maneuver during his remaining time in office, insists he can score achievements -- and says he plans to try. 'Look, I came to do big things, and we're still going to try to do big things,' Bush told a private gathering of Republicans after November's election setbacks, according to GOP strategist Charlie Black, who was there. 'Regardless of my popularity and the Congress, I'm going to try to do big things.'"

Bush Tops AP Poll For Both Top Hero, Top Villain Of 2006. The AP (12/28, Superville) writes, "Bad guy of 2006: President Bush. Good guy of 2006: President Bush. When people were asked in an AP-AOL News poll to name the villains and heroes of the year, Bush topped both lists, in a sign of these polarized times." Bush "won the villain sweepstakes by a landslide, with one in four respondents putting him at the top of that list," but "was picked as hero of the year by a much smaller margin. In the poll, 13 percent named him as their favorite, while 6 percent cited the troops in Iraq." Fox News Special Report (12/28, story 7, 0:15, Hume) briefly mentioned the poll.

Roberts Taking His Time In Reshaping Court. The Legal Times (12/29, Mauro) reports, "At the end of John Roberts Jr.'s first full year as chief justice, his tenure is taking shape, framed by sometimes conflicting goals of collegiality, continuity and change." The Times continues, "He leads the nation's highest court more openly and with a lighter touch than his predecessor, the late William Rehnquist, and has quickly endeared himself to Supreme Court staff. But his imprint on the Court as an institution has been measured in small increments so far, as the realization sets in that major change -- such as increasing the size of the Court's docket and reforming the law-clerk-pooling arrangement -- may take years to accomplish. … 'He is trying to bring the old traditions of the Court into the 21st century,' says former Court official Harvey Rishikof. 'It's going to take awhile.'" The Times adds, "Nearly everywhere he goes, Roberts speaks of his desire to preside over a more cohesive and unanimous Court. But with resignation in his voice, he notes that he cannot achieve that goal without active help from his colleagues. … 'I think we're most effective when we operate and function as a court rather than nine separate individuals,' Roberts said at the University of Miami on Nov. 13, adding pointedly, 'I think we all need to do what we can to work toward that end.' … And when, at the Miami talk, ABC News reporter Jan Crawford Greenburg asked him how it felt to join the high court as its boss, Roberts gently corrected her. 'The chief justice really doesn't have a lot of authority of the sort that would cause you to refer to him as a boss.' … But Roberts is not losing sleep over this fact of Supreme Court life. Already steeped in the ways of the Court, Roberts knows that unlike a modern corporate executive who must produce quarterly gains, as a life-tenured chief justice, he can pace himself for the long haul."

Johnson Said To Be Improving. The New York Times (12/29, Zernike, 1.16M) reports Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson "marked his 60th birthday Thursday in the intensive care unit at George Washington University Hospital, where he remains in critical but stable condition two weeks after surgery to stop bleeding in his brain." Neurosurgeon Vivek Deshmukh said, "Senator Johnson's overall general medical condition has improved, and he is gradually being weaned from the sedation. He is opening his eyes and is responsive to his wife." The Times adds Johnson is "expected to undergo more testing in the next few days, and his office said it would release information afterward."

The Washington Post/AP (12/29, A17) reports Julianne Fisher, "a spokeswoman for the senator, said Johnson will not be present in the first days of the new Congress next week but is continuing to improve. She said he is responsive to directions from his wife but has not yet spoken." In a statement yesterday, Johnson's doctors "said he remains in intensive care at George Washington University Hospital. They have released few new details about Johnson's condition and prognosis since the days after the Dec. 13 surgery to stop bleeding in his brain."

Pelosi May Consider Issue Of Bathrooms For Female Representatives. McClatchy (12/29, McClatchy) writes, "When nature calls during a debate or vote in the House of Representatives, what's a member of Congress to do? The answer, even as the first female speaker of the House prepares to be sworn in next month, depends on gender." Male members have an easily accessible restroom, but "reaching the women's equivalent entails traversing a hall where tourists gather, or entering the minority leader's office, navigating a corridor that winds past secretarial desks and punching in a keypad code to ensure restricted access." Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "may revisit…the question of potty parity."

Safire Says "Subpoena" To Be Word Most Heard In 110th Congress. In his annual New York Times (12/29, 1.16M) "Office Pool" column, on the question of the "word most often heard in 110th Congress," Safire offers: "(a) sellout (b) compromise (c) subpoena (d) civility (e) payback," selecting (c).

Economy Could Face "Uphill Climb" In 2007. The Christian Science Monitor (12/29, Scherer, 59K) writes, "It looks as if it will be an uphill climb for the economy next year. Growth could be the slowest in the past five years. The unemployment rate, already at a low level, is likely to rise. Business, which has been on a spending spree, is expected to cut back somewhat. The consumer, the bulwark of the economy, may not be spending quite as freely." But "despite this economic slo-mo, most economists expect a recession-free 2007, the sixth consecutive year without a downturn."

Existing Home Sales Rose In November. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, Conkey, 2.04M) reports sales of existing homes "rose for the second consecutive month in November, a sign of rebounding demand that suggests the economic fallout from the housing market's slump will be limited next year." The National Association of Realtors said sales of existing homes "increased 0.6% from October to an annual rate of 6.28 million units, down 10.7% from a year earlier." The Financial Times (12/29, Cameron) says "most of the rise in existing-home business was driven by sales in the north-east, and volumes continued to fall in the south of the country, which accounted for 38 per cent of nationwide transactions in 2005."

Stocks Down Slightly. NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 7, 0:15, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today stocks were down slightly. The Dow lost nine points [to close at 12,501.52]. The Nasdaq was down more than five points [to close at 2,425.57]."

Ruling In Ohio Workers Compensation Case Sparks Debate. The New York Times (12/29, Driehaus) reports, "The Ohio Supreme Court has upheld a KFC franchise's petition to deny workers' compensation payments to a teenage boy who was severely burned while cleaning a pressure cooker, raising questions from lawyers and the dissenting judges about the basic no-fault tenet of the state's workers' compensation." The Times continues, "The majority in the 5-to-2 decision on Wednesday accepted the argument by the restaurant owner that the boy, David M. Gross, then 16, had voluntarily abandoned his job when he ignored repeated warnings not to boil water in the cooker to clean it. That meant he was not entitled to workers' compensation payments because he no longer had a job when he was injured, the ruling said. … 'This is the worst decision I've seen since I've been practicing law,' said Philip J. Fulton, a workers' compensation lawyer and past president of the Ohio Academy of Trial Lawyers. 'It changes the whole substance of what workers' compensation is supposed to be.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Gross was working at a Dayton-area KFC on Nov. 26, 2003, when boiling water spewed from a pressure cooker and caused third-degree burns around his hip and groin and second-degree burns on his arms, torso and back. Two co-workers were also burned. … Acompany investigation found that Mr. Gross had ignored warnings in the employee handbook and on the cooker as well as repeated warnings by two co-workers and a supervisor. … The Supreme Court majority said Mr. Gross had violated his employment agreement and forfeited his job by ignoring safety instructions: 'Gross willfully ignored repeated warnings not to engage in the proscribed conduct, yet still wishes to ascribe his behavior to simple negligence or inadvertence,' the court wrote. … Edna Scheuer, the lawyer for the restaurant's owner, Food, Folks and Fun, said Thursday that the ruling applied to a very narrow set of circumstances and sought to deny only Mr. Gross's disability claim, which would have paid him 72 percent of his wages for the first three months and then two-thirds of his wages until he recovered."

Ford-Nixon Friendship Seen As One Reason Underlying Pardon. In a 1,200-word front-page Washington Post story (12/29), Bob Woodward reports, "Previously unpublished transcripts of their calls, documents and personal letters provide a portrait of an intensely personal friendship" between former Presidents Gerald Ford and Richard Nixon "dating to the late 1940s but so hidden that few others were even aware of it." Tapes, documents and "two lengthy recent interviews with Ford before his death this week, conducted for a future book and embargoed until after his death, show that the close political alliance between the two men seriously influenced Ford's eventual decision to pardon Nixon, the most momentous decision of his short presidency and almost certainly the one that cost him any chance of winning the White House in his own right two years later." In a 2005 interview, Ford said, "I looked upon him as my personal friend. And I always treasured our relationship. And I had no hesitancy about granting the pardon, because I felt that we had this relationship and that I didn't want to see my real friend have the stigma."

The New York Times (12/29, Shane, 1.16M) reports Ford's decision to pardon Nixon "for any crimes he might have been charged with because of Watergate is seen by many historians as the central event of his 896-day presidency. It also appears to have left him with an uncharacteristic need for self-justification, though friends say he never wavered in his insistence that the pardon was a wise and necessary act and that it had not resulted from any secret deal with his disgraced predecessor." But over "the last three decades, as emotions have cooled, many who were initially critical of the pardon have come to share Mr. Ford's judgment that it was the best way to stanch the open wound of Watergate."

Ford's Misgivings About Iraq War Garner Coverage. In their coverage of the death of former President Ford, both ABC and NBC cover Ford's comments to journalist Bob Woodward on the Iraq war. ABC World News (12/28, lead story, 3:45, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported, "Bob Woodward knows how to get powerful people to talk. It was a four-hour conversation in July 2004. And Woodward came away convinced that the former President was telling him what he really thought about Iraq. Ford told Woodward that President Bush fought the wrong war --" Ford: "I don't think I would have ordered the Iraq war." Stephanopoulos: "-- for the wrong reasons." Ford: "I think Rumsfeld , Cheney, and the President made a big mistake in justifying going into the war in Iraq. They put the emphasis on weapons of mass destruction. I've never publicly said that I thought they made a mistake, but I felt very strongly that it was an error."

NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 3, 2:15, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "Gerald Ford, loyal to the end to his closest former aides, Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld, was privately torn about their most controversial policy, the Iraq war. Only weeks before his last visit to Washington in 2004 he told author Bob Woodward he strongly disagreed with the decision to invade Iraq. Woodward taped the interview with the former President's knowledge. … The former President didn't know George W. Bush very well and is not known to have offered him advice on Iraq, but he told Woodward -- " Ford: "And I just don't think we should go hellfire damnation around the globe freeing people unless it is directly related to our own national security."

Bush To Miss Saturday Night Capitol Ceremony. The Washington Post (12/29, A19, Abramowitz, Layton, 690K) reports President Bush "declared a national day of mourning and ordered the federal government to close Tuesday to mark the death of Gerald R. Ford. Financial markets will be partially closed in observation of his passing as well." Though Bush "opted not to cut short a week-long stay at his ranch here to return for Saturday night's ceremony, when Ford's body will be brought to the Rotunda of the U.S. Capitol," he and the First Lady "will head immediately to the Capitol upon their return to Andrews Air Force Base on Monday to pay respects at the casket."

The CBS Evening News (12/28, story 6, 2:30, Whitaker, 7.66M) reported, "All US Presidents are entitled to a state funeral with military pomp and public ceremony, but Gerald Ford, a humble man, had to be persuaded." Still, "it will be simpler than some in recent memory."

The Washington Times/AP (12/29, Woodward) reports, "Less pomp, more circumstance. Gerald R. Ford's state funeral is missing some of the grandeur of the one for Ronald Reagan two years ago, a reflection of the 38th president's modest ways and lesser imprint on the nation, according to further planning details released Thursday." Part of it "will be missing President Bush, too."

USA Today (12/29, 4A, Kasindorf, 2.27M) reports the nation "begins six days of farewells to President Gerald Ford in state funeral ceremonies stretching from the California desert to the U.S. Capitol and a Michigan hillside." Observances are "scheduled to begin with a private prayer ceremony for the Ford family at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church in Palm Desert, Calif., where Ford and his wife, Betty, worshiped together for 29 years."

DC Mayor-Elect Delays Inaugural Celebration For Ford Day Of Mourning. The Washington Post (12/29, B1, Silverman, 690K) reports DC Mayor-elect Adrian M. Fenty "decided yesterday to postpone his inaugural celebrations, including a party that was expected to draw up to 15,000 people, because Tuesday has been declared a national day of mourning for former president Gerald R. Ford." Fenty will "still become mayor that day, taking the oath and succeeding Anthony A. Williams in a private ceremony. But he pushed back a public inauguration for himself and the D.C. Council until Wednesday and reset his inaugural ball for Jan. 6."

Ford Didn't Recommend Himself As Agnew Replacement. ABC World News (12/28, story 2, 2:05, Reynolds, 8.78M) reported, "Beyond the standard trappings of chief executive memorabilia" at the Ford Presidential Museum in Grand Rapids, Michigan, "the truly unprecedented nature of the Ford Presidency and Vice Presidency becomes more and more apparent with every step you take." On "one wall can be found a 1973 note from then-Congressman Ford to President Richard Nixon, touting candidates as vice presidential replacements for the disgraced Spiro Agnew. Note that Ford's own name is not on the list."

Hometown Remembers Ford For Accomplishments, Not Pardon. The New York Times (12/29, Bunkley, 1.16M) reports that in Grand Rapids, Michigan, some residents "had to be reminded by news reports about Mr. Ford's death that he is best remembered in most other parts of the United States for pardoning his predecessor, Richard M. Nixon. They have always known him as the athletic Eagle Scout who lost his bid to be president of South High School's senior class before serving them in Congress for 25 years, ascending to the White House and helping to heal a nation scarred by the Watergate scandal."

Ford Asked Carter To Speak At Funeral. The New York Times (12/29, Kornblut, 1.16M) reports that as he "helped in recent years arrange the details of his own funeral, Gerald R. Ford reached out to an old adversary: Jimmy Carter, who defeated him for the presidency in 1976." Ford "asked whether his successor might consider speaking at his funeral and offered, lightheartedly, to do the same for Mr. Carter, depending on who died first."

DOJ_NMG_0109963

Ford Was Active Civically At Local Level. The Washington Post (12/29, A18, Pomfret, Geis, 690K) reports that in Ford's "regular-guy lifestyle distinguished him from other former presidents," and his "biggest achievement -- helping his wife found the Betty Ford Center, the internationally known substance-abuse rehabilitation facility -- could be said to pale in comparison. But in his quiet unhurried way, friends and others said, the ex-president, who died here Tuesday, was a model citizen, known for the courtesy with which he treated people and the sincerity with which he lent his time and money."

Ford Widely Appreciated In DC Area. The Washington Post (12/29, A18, Montes, 690K) reports, "Long before the rest of the nation recognized his signature qualities -- his hardworking manner, his kind regard for others, his basic decency -- friends and associates in the D.C. area knew that Gerry Ford was a prince of a guy."

Betty Ford's Resilience, Independence Noted. The Washington Post (12/29, C1, Tucker, 690K) profiles former First Lady Betty Ford's resilience in the face of adversity, saying she "didn't become the most admired woman in America during one of the most turbulent periods in national history because she made nice. She was so admired in the mid-1970s, and is beloved by a wide swath of the nation today, because she was bluntly honest and because, after everything life has thrown at her, she never quit."

The Dallas Morning News (12/29, Harris, 500K) reports, "Not since the days of Eleanor Roosevelt had any first lady spoken so freely on topical issues." ABC World News (12/28, story 6, 2:55, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "If her husband was the accidental President, Betty Ford was an accidental First Lady. At a time when the country yearned for truth, her disarming openness distinguished her."

Ford Demonstrated Good Humor Despite Portrayal As "Klutz" On SNL. The New York Times (12/29, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports, "No one did more to solidify Mr. Ford's unfortunate, and perhaps unfair, standing as the nation's First Klutz than" Chevy Chase, "the 'Saturday Night Live' cast member who routinely portrayed the president committing all manner of trips, flails and lurches." Ford's "cheerful reaction to the sendup included doing a cameo for 'Saturday Night Live' from the Oval Office; sending his press secretary, Ron Nessen, on the show; and appearing with Mr. Chase at a political dinner. That type of reaction became a benchmark of what would come to be an essential presidential image-making skill: an ability to laugh at oneself."

Dionne Says Bush Praise For Ford Is Right. In his Washington Post column (12/29, A27), E.J. Dionne reviews readers' email from the year, concluding, "Finally, a great many readers were frustrated that I have been rather consistently critical of President Bush -- though a few wanted more criticism. So please permit me to end the year in the conciliatory spirit of Gerald Ford." Speaking "on Wednesday morning, Bush declared that Ford 'came along when we needed him most' and that Americans came to know him 'as a man of complete integrity who led our country with common sense and kind instincts.' President Bush is entirely right."

Kondracke Recalls Ford's Honesty. In his Roll Call column (12/29), Morton Kondracke says former President Ford was "straightforward, honest, uncomplicated, salt-of-the-earth Midwestern, an Eagle Scout nearly incapable of dissembling. He was just what the country needed after the traumas of Watergate — the product of former President Richard Nixon's deviousness and paranoia." But Ford's "straight-forwardness limited his imagination, too. As a regular Republican Congressional leader, he voted against federally funded housing, aid to education, the Medicare program and former President Lyndon Johnson's war on poverty."

Ben-Veniste Says Ford Should Have Required Nixon Acknowledge Wrongdoing. In a Washington Post op-ed (12/29, A27), Watergate prosecutor Richard Ben-Veniste says, "While I do not believe Ford was wrong to pardon Nixon, the timing of the pardon was premature and may have cost Ford the margin of victory in the 1976 election. Had Ford kept to his original plan and allowed time for formal charges to be lodged against Nixon, spelling out the specifics of his culpability, it would have been up to Nixon to either accept the pardon or fight the charges in court. But pardoning Nixon without requiring at least an acknowledgment of responsibility for serious misconduct and for lying to the public left the door open for the spate of revisionist books and articles that followed the resignation."

Edwards Enters Presidential Race With Announcement In New Orleans. Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee, on Thursday officially entered the 2008 race for president, announcing his bid from the Hurricane Katrina-ravaged Lower Ninth Ward in New Orleans. ABC World News (12/28, story 4, :45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There was, today, still another entry into the race to succeed President Bush." John Edwards: "I'm candidate for the presidency of the United States." Gibson: "Edwards made the announcement in a New Orleans neighborhood, devastated by Hurricane Katrina. He praised volunteers who helped rebuild there. And called it an example for national action." John Edwards: "If we want to change this country, and we want to move America in the way it needs to move, we're going to have to do it, all of us together. Instead of staying home and complaining, we're asking people to help."

NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 6, 2:10, Brown, 9.87M) reported on Edwards' presidential bid announcement. NBC (Reid) related, "John Edwards said he chose New Orleans to announce because of the deep poverty revealed by Hurricane Katrina, still raw 16 months later." Edwards: "New Orleans in so many ways shows the two Americas that I have talked about in the past." Reid: "If that sounds familiar two Americas, one rich and one poor it is the same theme he ran on in 2004 and lost. The question now, what is the difference this time around?" Edwards: "You learn a lot from going through a national campaign. I certainly learned a lot."

Fox News Special Report (12/28, story 5, 3:30, Hume) also reported on Edwards' announcement that he will make a second run for the White House. Fox News (Garrett) noted that Edwards "endorsed the idea of universal health care, but provided no details. And even though economic growth, driven in part by Bush tax cuts has generated tens of billions in new and unexpected revenue, Edwards called for higher taxes on the wealthy and big oil companies." Edwards: "We do need, in my judgment, to get rid of some of the tax cuts that have been put in place, particularly for people at the top. I think that it may be necessary to put in place a tax on some of the windfall profits that oil companies are making." Garrett: "Edwards said higher taxes fit into a model of sacrifice Americans should embrace. Another example, increasing energy conservation." Edwards: "We need to ask Americans to be willing to be patriotic about something beyond war."

Appearing on Fox News (12/28, Chetry), Edwards said, "Anybody who's considering running for president, I hope, is doing it because they want to serve this country. And speaking for myself as an American, that's why I'm running for president. And I think we need the best possible president in 2009. I hope we have the best possible candidates, both on my side, the Democrats, and on the Republican side, because the American people need to have real choices. … I think that Sen. Obama, Sen. Clinton, other people who've talked about running on our side, and some of the people who it looks like are going to run on the other side, are all good people and I think we want those kind of choices in the race. I think it's for America to decide what it is I have to offer."

The AP (12/29, Pickler) reports that Edwards announced his bid "with new ideas that make him a very different candidate the second time around. In 2004, Edwards was the moderate southern senator who promoted middle class tax cuts and tried to position himself as the best general election alternative to President Bush. This time the 53-year-old faces a tougher fight for the Democratic nomination and has a more progressive campaign of eliminating poverty, reducing global warming and providing universal health care for all Americans." In 2004, Edwards "stressed his up-from-the-bootstraps biography that turned the son of a mill worker into a successful trial attorney and then senator. This time around, Edwards didn't mention one word about his personal story. He talked less about what he wanted to do as president and more about how everyone can change the country."

The New York Times (12/29, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports Edwards kicked off his 2008 campaign "with an appeal to citizens to take on challenges like the one represented by this still-devastated city." The choice of the "battered New Orleans neighborhood for Mr. Edwards's unconventional announcement, with student volunteers at his side, was intended to highlight what, in broad terms, would be a central theme of his campaign: the need for a fresh wave of citizen activism to 'change this country.'" Edwards "seemed at pains to begin on a positive note. He delivered a Kennedy-like appeal for grass-roots volunteerism rather than a broadside against President Bush, though he called Mr. Bush's foreign policy team 'an absolute disaster' in the question-and-answer session afterward."

McClatchy (12/29, Christensen) reports, "The Ninth Ward section of the city is still strewn with boarded-up homes and piles of debris 16 months after the area was flooded by Hurricane Katrina. 'New Orleans in so many ways shows the two Americas that I have talked about in the past,' Edwards said. Edwards said it wasn't just the business of government to rebuild destroyed neighborhoods, although he criticized the Bush administration for doing too little. He said he would use his campaign as a 'call to action' to encourage private groups to help those in need in New Orleans and elsewhere. … 'If you walk around these neighborhoods, what you'll hear is that most of the good that has been done in New Orleans has been done by faith-based groups, charity groups and volunteers,' Edwards said."

The Washington Times (12/29, Hurt, 88K) reports that Edwards "took the opportunity yesterday to criticize the Bush administration for its handling of the post-hurricane rescue efforts, cleanup and rebuilding in New Orleans. 'I think if the president of the United States had come to New Orleans, spent some time here -- I mean, the president has a lot of responsibilities, he can't stake himself out for the long term in New Orleans -- but he should have spent a period of days here, saw what was actually happening on the ground and then demanded action,' Mr. Edwards said."

The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Finnegan, 850K) reports that Edwards' "announcement came as no surprise; he has been preparing for the campaign for more than two years. To maximize media exposure, he timed his announcement for the normally slow news week before New Year's. The death this week of former President Gerald Ford complicated that plan, but Edwards still drew more than 20 news crews to his chilly morning announcement in New Orleans."

Edwards Says US Should Begin Troop Withdrawal From Iraq, Blasts Bush On Foreign Policy. The Washington Post (12/29, A1, Balz, 690K) reports in a front page story that Edwards kicked off his second presidential bid "with a call for the United States to reduce its troop presence in Iraq and a plea for citizen action to combat poverty, global warming and America's reliance on foreign oil." Edwards was "sharply critical of the administration for its conduct of the war in Iraq, and he again recanted his own vote authorizing President Bush to take the country to war, which he called a mistake." Edwards said, "The biggest responsibility of the next president of the United States is to reestablish America's leadership role in the world, starting with Iraq. We need to make it clear that we intend to leave Iraq and turn over the responsibility of Iraq to the Iraqi people."

USA Today (12/29, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports that Edwards "called his vote to authorize the Iraq war 'a mistake' for which he takes full responsibility. The one-term senator said he has been "all over the world" in the last two years and has increased his depth of knowledge of world affairs. He said it's fair to question his level of experience but said that doesn't guarantee vision or good judgment. He cited President Bush, Vice President Cheney and former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld prove his point. They were 'extraordinarily experienced,' he said, but their tenure has been 'an absolute disaster by any measure.' He criticized the Bush administration for making it difficult to engage other countries on international problems. 'The world is literally in chaos,' he said. 'When America doesn't lead, there is no stability. We are the stabilizing force in the world.'"

The Financial Times (12/29, Sevastopuloin) reports that Edwards "said his top priority would be restoring America's image. 'The biggest responsibility of the next president of the United States is to re-establish America's leadership role in the world, starting with Iraq,' said Mr Edwards. 'We have to show that we have the moral authority to lead. You can't lead through raw power.'" Edwards "said the US needed to get more involved in solving the crisis in Darfur and said America should join the International Criminal Court."

Edwards Launches Nationwide Tour To Promote His Candidacy. Bloomberg (12/29, Johnston) reports that Edwards "embarked on a cross-country campaign to promote his new presidential bid after getting the jump on some fellow Democrats by announcing his populist candidacy in hurricane-ravaged New Orleans. Seeking to build support against a formidable slate of possible opponents," Edwards "appeared at a town hall meeting in" Des Moines, Iowa, "home to the nation's first presidential caucus, before heading to New Hampshire, site of the first primary election in 2008. In Iowa, Edwards is tied in early polls with Barack Obama and ahead of Hillary Clinton, two senators who are likely to join the race soon.

The Des Moines Register (12/29, Simons, 160K) reports that Edwards, speaking in Des Moines "during the 90-minute town hall meeting," said that he's "working on a true universal health care plan, not just access to health care or affordable health care. It's part of taking care of the nation's people and America proving itself once again as a model for the rest of the world, he said. 'We need to be patriotic for something other than just war,' he said."

Edwards Announcement Seen As Putting Pressure On Kerry To Make Decision. The Boston Globe (12/29, Milligan, 413K) reports that Edwards' "entry into the race as the third candidate for the Democratic nomination puts pressure on" Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D), Edwards' former running mate, "to make his decision, since the two former colleagues and running mates will be competing for a finite pool of money and support, analysts said. … 'It's one more indication that if Kerry's going to get in, he needs to get in fairly quickly,' said Merle Black, a political science professor and campaign specialist at Emory University in Atlanta. 'He's going to have trouble raising money and getting staff.' Kerry spokesman David Wade said the senator would announce his intentions after New Year's Day but felt no need to rush his decision."

Edwards Said To Be Pushing "Old-Fashioned Latin Populism." In her Wall Street Journal (12/29, A9, O'Grady, 2.04M) column, Mary Anastasia O'Grady compares Edwards with the recent class of Latin American populists, saying that "old-fashioned Latin populism -- what John Edwards is hawking to the U.S. electorate for 2008 -- is as chic in the region today as it was 25 years ago, and its persistence is seriously threatening Latin progress."

Obama Expresses Opposition To US Troop Surge In Iraq. The Washington Times (12/29, Bellantoni, 88K) reports that Illinois Sen. Barack Obama on Thursday "joined a chorus of potential Democratic presidential candidates criticizing U.S. policy in Iraq, telling supporters he opposes sending more troops and urging them to send letters to persuade President Bush to change the course of the war." President Bush "is thought to favor sending 20,000 to 40,000 additional troops to Baghdad, an idea several Democratic White House prospects have criticized. In an e-mail titled 'Escalation is not the answer,' Mr. Obama yesterday asked voters to tell Mr. Bush 'our soldiers are not numbers to add just because someone couldn't think of a better idea.'" Obama's "message includes a link to the White House's 'contact' page."

Franks Backs Hunter Over McCain In GOP White House Race. The Arizona Republic (12/29, House) reports, "One of Arizona's most conservative U.S. House members is endorsing a California congressman over Sen. John McCain for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, saying it is 'what's right for America.' 'I think the senator knows there's nothing personal on my part,'" AZ2 Rep. Trent Franks (R) "said of his support of" CA52 Rep. Duncan Hunter (R), the "outgoing chairman of the House Armed Services Committee." Franks said that "he already has stumped alongside Hunter, who advocates in favor of strong military and for border security. Hunter announced the formation of his presidential exploratory committee in October." The Republic notes that "without criticizing McCain directly, Franks described Hunter as a candidate who 'is an unequivocal social conservative and fiscal conservative and has a consistent conservative voting record.' 'He is one of the true Reagan Revolutionaries in Congress,' Franks said."

Krugman Says "Radical Right" Failed To Govern. In his New York Times column (12/29), Paul Krugman criticizes the "Republican Revolution" of 1994, saying, "As long as people like" Dick Armey, Newt Gingrich and Tom DeLay "were out of power, they could run on promises to eliminate vast government waste that existed only in the public's imagination — all those welfare queens driving Cadillacs. But once in power, they couldn't deliver. That's why government by the radical right has been an utter failure even on its own terms: the government hasn't shrunk. Federal outlays other than interest payments and defense spending are a higher percentage of G.D.P. today than they were when Mr. Armey wrote his book: 14.8 percent in fiscal 2006, compared with 13.8 percent in fiscal 1995."

Latino Political Power Said To Have Emerged In 2006. In a USA Today op-ed (12/29, 13A), Raul Reyes, a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors, says, "2006 was the 'Year of the Immigrant,' driven by a fierce national debate over what the country should do about 12 million undocumented immigrants. The subsequent restrictive policy proposals were not surprising. But the massive pro-immigrant marches were astonishing, and invigorating." By fall, "the intolerant tone of conservatives only served to remind us of our own roots. So did passage of several restrictive local laws aimed at illegal aliens, as well as congressional approval of a 700-mile fence along the U.S.-Mexico border. So in the congressional elections, Latinos deserted the party of The Fence." Democrats now "have the challenge of retaining a Hispanic constituency that is increasingly complicated."

Ignatius Notes Key Challenges, People For 2007. In his Washington Post column (12/29, A27), David Ignatius writes on "three people who symbolize for me some of the difficulties of the year we have just lived through and also the promise and potential of the one ahead. Each of them reminds me that we are walking into the future balanced on a tightrope." Mohammad Baqer Qalibaf, the mayor of Tehran, "embodies Iran's potential to become a great nation -- and perhaps to escape the apocalyptic confrontation with the West that is proclaimed by his political rival, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad." In listening to Sallai Meridor, the new Israeli ambassador to Washington, "I sense that for his generation of Israelis, there is a dawning recognition that a Palestinian state living in peace with Israel is crucial for its future as a democratic Jewish state." And Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff "wants to stay focused on the biggest risks out over the horizon -- the nuclear or biological attacks that could kill hundreds of thousands of Americans. I admire Chertoff's dedication, but I have a nagging worry that his collection of bureaucratic agencies isn't up to the job of keeping America safe."

Schwarzenegger Recovering From Surgery. Fox News Special Report (12/28, story 8, 0:20, Hume) reported Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "continues to recover from surgery to repair a leg he broke in a skiing accident last weekend. Schwarzenegger says he has been meeting with his staff while he is hospitalized and is working on his state of the state address." The Los Angeles Times (12/29, 850K) says Schwarzenegger's office "released two photographs of the governor in his hospital bed, surrounded by monitors. He was dressed in hospital garb with a sheet covering his legs, and he appeared to be signing or editing documents. An intravenous tube was protruding from his right hand, and a laptop computer was perched at his bedside. 'I woke up feeling great,' he said in a statement. He said he was looking forward to his inauguration next month 'even if it means I have to walk into my swearing-in ceremony on crutches.'"

Many New State, Local Laws Take Effect Monday. The Christian Science Monitor (12/29, Wood, 59K) and USA Today (12/29, Cauchon, 2.27M) both looks at some of the state and local laws that will take effect on Monday. The Monitor says that "besides providing creative solutions to mundane problems like frustration over automated phone attendants, the laws that go into effect next Monday in 32 states reveal several trends: Five states will increase their minimum wages, nine states will implement more stringent policies on citizens' privacy to curb problems associated with identity theft, and five states will mandate new recreation regulations."

Minnesota Politics In Upheaval After 2006 State Elections. The New York Times (12/29, Johnson, 1.16M) reports on the changing political situation in Minnesota, where Democrats flipped the state House, increased their majority in the state Senate, and came within 22,000 votes of defeating Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty. Minnesota's capital "'is in many ways the perfect petri dish for testing what the nation's new political landscape may produce. Once predictably Democratic in national politics, the anchor of Upper Midwest liberal populism from the 1920s through Hubert Humphrey and Walter Mondale, Minnesota is now considered a battleground, with the Republicans scheduled to hold their national convention in 2008 in Minneapolis and St. Paul around that declaration." The Democrats "won big here," but "they emerged divided, too, owing much of their surge to newly elected moderates from the suburbs who are unlikely to embrace a pure liberal agenda. The Republicans lost big, but were pushed toward the center as well, led by Mr. Pawlenty, who has said since the election that many of his second-term priorities will overlap with those of the Democrats he fiercely battled in his first four years."

Virginia Republicans Conferring To Solve Divisions On Transportation. The Washington Post (12/29, A1, Shear, 690K) reports top Virginia Republicans, "including the state's attorney general and the party's former national chairman, have been holding secret meetings for weeks in the hopes of finding an end to the war among their party's lawmakers and reaching a compromise on funding for transportation, several participants said." Some of the GOP's "biggest names from outside the General Assembly fear that the rift between leaders in the GOP-led House of Delegates and state Senate will cause Republicans to lose big in elections in November, especially in Northern Virginia, unless something is done to ease congestion."

WPost Says Maryland Must Raise Taxes To Bridge Deficit. The Washington Post (12/29, A26, 690K) says in an editorial that Maryland's "fiscal problems are gathering like thunderheads." Despite Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley's "dismissive treatment of projected deficits during the fall campaign, it seems increasingly likely that his term in office will be marked not by the hundreds of millions of dollars in initiatives and new spending he liked to talk about on the stump but by his ability to manage and contain shortfalls estimated to run into billions of dollars." O'Malley "has not ruled out new taxes, which will inevitably be part of any solution to a fiscal problem on the scale of Maryland's. But he seems determined to defer a major push on revenue until his second year in office, perhaps by naming a commission to 'study' the problem." O'Malley is "looking increasingly cavalier, and possibly foolish, to postpone a serious reckoning."

Somali Transitional Government Troops Remove Islamists From Power. The New York Times (12/29, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports that in Somalia, "thousands of troops of the transitional government marched into" Mogadishu Thursday "in a stunning reversal of fortune." In five days, "the internationally recognized government, a fledging authority that had been so weak it was marooned in a provincial market town, captured the formidable capital and most of Somalia," with "more than a little help from Ethiopia." The Islamists were "vanquished," or removed from power "faster than anyone had expected." The Ethiopians say "they have no intention of staying and that their mission to neutralize the threat in Somalia has been mostly accomplished."

The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Sanders, Albadri, 850K) reports on Thursday morning, "residents awoke this morning to find the Ethiopians and troops of Somalia's UN-backed transitional government taking positions." Government officials "spent most of Thursday meeting with clan leaders to ensure there would be no remnants of the Islamic forces hiding in Mogadishu when they entered, and that the local population would welcome their soldiers." US and Ethiopian officials had "accused the Islamists of plotting to establish a Taliban-style regime and use Somalia as a base to launch terrorist attacks." Prime minister of the transitional government, Ali Mohammed Gedi, declared, "The fighting is over."

Transition Stirs Uneasiness In Somalia. The Washington Times/AP (12/29, Hassan) reports, "Ethiopian soldiers stopped on the outskirts of town, after providing much of the military might in the offensive that shattered what had seemed an unbeatable Islamist militia. Islamist fighters fled south vowing to continue the battle." Amidst celebrations, "many in overwhelmingly Muslim Somalia are suspicious of the transitional government's reliance on neighboring Ethiopia, a traditional rival with a large Christian population and one of East Africa's biggest armies."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/29, Crilly, 59K) reports, "Residents said they feared a return to 15 years of anarchy," and analysts warn that "the quick victory over the Islamists…leaves a dangerous vacuum in a country that has only recently seen calm." Analysts contend that "without a political strategy," Somalia "risks becoming a quagmire that sucks in neighboring countries." They also said that "if the Ethiopians withdraw quickly," then "radical elements within the courts…might run a guerrilla campaign, drawing in foreign fighters."

US Pitch For Iran Sanctions Receives "Tepid" Response. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, A4, King, 2.04M) reports, "Armed at last with a set of limited United Nations sanctions against Iran's nuclear program, the Bush administration has been stepping up efforts to persuade countries in Europe and Asia to go further and cut off bank lending and other financial interactions with Iran." International response has been "tepid," and European officials want to first "implement and enforce Saturday's package of limited sanctions on Iran." Senior US officials say that the Dec. 23 UN resolution is "crucial because it provides countries with the legal justification to push for tighter financial controls against Iran within their own systems."

Israel Says Egypt Sends Abbas Weapons. The New York Times (12/29, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports, "After coordination with Israel and the United States, Egypt has sent weapons and ammunition into the Gaza Strip to forces loyal to the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah," Israeli officials said Thursday. Senior Palestinian officials "denied the report." The Bush Administration is "seeking Congressional support for up to $100 million, mostly for salaries and training, to strengthen Mr. Abbas and his security forces and extend their control over the Gaza crossing points." A senior US official "insisted that the point was not to promote civil war with Hamas, but to help Mr. Abbas and Fatah and 'to provide deterrence and balance' in Gaza, where Hamas is especially strong." The arms shipment is "part of a broader American and Israeli effort."

Beirut Celebrates Holidays Despite Struggles. The New York Times (12/29, Fattah, 1.16M) reports that though holiday cheer "lent downtown Beirut the feel of a Christmas fair for much of this week," even the Christmas celebration "turned political." Rallies have been "muted in recent days so families could celebrate Christmas or prepare for Id al-Adha, the Muslim Feast of Sacrifice, at the weekend." However, opposition leaders "threaten to raise the pitch next week, suggesting that they may block highways and access to Beirut's airport."

Russia, Belarus Prepare For Gas Showdown. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, A3, Cullison, Crawford, Miller, 2.04M) reports, "Russia and the former Soviet state of Belarus are heading toward a showdown over natural-gas prices that both sides warn could lead to a New Year's Day pipeline shut-off similar to the one that hit Ukraine a year ago, which had ripple effects across Europe." However, analysts say there is "less likelihood of a political firestorm over any Russian cutoff this year."

USA Today (12/29, 8A, Stinson, 2.27M) reports, "Gazprom, Russia's state-controlled natural gas monopoly, has told Belarus to pay double the current price for gas by New Year's Day or supplies will be cut." The company also "demanded a stake in the pipeline carrying gas from Belarus to other European customers." Belarus has "rejected the demands," even though Gazprom is the world's "biggest gas producer," and "provides 25% of the natural gas consumed by Europe." Analysts say the dispute shows how Russia is "tightening its grip on energy production and distribution to squeeze higher prices from its neighbors."

Bulgaria, Romania Enter EU On Monday. The Christian Science Monitor (12/29, Jordan, 59K) reports "despite Western fears that hordes of desperate, job-seeking Bulgarians and Romanians will again flood the European Union when their countries become members on Jan. 1," but many "have compelling reasons to stay home." Krassen Stanchev, executive director of the Institute for Market Economics in Sofia, said, "Some believe 'paradise' is in Western Europe, but some of this paradise will soon be coming here." Both Bulgaria and Romania expect "a multibillion-euro infusion of EU aid and foreign investment after New Year's," and already, their economies "are roaring, growing at 7 percent and 6 percent, respectively."

Turkmen Leader's Death Could Lead To Chaos. In a Wall Street Journal (12/29, A8, 2.04M) op-ed, Uzbek journalist and novelist Hamid Ismailov eulogizes Saparmurat Niyazov, Turkmenistan's president who died last week: "Turkmenbashi ('Head of all Turkmen')…was, as his foreign obituarists noted, 'eccentric' even by Central Asia's high standards. Niyazov abolished opera, ballet and circus, arts that were foreign, according to him, to the Turkmen mentality; to nurture this 'mentality,' he wrote 'Ruhname' (Book of Spirit), a compilation of reinvented history, folklore and pseudo-philosophical maxims to rival the Quran." Ismailov lists a number of further perceived eccentricities, noting however that "mesmerized with his notorious idiosyncrasies, the outside world paid less attention to the dark side of Turkmen reality. Politicians and journalists who dared think independently disappeared." Ismailov predicts a chaotic transition of power, possibly to Niyazov's son Murad, "who upon the news of the old man's death swiftly imprisoned his rival and constitutionally next-in-line, the parliament speaker, and declared himself acting president."

Buddhists Flee Bangkok From Militant Insurgency. The Washington Times (12/29, Ehrlich, 88K) reports, "Buddhists are fleeing their homes in southern Thailand in the face of an increasingly militant Muslim insurgency that has begun calling for an independent and pure Islamist nation in the impoverished region bordering Malaysia." Bangkok has "developed into a battle reflecting extremism in Iraq and Afghanistan, including beheadings and the burning of schools." In addition, "200 Buddhist villagers in the Yala province have fled."

China's Economy Likely To Have Expanded 10.5% This Year. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, Zheng, Ruan, 2.04M) reports, "China's economy is likely to have expanded 10.5% in 2006, the chief economist of the National Bureau of Statistics said yesterday." Yao Jingyuan, senior official of the statistics bureau said that "combined value of China's imports and exports likely rose 25% in 2006 to $1.7 trillion." He warned that the economy is "still facing risks of overheating," but the government "should also guard against any big slowdown in growth."

USA Today Says Ban's UN Obstacles Are "Not Impossible." The USA Today (12/29, 11A, 2.27M) editorializes that even though Ban Ki Moon faces immediate challenges as he takes over as the UN's secretary-general, Ban's mission "is not impossible." His challenges "cry out for a strong and authoritative figure," and Ban's reputation is "that of a self-effacing bureaucrat." To "rebuilt the trust of the UN," Ban can start by "focusing on making the UN bureaucracy more accountable," "making a new diplomatic push to halt the genocide in Sudan's Darfur region," and "start gathering troops for quick deployment if and when Sudan's leaders accept them."

WSJournal Says Bush AIDS, Malaria Initiative Shows Progress. The Wall Street Journal (12/29, A8, 2.04M) editorializes that 2006 was "a year of progress on both fronts," on AIDS and malaria. The White House's malaria summit this month had a message of "accountability," and not just "spending more money." Since President Bush "launched his $15 billion plan for AIDS relief in 2003," the US "has provided life-saving antiretroviral drugs for 822,000 people," while providing care for "another 4.5 million people such as AIDS orphans." This is "only a fraction of the 39 million HIV infections world-wide, 62% of them in sub-Saharan Africa," but the Bush Administration is "showing with AIDS and malaria is that a well managed effort can save millions from an early grave."

LATimes Chides Archbishop Of Canterbury For "Selective" Critique Of Mideast. The Los Angeles Times (12/29, 850K) editorializes, "In blaming an exodus of Christians from the Middle East on the 'short-sightedness and ignorance' that led to the war in Iraq," Archbishop of Canterbury Rowan Williams "has identified a part -- but only a part -- of the sad phenomenon he rightly decries." In a Times of London essay, the Church of England head "notes that opponents of the Iraq war had warned that Western military action 'would put Christians in the whole Middle East at risk.' Williams says that events since the 2003 invasion of Iraq, including the departure from Iraq of thousands of Christians, have made prophets of war critics. 'The first Christian believers were Middle Easterners,' Williams writes. 'It's a very sobering thought that we might live to see the last native Christian believers in the region.'" There is "some truth in Williams' sermon," but his "critique is selective."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Holiday Publishing Notice. In observance of the federal New Year's Day holiday, the Attorney General's News Briefing will not be published on Monday, January 1. News from the holiday will be included in your Tuesday, January 2, briefing.

Five New York Terror Convicts Moved To Indiana Prison. The Buffalo News (12/29, Herbeck) reports, "Five of the six members of the Lackawanna Six have been transferred to a federal prison in Indiana, and their families are trying to find out why." The News continues, "Their attorneys confirmed Wednesday that Shafal A. Mosed, 28; Mukhtar al-Bakri, 26; Yasein A. Taher, 29; Faysal H. Galab, 30; and Sahim Alwan, 34; were all recently moved to the Federal Correctional Institution in Terre Haute, Ind. The U.S. Bureau of Prisons also verified that the men are being held there." The News adds, "Family members of the five men are upset because most of them were held previously in facilities much closer to Western New York. Now family members will have to drive 570 miles - more than nine hours - to visit the convicted conspirators in Terre Haute. They also could take a flight to Indianapolis, about 70 miles from Terre Haute. … Some supporters of the men wonder if the move is part of a government effort to toughen the punishment they already are receiving for traveling to Afghanistan and training with the al-Qaida terrorist group. … 'They were all snatched up and moved [earlier this month],' said Alwan's attorney, James P. Harrington. 'This makes it extraordinarily hard for their families to visit them. From what we understand, their telephone and visitation time are being drastically cut, too.' … Harrington and other defense attorneys are trying to find out the reason for the move and whether it is punitive." The News notes, "Harrington said he has heard that the government wants to keep all federal prisoners from terrorism-related prosecutions in one facility. … 'This is very unusual, because the Bureau of Prisons rarely puts multiple defendants from one criminal case in the same prison,' said Galab's attorney, Joseph M. LaTona. 'They usually keep them separated.' … Aside from verifying that the five men are at the medium-security prison in Terre Haute, U.S. Bureau of Prisons officials had no comment on the move Wednesday. A prison spokesman, Michael Truman, said he was unaware of any plan to move all the convicts from terrorism-related cases to one facility."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

House Panel Report Says DOJ, FBI Mishandled OKC Bombing Probe. CNN's American Morning (12/28, M. O'Brien) reported, "In our closer look this morning, the bombing of the federal building in Oklahoma City, eleven years ago now. A congressional subcommittee is out with a new report blasting the Justice Department and the FBI for mishandling the case." CNN (Franken) added, "This new report does not conclude there was foreign involvement. It does charge that federal investigators did not fully pursue those possibilities, even though the report states – 'there are multiple witnesses who place McVeigh with another person at the scene of the bombing. It is reasonable to question,' it continues, 'if all leads were thoroughly pursued, all evidence gathered and properly analyzed.' … But the FBI insists that all involved have been prosecuted, that 'every bit of information was investigated and reviewed.' So comes the question, why have another investigation? Well according to Republican Congressman Dana Rohrbacher…there are just too many questions that remain unanswered so long after the bombing." Meanwhile, in a story posted on local TV news Web sites, Internet Broadcasting (12/28) reported that the "investigators chastised the FBI for how it handled the investigation" and includes excerpts from the subcommittee's conclusions.

Rohrabacher Says FBI Showed Pre-9/11 Mindset In OKC Probe. Interviewing Rep. Dana Rohrabacher on CNN's American Morning (12/28), host Miles O'Brien asked, "You didn't get very far in this report; was it a waste of time?" Rohrabacher: "No, it wasn't a waste of time," and "while we didn't come to the conclusion that we have proven a foreign connection, we have at least broken some new ground by analyzing the FBI and Justice Department original investigation and perhaps some of the deficiencies there that led -- that could possibly have led to 9/11." Rohrabacher added later in the interview that "the FBI called off the investigation into John Doe two months after the bombing. That was premature and its left questions unanswered." O'Brien: "Why did they do that? Why do you feel the FBI is stonewalling, hiding information from you?" Rohrabacher: "Well, I didn't say they're stonewalling or they're hiding information. What I said was that they called off this investigation. I think it represents a mindset we saw also at play in the pre-to 9/11, when we had FBI investigators calling up the main office of the FBI saying, oh, my gosh, they're taking pilot lessons, and the FBI headquarters had a mindset of debunking and ignoring things like this. That same mindset we found present during the Oklahoma City Bombing investigation."

McVeigh, Nichols Prosecutors Defend FBI Investigation. The Denver Post (12/28, Pankratz, 256K) reported, "Two former federal prosecutors who tried Oklahoma City bombers Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols said Wednesday that they disagreed with a report by a congressional subcommittee slamming the FBI for failing to follow up on potential leads. One of McVeigh's defense lawyers also said he placed little credibility in the report by the House International Relations investigative subcommittee. A second McVeigh lawyer, however, said he agreed with the report's speculation that foreign conspirators might have been involved." The Post added, "Sean Connelly, a Denver-based lawyer who prosecuted Nichols and McVeigh, said the FBI did 'an exceptionally thorough' job in investigating any foreign links to the bombing. … But Stephen Jones, the lawyer who represented McVeigh during the Denver trial, said he believes the circle of conspirators extended beyond Nichols, McVeigh and Fortier to others both in the U.S. and abroad."

FBI Cracked Sophisticated Kaczynski Code, Revealing Catalog Of Bombings. KPIX-TV San Francisco (12/28, Werner) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "A decade after the feds tracked him down, CBS 5 Investigates has uncovered exclusive new information about Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, including a secret code he developed, and the confessions revealed as the code is broken. When Federal Bureau of Investigation agents swooped down on Kaczynski's Montana cabin in 1996, they found much more than they expected, according to lead agent Max Noel. There were 'lots of writings, lots of journals, lots of notebooks,' recalled Noel, now retired. … Noel believes Kaczynski wrote in code out of concern that someone might break into his cabin and discover his current and past activities, which may have included plans for future attacks." Cryptography expert Bruce Schneier "described the code as so complicated that 'it would not surprise me if this was the most complex cipher the FBI has seen since World War II.'" KPIX noted, "The FBI's decoding of the notebook revealed a virtual catalog of destruction."

Idaho Professor Charged In Hoax Threat To Bankruptcy Trustee. The AP (12/29, Dobner) reports, "An Idaho professor was charged with falsely claiming that he had mailed a dangerous substance to a trustee overseeing his bankruptcy case in Utah, federal authorities said Thursday. Thomas Hale warned the trustee Nov. 16 that she would be exposed to hantavirus," but "the white substance turned out to be baby powder, said Dennis McKone, assistant to the Salt Lake City fire chief. Hale, 61, pleaded not guilty in federal court Thursday, two days after he was arrested at Salt Lake City International Airport after a flight from Chicago." The AP notes trustee Elizabeth Loveridge "received the envelope on Nov. 20 and contacted Salt Lake City police. A bomb squad and the fire department's hazardous-materials team took the envelope and found it contained nothing harmful, FBI spokesman O. Scott Wall said." KTVX-TV Salt Lake City (12/28, Jones) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "The FBI says they quickly tracked the fax back to Hale. Hale filed for bankruptcy in 1996 and Loveridge was appointed trustee over the case. Investigators say she later determined that Hale had lied about his assets." Yesterday, "a federal judge ordered that Hale be released from jail pending trial."

The Salt Lake Tribune (12/29, Westley, Stettler) reports, "Hale's attorney, Larry Keller, said his client simply was seeking redress for an unresolved termite and mice problem. He said the act was 'inappropriate' in today's terrorism-charged climate, but not criminal." The Tribune notes, "Hale, a tenured professor and attorney, has taught history at Idaho State University for 23 years, according to ISU officials. … ISU Provost Robert A. Wharton said the university has not taken action against Hale or changed its class schedule." The Deseret Morning News (12/29, Winslow) adds, "Hale was arrested by the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force on Tuesday at the Salt Lake City International Airport after stepping off a flight from Chicago. 'He was surprised to be arrested,' FBI Special Agent-in-Charge Tim Fuhrman said. … Keller questioned why the FBI waited more than a month to arrest his client. 'If I'm a terrorist and I threaten somebody, they're going to want to get me off the streets right away,' he said."

California Man Indicted For Alleged Anti-Semitic Bomb Threats. The Paradise (CA) Post (12/29) reports, "A Paradise man is being held in Sacramento in relation to alleged threats made to hotels, Jewish museums, and other locations. According to a Department of Justice press release, a federal grand jury returned a nine-count indictment Thursday charging Scott R. Hudson, 52, with making a series of threatening phone calls between August and November of this year." The Post notes, "The FBI is investigating the case with the help of police departments in New York City, Rochester, Minn., Philadelphia, Penn. and Riverside and Irvine." Assistant US Attorney Benjamin B. Wagner "said Hudson is charged with calling in bomb threats to two hotels in New York City, making threatening calls to a Rabbi in Long Beach, New York, the National Museum of American Jewish History in Philadelphia and a Jewish congregation in Irvine. He also allegedly made threatening calls to a graduate school in Minnesota."

Spies Regularly Transmit Coded Messages Over Short-Wave Radio. The Washington Post/New York Daily News (12/29, A25, Meek) reports on the coded messages transmitted by spies over short-wave radio. "Chris Smolinski runs SpyNumbers.com and the 'Spooks' e-mail list, where 'number stations' hobbyists log hundreds of shortwave messages transmitted every month. … While hobbyists guess at the meaning of each cryptic message or which spy service sent it, it's no mystery to intelligence officials, who confirmed the purpose is espionage." The Daily News notes, "In Miami last week, Carlos and Elsa Alvarez pleaded guilty to lesser charges after the United States accused them of spying for Cuba. A prosecutor alleged in a court hearing this summer that they received shortwave 'messages in five-digit groupings.' An FBI interview transcript shows Alvarez admitted going into his bathroom 'on Fridays to listen at 11' for messages aimed at the couple."

DNI Issues Grants For Secret Intelligence Projects. The Washington Post (12/29, A25, Williamson, 690K) reports Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte "awarded $200,000 grants earlier this month to 10 scientists in the intelligence community, one of whom could not be named and several of whom declined to be interviewed, for projects whose details remain secret. The DNI office issued a news release with nine of the recipients' names, agencies, job titles and educational backgrounds. One awardee's information was omitted 'because of the sensitive position he occupies in his organization,' the release said. This is the second annual DNI Fellows award program. Last year's recipients, the release says, 'made significant progress with technology to locate terrorists and to extract intelligence from remote areas.' How they did that remains secret."

Short-Wave Radio Used To Openly Broadcast Intelligence. The Washington Post (12/29, A25, Meek, 690K) reports on the use of low-tech short wave radio broadcasts by intelligence agencies such as the Cuban Intelligence Directorate, Russian FSB, British MI6, or Israeli's Mossad, to communicate coded messages parsed in number or letters. Chris Smolinski "runs SpyNumbers.com and the 'Spooks' e-mail list, where 'number stations' hobbyists log hundreds of shortwave messages transmitted every month. 'It's like a puzzle. They're mystery stations,' explained Smolinski, who has tracked the spy broadcasts for 30 years." The Post adds, "While hobbyists guess at the meaning of each cryptic message or which spy service sent it, it's no mystery to intelligence officials, who confirmed the purpose is espionage."

Henke To Leave DHS For Ashcroft's Firm. McClatchy Newspapers (12/29, Dine) reports, "Tracy Henke, the Missourian who stirred controversy in a top homeland security job, has left the government to join her former boss, John Ashcroft, at The Ashcroft Group." McClatchy continues, "Earlier this year, President Bush appointed Henke to coordinate U.S. national-disaster and anti-terrorist efforts with state and local officials. Lawmakers of both parties questioned her experience, as well as Bush's bypassing of the Senate confirmation process. … But that criticism was nothing compared to the uproar when Henke, from Moscow Mills, Mo., decreased homeland security grants for New York and Washington, while increasing them for some smaller cities and towns. … 'SHE GAVE US THE AX: New York's money cut by a woman from the sticks,' complained a headline in The New York Daily News." McClatchy adds, "Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., then-chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said: 'As far as I'm concerned, the Department of Homeland Security has declared war on New York City. … A Washington Post columnist blasted the decision to reduce funding for the two cities hit on Sept. 11 while increasing it for 'those terrorism magnets of Kansas City and St. Louis - both by happenstance in Henke's home state of Missouri.' … In a telephone interview this week from Moscow Mills, Henke said that though she had held several high-profile positions in government, she was taken aback by the criticism. … 'One of the things that was surprising was the level of animosity and the personal attacks as it related to grant awards,' she said. … She said even with the reductions, New York still got the most money of any city for homeland security. She also noted that Congress had provided $600 million less in homeland security funding than the year before, making some cuts necessary."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Meets With "War Cabinet," Says More Consultations Ahead. ABC World News (12/28, story 3, :40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported President Bush "met at his Texas ranch with his national security advisers, including the Vice President and the secretaries of State and Defense," to consider changes to Iraq policy. Bush "says before he unveils his plan, there will be even more consultations." Bush: "Obviously, we'll continue to work with the Iraqi government. The key to success in Iraq is to have a government that's willing to deal with the elements there that are trying to prevent this young democracy from succeeding."

The CBS Evening News (12/28, story 2, 2:35, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported Bush "said he is close to a decision on a fresh strategy for Iraq, a strategy that could call for thousands of additional US troops." CBS (Martin) added, "With 100 US troops dead in Iraq this month, the second-worst of the year, President Bush met with his top national security advisers at the Texas White House to hammer out a new war strategy. One of the options is to send another 20,000 US troops into Baghdad, which would almost certainly mean more American casualties."

NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 2, 2:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported Bush "met with his war cabinet today to finalize a new strategy for Iraq." NBC (O'Donnell) added, "Unprepared to say how or what he will do differently on Iraq just yet, the President relied on hard to define phrases, saying he is making good progress and coming close to closure on a revamped strategy. Called to Crawford, Texas, the President's most senior wartime advisors, including his new Defense Secretary, just 10 days on the job. After a three-hour meeting the President said he wants more consultation." Bush: "We are making good progress towards coming up with a plan. We think it will help us achieve our objective." O'Donnell: "Intending this to be more than a high profile photo op, advisers are trying to thread a needle, saying no decisions have been made, but still claiming a plan is taking shape. The President described the enemy as extremists and radicals but made no mention today of Al Qaeda. He appeared push more burden on the Iraqi government."

The New York Times (12/29, Cloud, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports Bush "is considering an increase in troop levels in Iraq of 17,000 to 20,000, which would be accomplished in part by delaying the departure of two Marine regiments now deployed in Anbar Province." The option was among those President Bush addressed at a Thursday meeting with his national security team, "and it has emerged as a likely course as he considers a strategy shift in Iraq," Pentagon officials said. Most of the additional troops "would probably be employed in and around Baghdad." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (12/29, A3, Abramowitz, Wright, 690K) reports Bush "is considering new economic initiatives to go along with a possible increase in troops to help stabilize the country." Among the steps being considered "are short-term jobs and loan programs aimed at winning back the waning local support for the U.S. presence in Iraq."

The AP (12/28, Riechmann) reports Bush "worked nearly three hours at his Texas ranch today to design a new U.S. policy in Iraq," adding that "more consultation" would be required to "craft the plan he'll announce in the new year." The Washington Times (12/29, Curl, 88K) also reports on Bush's statement, noting that "the president said he is continuing to compile information and build a plan to deal with rampant sectarian violence that has left 100 American troops dead this month. 'I'm making good progress toward coming up with a plan that we think will help us achieve our objective,' said Mr. Bush. … The president's approval rating has plummeted, and Americans delivered both chambers of Congress last month to the Democrats in an election widely viewed as a rebuke of the administration's Iraq policy."

The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Gerstenzang, 850K) also reports on Bush's announcement "that he was 'making good progress' toward redrawing his strategy for Iraq, a plan aides said would encompass economic and political elements as well as new security procedures to stem sectarian violence and counter a thriving insurgency. It appeared increasingly likely, but not certain, that the latest effort to shore up the Iraq campaign would include sending additional U.S. troops there, and that the president would launch his strategy in a speech to the nation when Congress returns to Washington next Thursday or soon after." The Times suggests that the administration is eager for the ultimate plan to be well received by the public.

Little Innovation Seen In Surge Plans. The Washington Times (12/29, Scarborough, 88K) reports on the various troop "surge" options being studied, noting that "one official who was sent the briefing slides for various surge options said he was struck with the lack of new ideas after an intense three-month review process inside the Bush administration. 'Some of this stuff is what the old Coalition Provisional Authority looked at,' said the official." The Times suggests that possible troop increases being considered range from 5,000 to 30,000, noting that pacifying Baghdad would be the aim "if Mr. Bush, who met yesterday at his Texas ranch with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and other national security advisers," opts for the higher troop level, adding that under this scenario "the Army will have to keep some units in Iraq longer than their normal 13-month deployments, and accelerate the redeployment of brigades who already have served there."

Lieberman Argues For Troop Surge. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (12/29, A27, 690K) headlined, "Why We Need More Troops In Iraq," Sen. Joseph Lieberman writes about his recent trip to the Middle East, which "has made one thing clearer to me than ever: While we are naturally focused on Iraq, a larger war is emerging. On one side are extremists and terrorists led and sponsored by Iran, on the other moderates and democrats supported by the United States." Lieberman characterizes the war as "winnable," and urgent, arguing that despite public frustration with the war, "what is needed now, especially in Washington and Baghdad, is not despair but decisive action -- and soon." Lieberman cites security as "the most pressing problem," and suggests that Iran and al-Qaeda are interested in "a full-scale civil war" in Iraq, "the central front in the global and regional war against Islamic extremism. To turn around the crisis we need to send more American troops while we also train more Iraqi troops and strengthen the moderate political forces in the national government. After speaking with our military commanders and soldiers there, I strongly believe that additional U.S. troops must be deployed to Baghdad and Anbar province."

Saddam Likely To Be Executed "This Weekend." Saddam Hussein is nearly certain to be executed before the close of 2006, according to reports late Thursday. NBC Nightly News (12/28, lead story, 1:15, Engel, 9.87M) reported the US military "has received a formal request from the Iraqi government to transfer" the former dictator "to Iraqi authority. That would be one of the last steps required" before the execution, which "could take place within the next 48 hours or perhaps as early as tomorrow." On the CBS Evening News (12/28, lead story, 2:25, Pinkston, 7.66M), Iraqi National Security Adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie was shown saying, "I think the sooner the better." Rubaie told CBS the execution would be videotaped, but CNS said it is "unclear whether the video will be shown." CNN.com (12/29) says "Bush administration officials told CNN Hussein is expected to be executed 'this weekend.'"

The New York Times (12/29, Glanz, 1.16M) says preparations for the execution "began taking on a sense of urgency late Thursday." A "senior administration official said that the execution would probably not take place in the next 24 hours, but that the timing would be swift. 'It may be another day or so,' the official said." The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) says Hussein "met with two of his half brothers and his lawyers Thursday" as the preparations continued. Hussein "seemed in high spirits Thursday as he shared untitled poems he wrote recently and well wishes for the Iraqi people with his visitors over lunch, said attorney Wadood Fawzi, one of those who met with Hussein." The New York Post (12/29, 631K) headlines its report "Saddam: Dead By Sunday." The AP (12/28, Frayer) has a straightforward report.

More Commentary On Saddam Execution. The New York Times (12/29, 1.16M) editorializes, "The important question was never really about whether Saddam Hussein was guilty of crimes against humanity. … What really mattered was whether an Iraq freed from his death grip could hold him accountable in a way that nurtured hope for a better future. … Toppling Saddam Hussein did not automatically create a new and better Iraq. Executing him won't either."

The Washington Post (12/29, A26, 690K) editorializes, "This was not the accountability that one would hope for Saddam Hussein. For one thing, the crime for which he has been condemned -- the killing of 148 men and boys from the town of Dujail after an assassination attempt against him there in 1982 -- will be but a footnote in the volume detailing his atrocities. And his execution will cut short his trial for the crimes that would fill out that volume: the so-called Anfal campaign, in which tens of thousands of Kurds were murdered. What's more, his trial was in no sense the model of civilized justice that would have showcased a new, democratic Iraq. … Still, there is something unreal about the cries of foul from human rights groups demanding perfect procedural justice from a country struggling with civil war, daily bombings and death-squad killings."

US Death Toll In Iraq "Edges Closer To 3,000." NBC Nightly News (12/28, story 4, 2:00, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "More on Iraq today where we learned of the deaths of four more Americans. As the death toll edges closer to 3,000 we take a look at the challenges for US troops on the frontlines in Baghdad." NBC (Maceda) added, "On every street corner, behind every door of every house these US troops could be facing death. A Sunni gunman or Shiite sniper, they are caught in the middle and focused on coming home alive in one piece. … The reality is brutal, attacks on US forces and Iraqis at an all-time high. Today 60 Iraqis were killed in Baghdad alone. Almost daily US troops come under fire."

Marine Officials Say Ramadi Raid Did Not Include Air Strikes On Insurgents. The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Moore, 850K) reports, "A large-scale U.S. military operation in Ramadi last month did not target suspected insurgents with airstrikes, U.S. military officials said. Witness statements reported by The Times on Nov. 15 indicated that a U.S. airstrike might have killed at least 30 people, including women and children. But Marine spokesman Lt. Col. Bryan Salas said in a written response to inquiries about the incident that an airstrike Nov. 14 hit a bridge about 10 miles east of Ramadi and resulted in no casualties."
